THE ALL ENGLAND LAW REPORTS 2006

Volume 4

Editor
KAREN WIDDICOMBE Solicitor

LexisNexis®
Butterworths

Members of the LexisNexis Group worldwide

United Kingdom	LexisNexis Butterworths, a Division of Reed Elsevier (UK) Ltd, Halsbury House, 35 Chancery Lane, LONDON, WC2A 1EL, and RSH, 1–3 Baxter's Place, Leith Walk EDINBURGH EH1 3AF
Argentina	LexisNexis Argentina, BUENOS AIRES
Australia	LexisNexis Butterworths, CHATSWOOD, New South Wales
Austria	LexisNexis Verlag ARD Orac GmbH & Co KG, VIENNA
Benelux	LexisNexis Benelux, AMSTERDAM
Canada	LexisNexis Canada, MARKHAM, Ontario
Chile	LexisNexis Chile Ltda, SANTIAGO
China	LexisNexis China, BEIJING and SHANGHAI
France	LexisNexis SA, PARIS
Germany	LexisNexis Deutschland GmbH, MUNSTER
Hong Kong	LexisNexis Hong Kong, HONG KONG
India	LexisNexis India, NEW DELHI
Italy	Giuffrè Editore, MILAN
Japan	LexisNexis Japan, TOKYO
Malaysia	Malayan Law Journal Sdn Bhd, KUALA LUMPUR
Mexico	LexisNexis Mexico, MEXICO
New Zealand	LexisNexis NZ Ltd, WELLINGTON
Poland	Wydawnictwo Prawnicze LexisNexis Sp, WARSAW
Singapore	LexisNexis Singapore, SINGAPORE
South Africa	LexisNexis Butterworths, DURBAN
USA	LexisNexis, DAYTON, Ohio

© Reed Elsevier (UK) Ltd 2006
Published by LexisNexis Butterworths

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced in any material form (including photocopying or storing it in any medium by electronic means and whether or not transiently or incidentally to some other use of this publication) without the written permission of the copyright owner except in accordance with the provisions of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 or under the terms of a licence issued by the Copyright Licensing Agency Ltd, 90 Tottenham Court Road, London, England W1T 4LP. Applications for the copyright owner's written permission to reproduce any part of this publication should be addressed to the publisher.

Warning: The doing of an unauthorised act in relation to a copyright work may result in both a civil claim for damages and criminal prosecution.

Crown copyright material is reproduced with the permission of the Controller of HMSO and the Queen's Printer for Scotland. Parliamentary copyright material is reproduced with the permission of the Controller of Her Majesty's Stationery Office on behalf of Parliament. Any European material in this work which has been reproduced from EUR-lex, the official European Communities legislation website, is European Communities copyright.

A CIP Catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Printed and bound in Great Britain by William Clowes Ltd, Beccles, Suffolk

ISBN for this volume
ISBN 13: 9781405712453

ISBN for the complete set of volumes
ISBN 13: 9780406996435

ISBN 978-1-4057-1245-3

Visit LexisNexis Butterworths at www.lexisnexis.co.uk

CONSULTING EDITORS

Celia Fox Barrister

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister

Dilys Tausz Barrister

REPORTERS

Giovanni D'Avola Barrister

Carla Dougan-Bacchus Barrister

Victoria Ellis Barrister

Martyn Gurr Barrister

Vanessa Higgins Barrister

Christian Metcalfe Barrister

Neneh Munu Barrister

Rakesh Rajani Barrister

Aaron Turpin Barrister

Gareth Williams Barrister

James Wilson Barrister (NZ)

MANAGING EDITOR

Wendy Herring Barrister

TECHNICAL EDITORS

Catherine Bayliss LLB, Dip LP

Rukhsana Hasnain LLB, Dip LP

SENIOR SUB-EDITORS

Christina Jackson BA (Oxon)

Jacey Sivadasam LLB, Dip LP

WIRRAL LIBRARY SERVICES
5000145 79699
Lex Nex | HJ | 2/07
Sub.

House of Lords

Lords of Appeal in Ordinary

Lord Bingham of Cornhill
Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead
Lord Hoffmann
Lord Hope of Craighead
Lord Saville of Newdigate
Lord Scott of Foscote
Lord Rodger of Earlsferry
Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe
Baroness Hale of Richmond
Lord Carswell
Lord Brown of Eaton-under-Heywood
Lord Mance

Court of Appeal

The Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales and President of the Courts of England and Wales: Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers

The Master of the Rolls and Head of Civil Justice: Sir Anthony Peter Clarke

The President of the Queen's Bench Division and Head of Criminal Justice: Sir Igor Judge

The President of the Family Division and Head of Family Justice: Sir Mark Howard Potter

The Chancellor of the High Court: Sir Robert Andrew Morritt

Lords Justices of Appeal

Sir Robin Ernest Auld
Sir Malcolm Thomas Pill
Sir Alan Hylton Ward
Sir Mathew Alexander Thorpe
Sir Henry Brooke (Vice-President of the Civil Division) (retired 30 September 2006)
Sir George Mark Waller
Sir John Frank Mummery
Sir John Murray Chadwick
Sir Richard Joseph Buxton
Sir Anthony Tristram Kenneth May (Vice-President of the Queen's Bench Division)
Sir Simon Lane Tuckey
Sir John Grant McKenzie Laws
Sir Stephen John Sedley
Sir David Nicholas Ramsey Latham (Vice-President of the Criminal Division)
Sir Bernard Anthony Rix
Sir Jonathan Frederic Parker
Dame Mary Howarth Arden
Sir David Wolfe Keene
Sir John Anthony Dyson
Sir Andrew Centlivres Longmore
Sir Robert John Anderson Carnwath
Sir Thomas Scott Gillespie Baker
Dame Janet Hilary Smith
Sir Roger John Laugharne Thomas (Senior Presiding Judge for England and Wales)
Sir Robert Raphael Hayim (Robin) Jacob
Sir Nicholas Peter Rathbone Wall
Sir David Edmond Neuberger
Sir Maurice Ralph Kay
Sir Anthony Hooper
Sir William Marcus Gage
Sir Timothy Andrew Wigram Lloyd
Sir Martin James Moore-Bick
Sir Nicholas Allan Roy Wilson
Sir Alan George Moses
Sir Stephen Price Richards
Dame Heather Carol Hallett
Sir Anthony Philip Gilson Hughes
Sir Brian Henry Leveson (appointed 2 October 2006)

High Court of Justice

The Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales
The President of the Queen's Bench Division
The President of the Family Division
The Chancellor of the High Court
The Senior Presiding Judge for England and Wales
The puisne judges of the High Court

Chancery Division

The Chancellor of the High Court

Sir John Edmund Frederic Lindsay
Sir Edward Christopher Evans-Lombe
Sir William Anthony Blackburne
Sir Gavin Anthony Lightman
Sir Colin Percy Farquharson Rimer
Sir Nicholas Richard Pumfrey
Sir Michael Christopher Campbell Hart
Sir Lawrence Anthony Collins
Sir Nicholas John Patten
Sir Terrence Michael Elkan Barnet Etherton
Sir Peter Winston Smith
Sir Kim Martin Jordan Lewison
Sir David Anthony Stewart Richards
Sir George Anthony Mann
Sir Nicholas Roger Warren
Sir David James Tyson Kitchin
Sir Michael Townley Featherstone Briggs

Queen's Bench Division

The President of the Queen's Bench Division

Sir Stuart Neil McKinnon
Sir Peter John Cresswell
Sir Christopher John Holland
Sir Anthony David Colman
Sir John Thayne Forbes
Sir Thomas Richard Atkin Morison
Sir Andrew David Collins
Sir Alexander Neil Logie Butterfield
Sir George Michael Newman
Sir Gordon Julian Hugh Langley
Sir Robert Franklyn Nelson
Sir Roger Grenfell Toulson
Sir David Eady
Sir Jeremy Mirth Sullivan
Sir David Herbert Penry-Davey
Sir David William Steel
Sir Charles Anthony St John Gray
Sir Nicolas Dusan Bratza
Sir Michael John Burton
Sir Rupert Matthew Jackson
Sir Patrick Elias
Sir Richard John Pearson Aikens
Sir Stephen Robert Silber
Sir John Bernard Goldring
Sir Peter Francis Crane
Dame Anne Judith Rafferty
Sir Geoffery Douglas Grigson
Sir Richard John Hedley Gibbs
Sir Richard Henry Quixano Henriques
Sir Stephen Miles Tomlinson
Sir Andrew Charles Smith
Sir Stanley Jeffrey Burnton
Sir Christopher John Pitchford
Sir Duncan Brian Walter Ouseley
Sir Richard George Bramwell McCombe
Sir Raymond Evan Jack
Sir Robert Michael Owen
Sir Colin Crichton Mackay
Sir John Edward Mitting
Sir David Roderick Evans

[continued on next page]

Queen's Bench Division (continued)

Sir Nigel Anthony Lamert Davis
Sir Peter Henry Gross
Sir Brian Richard Keith
Sir Jeremy Lionel Cooke
Sir Richard Alan Field
Sir Christopher John Pitchers
Sir Colman Maurice Treacy
Sir Peregrine Charles Hugo Simon
Sir Roger John Royce
Dame Laura Mary Cox
Sir Adrian Bruce Fulford
Sir Jack Beatson
Sir Michael George Tugendhat
Sir David Clive Clarke
Dame Elizabeth Gloster
Sir David Michael Bean
Sir Alan Fraser Wilkie
Dame Linda Penelope Dobbs
Sir Henry Egar Garfield Hodge
Sir Paul James Walker
Sir David Calvert-Smith
Sir Christopher Simon Courtenay Stephenson Clarke
Sir Charles Peter Lawford Openshaw
Dame Caroline Jane Swift
Sir Brian Frederick James Langstaff
Sir David Lloyd Jones
Sir Vivian Arthur Ramsey
Sir Nicholas Edward Underhill
Sir Stephen John Irwin
Sir Nigel John Martin Teare
(appointed 2 October 2006)

Family Division

The President of the Family Division

Dame Joyanne Winifred Bracewell
Sir Jan Peter Singer
Sir Andrew Tristram Hammett Kirkwood
Sir Hugh Peter Derwyn Bennett
Sir Edward James Holman
Dame Mary Claire Hogg
Sir Christopher John Sumner
Sir Arthur William Hessin Charles
Sir David Roderick Lessiter Bodey
Dame Jill Margaret Black
Sir James Lawrence Munby
Sir Paul James Duke Coleridge
Sir Mark Hedley
Dame Anna Evelyn Hamilton Pauffley
Sir Roderic Lionel James Wood Dame Florence Jacquelene Baron
Sir Ernest Nigel Ryder
Sir Andrew Ewart McFarlane
Dame Julia Wendy Macur

Official Judgment Numbers and Paragraph References

Since 11 January 2001, official judgment numbers have been given to all judgments delivered in the House of Lords, Privy Council, both divisions of the Court of Appeal and the Administrative Court. All such judgments have fixed paragraph numbering, as do judgments delivered on or after 11 January 2001 in those parts of the High Court which did not then adopt the system of official judgment numbers (see Practice Note (judgments: neutral citation) [2001] 1 All ER 193 for the Court of Appeal and the High Court). On 14 January 2002 the system of judgment numbers was extended to all parts of the High Court (see Practice Direction (High Court judgments: neutral citation) [2002] 1 All ER 351). We have adopted the following practice in respect of judgments with official judgment numbers and official paragraph numbering:

- The official judgment number is inserted immediately beneath the case name;
- Official paragraph numbers are in bold in square brackets;
- Holding references in the headnotes, and any other cross-references, are to an official paragraph number, not to a page of the report;
- When such a judgment is subsequently cited in another report,

  (i) the official judgment number is inserted before the usual report citations in the case lists and on the first occasion when the case is cited in the text. Thereafter, only the report citations are given;

  (ii) All 'at' references are to the official paragraph number rather than to a page of a report, with the paragraph number in square brackets but not in bold;

  (iii) The 'at' reference is only given in conjunction with the first report cited; eg [2001] 4 All ER 159 at [16], [2001] AC 61. If an 'at' reference is included on the first occasion when the case is cited, it also appears alongside the official judgment number.

For the avoidance of doubt, these changes do not apply to reports of judgments delivered before 11 January 2001 or to the citation of such cases in other reports.

CITATION

These reports are cited thus:

[2006] 4 All ER

REFERENCES

These reports contain references to the following major works of legal reference described in the manner indicated below.

Halsbury's Laws of England

The reference 14 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) para 185 refers to paragraph 185 on page 90 of volume 14 of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Laws of England.

The reference 10 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 370 refers to paragraph 370 on page 163 of reissue volume 10 of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Laws of England.

The reference 11(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2006 reissue) para 9 refers to paragraph 9 on page 27 of the 2006 reissue of volume 11(1) of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Laws of England.

Halsbury's Statutes of England and Wales

The reference 14 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2003 reissue) 734 refers to page 734 of the 2003 reissue of volume 14 of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Statutes of England and Wales.

The reference 40(1) Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2006 reissue) 271 refers to page 271 of the 2006 reissue of volume 40(1) of the fourth edition of Halsbury's Statutes of England and Wales.

Halsbury's Statutory Instruments

The reference 14 Halsbury's Statutory Instruments (2004 issue) 201 refers to page 201 of the 2004 issue of volume 14 of Halsbury's Statutory Instruments.

Cases reported in volume 4

	Page
Abbey National plc, Woodward v [CA]	1209
Amoako (on the application of), R v DPP [QBD]	230
Apotex Europe Ltd, SmithKline Beecham plc v [CA]	1078
Astley v North Wales Training and Enterprise Council Ltd (t/a Celtec Ltd) [HL]	27
Baiai (on the application of), R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (No 2) [QBD]	555
Barclays Bank plc, Customs and Excise Comrs v [HL]	256
Board of National Mission of the Church of Scotland, Percy v [HL]	1354
Bossom, R v [CA]	995
Bow Street Magistrates' Court, R (on the application of the CPS) v [DC]	1342
Bradford & Bingley plc v Rashid [HL]	705
Bristol City Council v Glastonbury [CA]	420
Bristol City Council v Hassan [CA]	420
C plc v P (Secretary of State for the Home Office intervening) [Ch D]	311
Central Court of Criminal Proceedings No 5 of the National Court, Madrid, Hilali v [DC]	435
Central Criminal Court, R (on the application of Malik) v [DC]	1141
Centre Reinsurance International Co v Freakley [HL]	1153
Centre Reinsurance International Co, Freakley v [HL]	1153
Chemical & Insulating Co Ltd, Rothwell v [CA]	1161
Collins, DPP v [HL]	602
Conville (on the application of), R v Richmond upon Thames London BC [CA]	917
Coutts, R v [HL]	353
Crehan v Inntrepreneur Pub Co (CPC) [HL]	465
CPS (on the application of the), R v Bow Street Magistrates' Court [DC]	1342
Culver, Wylde v [Ch D]	345
Curtis, Majorstake Ltd v [CA]	1326
Customs and Excise Comrs v Barclays Bank plc [HL]	256
Da Silva, R v [CA]	900
Davis, R v [CA]	648
Days Healthcare UK Ltd v Pihsiang Machinery Manufacturing Co Ltd [QBD]	233
Deputy Prosecutor General of Lithuania, Miklis v [DC]	808
DPP v Collins [HL]	602
DPP, R (on the application of Amoako) v [QBD]	230
Ellis, R v [CA]	648
Exel Management Services Ltd, Sanderson v [EAT]	107
First Secretary of State, Pascoe v [QBD]	1240
Floe Telecom Ltd v Office of Communications [CA]	688
Flora v Wakom (Heathrow) Ltd [CA]	982
Forbes v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [CA]	799
Freakley v Centre Reinsurance International Co [HL]	1153
Freakley, Centre Reinsurance International Co v [HL]	1153
Fulham Leisure Holdings Ltd v Nicholson Graham & Jones (a firm) (No 2) (Note) [Ch D]	1397
G (children) (residence: same-sex partner), Re [HL]	241
Gaul, Green v [CA]	1110
Gillan (on the application of), R v Metropolitan Police Comr [HL]	1041
Glastonbury, Bristol City Council v [CA]	420
Gover v Propertycare Ltd [CA]	69
Green v Gaul [CA]	1110
Guy's and St Thomas's NHS Trust, Majrowski v [HL]	395
Harding v Wealands [HL]	1
Hassan, Bristol City Council v [CA]	420
Hilali v Central Court of Criminal Proceedings No 5 of the National Court, Madrid [DC]	435
Hirst (on the application of), R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [CA]	639
Inntrepreneur Pub Co (CPC), Crehan v [HL]	465
Irvine v Irvine [Ch D]	102
Jameel v Wall Street Journal Europe SPRL [HL]	1279
Jarman, Toth v (Note) [CA]	1276
Jones v Whalley [HL]	113
K Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc [CA]	907
Kay, Lambeth London BC v [HL]	128
Kendrick Construction Ltd, Kershaw Mechanical Services Ltd v [QBD]	79
Kershaw Mechanical Services Ltd v Kendrick Construction Ltd [QBD]	79
Komori UK Ltd, Polestar Jowetts Ltd v [CA]	294
Komori UK Ltd, Vibixa Ltd v [CA]	294
Lambeth London BC v Kay [HL]	128
Leeds City Council v Price [HL]	128
Llewellyn, R v [CA]	1012
Loftus (decd), Re [CA]	1110
M v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [HL]	929
Majorstake Ltd v Curtis [CA]	1326
Majrowski v Guy's and St Thomas's NHS Trust [HL]	395
Malik (on the application of), R v Central Criminal Court [DC]	1141
Martin-Dye v Martin-Dye [CA]	779
McCarthy v McCarthy & Stone plc [Ch D]	1127

Page

McCarthy & Stone plc, McCarthy v [Ch D] 1127
Mental Health Review Tribunal (Northern Region), R (on the application of N) v [CA] 194
Mersey Care NHS Trust, R (on the application of Munjaz) v [HL] 736
Metropolitan Police Comr, R (on the application of Gillan) v [HL] 1041
Miklis v Deputy Prosecutor General of Lithuania [DC] 808
Moss, R v [CA] 1012
Munjaz (on the application of), R v Mersey Care NHS Trust [HL] 736
N (on the application of), R v Mental Health Review Tribunal (Northern Region) [CA] 194
National Westminster Bank plc, K Ltd v [CA] 907
Natural Environment Research Council, Sutradhar v [HL] 490
Newham London BC v Onasanya [DC] .. 459
Newham London BC, Onasanya v [DC].. 459
News Group Newspapers Ltd, Turner v [CA] 613
Nicholson Graham & Jones (a firm), Fulham Leisure Holdings Ltd v (No 2) (Note) [Ch D] 1397
North Wales Training and Enterprise Council Ltd (t/a Celtec Ltd), Astley v [HL] 27
O'Brien, R v [CA] 1012
Office of Communications, Floe Telecom Ltd v [CA] 688
Onasanya v Newham London BC [DC] .. 459
Onasanya, Newham London BC v [DC].. 459
Oxford City Council, Oxfordshire County Council v [HL] 817
Oxfordshire County Council v Oxford City Council [HL] 817
P, C plc v (Secretary of State for the Home Office intervening) [Ch D] 311
Pascoe v First Secretary of State [QBD] . 1240
Patel v Pirabakaran [CA] 506
Percy v Board of National Mission of the Church of Scotland [HL] 1354
Pihsiang Machinery Manufacturing Co Ltd, Days Healthcare UK Ltd v [QBD] 233
Pirabakaran, Patel v [CA] 506
Pleural Plaques Litigation, Re [CA] . .. 1161
Polestar Jowetts Ltd v Komori UK Ltd [CA] . 294
Practice Note (Anonymisation in asylum and immigration cases in the Court of Appeal) [CA].. 928
Price, Leeds City Council v [HL] 128
Propertycare Ltd, Gover v [CA] 69
R v Bossom [CA] 995
R v Coutts [HL] 353
R v Da Silva [CA] 900
R v Davis [CA] 648

Page

R v Ellis [CA] 648
R v Llewellyn [CA] 1012
R v Moss [CA] 1012
R v O'Brien [CA] 1012
R v Saik [HL] 866
R (on the application of Amoako) v DPP [QBD] 230
R (on the application of Baiai) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (No 2) [QBD] .. 555
R (on the application of Conville) v Richmond upon Thames London BC [CA] 917
R (on the application of Gillan) v Metropolitan Police Comr [HL] 1041
R (on the application of Hirst) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [CA] 639
R (on the application of Malik) v Central Criminal Court [DC] 1141
R (on the application of Munjaz) v Mersey Care NHS Trust [HL] 736
R (on the application of N) v Mental Health Review Tribunal (Northern Region) [CA] .. 194
R (on the application of Robinson) v Sutton Coldfield Magistrates' Court [DC] 1029
R (on the application of the CPS) v Bow Street Magistrates' Court [DC] 1342
Raguz, Scottish & Newcastle plc v [Ch D] .. 524
Rashid, Bradford & Bingley plc v [HL] 705
Richmond upon Thames London BC, R (on the application of Conville) v [CA] 917
Robinson (on the application of), R v Sutton Coldfield Magistrates' Court [DC] 1029
Rothwell v Chemical & Insulating Co Ltd [CA] 1161
Rutherford, Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v [HL] 577
Saik, R v [HL] 866
Sanderson v Exel Management Services Ltd [EAT] 107
Scottish & Newcastle plc v Raguz [Ch D] .. 524
Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Rutherford [HL] 577
Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, M v [HL] 929
Secretary of State for the Home Dept, Forbes v [CA] 799
Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Baiai) v (No 2) [QBD] 555
Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Hirst) v [CA] 639
SmithKline Beecham plc v Apotex Europe Ltd [CA] 1078
Stoke-on-Trent City Council, Walley v [CA] .. 1230
Sutradhar v Natural Environment Research Council [HL] 490

Page

Sutton Coldfield Magistrates' Court, R (on the application of Robinson) v [DC] 1029
Toth v Jarman (Note) [CA] 1276
Turner v News Group Newspapers Ltd [CA]. 613
Vibixa Ltd v Komori UK Ltd [CA] 294
Wakom (Heathrow) Ltd, Flora v [CA] .. . 982
Wall Street Journal Europe SPRL, Jameel v [HL] 1279
Walley v Stoke-on-Trent City Council [CA] .. 1230
Wealands, Harding v [HL] 1
Whalley, Jones v [HL] 113
Woodward v Abbey National plc [CA] 1209
Wylde v Culver [Ch D] 345
Wylde (decd), Re [Ch D] 345

Digest of cases reported in volume 4

ARBITRATION – Award – Appeal from decision of arbitrator – Approach to be adopted by court where appeal with agreement of parties to the proceedings on a question of law

Kershaw Mechanical Services Ltd v Kendrick Construction Ltd .. Jackson J 79

BANK – Duty of care – Freezing order – Claimant serving on bank freezing orders prohibiting disposals from clients' accounts – Clients transferring money from accounts after claimant serving orders on bank – Whether bank owing duty of care to claimant to prevent payment of money from accounts

Customs and Excise Comrs v Barclays Bank plc .. .. HL 256

CHILD – Maintenance – Liability for child support payments of non-resident parent with same sex partner greater than her liability would have been with male partner – Whether discrimination on ground of sex – Whether within ambit of right to respect for private and family life or right to protection of property

M v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions .. .. HL 929

COMMONS – Registration – Town or village green – Land on which significant number of inhabitants of locality had indulged in lawful sports or pastimes as of right for not less than 20 years and 'continue to do so' – Whether registration of such land in itself conferring rights on inhabitants to indulge in lawful sports and pastimes – Whether such a green falling within legislation rendering it an offence to interfere with enjoyment of town or village greens – Whether lawful sports and pastimes having to continue to date of registration – Whether registration authority having power to amend application for registration to exclude part of land included in application or to register as a green part only of land included in application

Oxfordshire County Council v Oxford City Council .. .. HL 817

COMPANY – Administration order – Priority – Policy providing for transfer of claims handling rights to insurers on occurrence of insolvency event – Claims handling expenses incurred by insurers – Whether claims handling expenses to be treated as sums payable in respect of debts or liabilities incurred under contracts entered into by administrator in carrying out of his functions – Whether claims handling expenses having statutory priority over other costs of administration

Centre Reinsurance International Co v Freakley .. .. HL 1153

——Unfair prejudice to members – Purchase of shares of prejudiced members – Valuation of shares – Company not a quasi-partnership – Whether valuation should be on pro rata basis or at a discount

Irvine v Irvine .. .. Blackburne J 102

COMPETITION – Competition Appeal Tribunal – Jurisdiction – Tribunal hearing appeal and remitting matter to regulator for re-investigation – Whether tribunal having power to impose time limits on investigation by regulator

Floe Telecom Ltd v Office of Communications .. .. CA 688

COMPULSORY PURCHASE – Compulsory purchase order – Validity – Regeneration of under-used or ineffectively used land situated in urban area – Order made on basis land predominantly under-used or ineffectively used – Whether order valid

Pascoe v First Secretary of State .. .. Forbes J 1240

CONFLICT OF LAWS – Tort – Damages – Assessment – Proper law of tort law of New South Wales – Whether provisions of New South Wales statute restricting allowable damages applicable – Whether statutory provisions substantive

Harding v Wealands .. .. HL 1

COSTS – Assessment – Detailed assessment – Paying party refusing to comply with order for interim payment of costs on account – Whether court having jurisdiction to debar paying party from taking part in detailed assessment unless interim payment made

Days Healthcare UK Ltd v Pihsiang Machinery Manufacturing Co Ltd .. .. Langley J 233

COURT OF APPEAL – Jurisdiction – Appeal from Employment Appeal Tribunal – Approach to appeal

Gover v Propertycare Ltd .. .. CA 69

——Practice – Civil division – Asylum and immigration cases – Anonymisation of judgments – Form of anonymisation

Practice Note (Anonymisation in asylum and immigration cases in the Court of Appeal) .. .. CA 928

CRIMINAL LAW – Bail – Application – Application for bail application to be heard in public – Approach to be adopted on such an application

R (on the application of Malik) v Central Criminal Court .. .. .. DC 1141

——Conspiracy – Proceeds of criminal conduct – Intention or knowledge that fact or circumstance necessary for commission of offence shall or will exist – Whether suspicion that money representing proceeds of criminal conduct sufficient

R v Saik .. .. HL 866

——Indecent photographs of persons under 16 – Fraudulent evasion of prohibition or restriction – Prosecution not having to prove that offender not only knew goods were prohibited but also nature of goods – Right to respect for private and family life – On conviction offender subject to notification requirements relating to sexual offences – Whether notification requirements compatible with offender's right to respect for private and family life

Forbes v Secretary of State for the Home Dept .. .. CA 799

——Murder – Manslaughter – Reduction to manslaughter – Facts raising possibility of manslaughter verdict – Judge in murder trial asking counsel whether should direct jury on manslaughter – Prosecution and defence counsel both declining direction on manslaughter – Whether judge having duty to direct jury on obvious alternative offence arising on the evidence irrespective of parties' wishes

R v Coutts .. .. HL 353

——Procedure – Notice of intention to adduce bad character evidence made out of time – Justices granting applications to extend time limits – Whether discretion to be exercised only where exceptional circumstances

R (on the application of Robinson) v Sutton Coldfield Magistrates' Court DC 1029

——Proceeds of crime – Facilitating retention or control by or on behalf of another of proceeds of criminal conduct knowing or suspecting other person engaged in criminal conduct – Meaning of 'suspecting'

R v Da Silva .. .. CA 900

——Public electronic communications network – Message or other matter – Sending grossly offensive message or other matter – Test for determining whether grossly offensive

DPP v Collins .. .. HL 602

CRIMINAL LAW (CONT'D) – Trial – Stay of proceedings – Abuse of process – Caution in lieu of prosecution – Appellant assaulting respondent – Appellant agreeing to police caution on basis that no prosecution would be brought – Respondent subsequently bringing prosecution against appellant – Justices staying proceedings on grounds of abuse of process – Whether justices correct on the facts

Jones v Whalley .. .. HL 113

——Trial – Witnesses – Identity – Right to a fair trial – Protection of witnesses by order for anonymity – Whether breach of right to fair trial

R v Davis .. .. CA 648

DAMAGES – Personal injury – Periodical payments – Statute providing for variation of periodical payments by reference to retail prices index – Whether provision to be disapplied or modified only in exceptional circumstances

Flora v Wakom (Heathrow) Ltd .. .. CA 982

DIVORCE – Financial provision – Pension sharing order – Pensions in payment – Other financial resources – Approach to pensions in payment in clean break cases

Martin-Dye v Martin-Dye .. .. CA 779

EMPLOYMENT – Continuity – Transfer of trade, business or undertaking – Employees seconded from transferor to transferee – Employees later electing to resign from transferor and take up employment with transferee – Whether employees to be permitted to argue new point following reference to European Court of Justice – Whether employees having decided freely not to continue with relationship with transferee so as to exclude themselves from claiming continuity of service

Astley v North Wales Training and Enterprise Council Ltd (t/a Celtec Ltd) HL 27

——Contract of Service – Contract personally to execute work and labour – Church minister – Complaint of sex discrimination against church – Whether minister's relationship with church constituting 'employment' – Whether complaint constituting 'matters spiritual' falling within exclusive jurisdiction of church courts

Percy v Board of National Mission of the Church of Scotland .. .. HL 1354

——Discrimination against a man – Imposition of upper age limit of 65 on persons bringing claims for unfair dismissal and redundancy payments – Employees alleging higher proportion of men continuing in employment after 65 than women – Whether statutory provisions indirectly discriminatory

Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Rutherford .. .. .. HL 577

——Remuneration – Week's pay – Normal working hours – Employee having normal working hours if entitled to overtime pay when employed for more than fixed number of hours – Whether 'fixed number of hours' including 'hours' calculated by way of genuine pre-estimate

Sanderson v Exel Management Services Ltd .. .. EAT 107

——Victimisation – Protected disclosure – Whether employee entitled to bring claim for being subjected to detriment on ground of protected disclosure in relation to acts of employer after employment had ceased

Woodward v Abbey National plc .. .. CA 1209

EQUITY – Laches – Defence – Availability – Whether defence available where no period of limitation prescribed by statute

Re Loftus (decd) .. .. CA 1110

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY – Fishing rights – Common fishing policy – Community law exempting under ten metre vessels from detailed record keeping and reporting obligations – Fishing licence under domestic law for under ten metre vessels including condition as to monthly catch limit – Whether condition contrary to Community law

R v Bossom .. .. CA 995

——Rules on competition – Claimant bringing proceedings in England for breach of European Community law prohibition on such agreements – Claimant contending that judge should treat as binding factual assessment made by European Commission in deciding proceedings between different parties in same market

Crehan v Inntrepreneur Pub Co (CPC) .. .. HL 465

EVIDENCE – Expert witness – Conflict of interest – Guidance – Best practice

Toth v Jarman (Note).. .. .. CA 1276

——Without prejudice correspondence – Correspondence forming part of negotiations – Privilege from admission in evidence – Creditor inviting debtor to make proposals for paying debt – Debtor's agent writing letters to creditor acknowledging debt and offering to pay smaller sum – Creditor bringing procedings for recovery of debt and seeking to rely on letters to defeat limitation defence – Whether letters inadmissible under without prejudice rule

Bradford & Bingley plc v Rashid .. .. HL 705

EXTRADITION – Evidence – Evidence not available at extradition hearing – Judge ordering extradition after extradition hearing – Test to be applied to determine whether to admit further evidence on appeal

Miklis v Deputy Prosecutor General of Lithuania .. .. DC 808

——Extradition hearing – Initial hearing – Identity of person arrested – Appropriate judge deciding issue of identity at initial hearing – Different judge at extradition hearing determining issue afresh – Whether judge at extradition hearing having jurisdiction to review finding of identity made at initial hearing

Hilali v Central Court of Criminal Proceedings No 5 of the National Court, Madrid .. .. DC 435

——Extradition order – Appeal – Notice of appeal – Permitted period for lodging notice of appeal being seven days starting with day on which order made – Extradition hearing in which extradition ordered concluding after six p m – Whether extradition order made on next business day

R (on the application of Amoako) v DPP .. .. Ouseley J 230

FAMILY PROCEEDINGS – Orders in family proceedings – Residence order – Shared residence order – Same sex couple – Children born to one partner by anonymous donor insemination – Significance of fact of parentage

Re G (children) (residence: same-sex partner) .. .. HL 241

HOUSING – Homeless person – Duty to provide accommodation for such period as housing authority considering would give him reasonable opportunity of securing accommodation for his occupation – Whether authority entitled to have regard to considerations other than individual situation in determining what amounted to reasonable opportunity of securing accommodation for occupation

R (on the application of Conville) v Richmond upon Thames London BC .. CA 917

INCOME TAX – Pay as you earn system – Money paid by one person under compulsion of law – Employer accounting for tax and national insurance under PAYE system on exercise of share options by former employee – Whether amount of tax and national insurance paid recoverable in quasi contract

McCarthy v McCarthy & Stone plc .. .. Peter Smith J 1127

INJUNCTION – Interlocutory – Undertaking as to damages – Cross-undertaking as to damages – Enforcement of undertaking – By whom and for whose benefit undertaking enforceable – Restitution – Claim in restitution by members of group not subjects of interim undertaking – Whether claim in restitution existing

SmithKline Beecham plc v Apotex Europe Ltd .. .. CA 1078

LANDLORD AND TENANT – Assignment of lease – Implied covenant – Indemnity for unpaid rent – Reversioner claiming rent from original tenant after current tenant defaulting – Original tenant claiming under implied covenant – Whether original tenant liable for rent – Whether notice of liability valid – Whether notice served within specified period of date when rent became due

Scottish & Newcastle plc v Raguz .. .. Hart J 524

——Forfeiture of lease – Premises let as a dwelling – Lease of shop premises and residential flat – Landlord peaceably re-entering shop premises – Whether lease forfeit – Whether premises let as a dwelling – Meaning of 'let as a dwelling'

Patel v Pirabakaran .. .. CA 506

——Lease – Right to acquire new lease – Landlord intending to redevelop – Redevelopment of any premises in which tenant's flat contained – Whether 'any premises in which the tenant's flat is contained' referring to existing recognisable unit

Majorstake Ltd v Curtis .. .. CA 1326

——Recovery of possession – Order for possession – Secure tenancy – Suspended order for possession on conditions as to payment of arrears of rent – Whether date for possession having to appear on face of order – Appropriate form of order

Bristol City Council v Hassan .. .. CA 420

LIBEL AND SLANDER – Damages – Offer to make amends – Compensation determined on same principles as damages in defamation proceedings – Mitigation of damages – Evidence relevant to the damage caused

Turner v News Group Newspapers Ltd .. .. CA 613

——Parties – Right to sue – Corporation – Foreign corporation – Right to freedom of expression – Common law presumption of damage under English law once publication of libel established – Whether right to freedom of expression modifying common law presumption in relation to foreign corporation

Jameel v Wall Street Journal Europe SPRL . .. . HL 1279

——Qualified privilege – Common law privilege – Duty to publish – Public interest – Whether exercise of responsible journalism equating to test for qualified privilege

Jameel v Wall Street Journal Europe SPRL . .. . HL 1279

LIMITATION OF ACTION – Accrual of cause of action – Claim to personal estate of deceased person or to any share or interest in any such estate – Date on which the right to receive the share or interest accruing

Re Loftus (decd) .. .. CA 1110

LIMITATION OF ACTION (CONT'D) – Acknowledgment – Debt – Whether acknowledgments confined to admissions of debts which were indisputable as to quantum as well as liability

Bradford & Bingley plc v Rashid .. .. HL 705

LOCAL AUTHORITY – Land – Housing – Right to respect for private and family life – Tenants of housing trust occupying properties owned by local authority and leased to housing trust – Gipsies occupying local authority land without licence or consent – Local authorities seeking possession orders – Whether breach of right to respect for private and family life

Lambeth London BC v Kay . .. . HL 128

MARRIAGE – Right to marry – Requirement for persons subject to immigration control wishing to marry other than according to rites of Church of England to obtain written permission of Secretary of State – Secretary of State refusing permission to person present in United Kingdom unlawfully – Whether breach of right to marry – Whether discriminatory

R (on the application of Baiai) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (No 2) .. .. Silber J 555

MENTAL HEALTH – Mental health review tribunal – Discharge of restricted patient – Applicant applying for discharge of restriction order – Medical evidence – Statute requiring tribunal to discharge patient if not satisfied as to statutory criteria – Applicable standard of proof

R (on the application of N) v Mental Health Review Tribunal (Northern Region) .. .. CA 194

——Patient – Seclusion – Prohibition of inhuman or degrading treatment – Right to respect for private and family life – Code of practice issued by Secretary of State in relation to admission and medical treatment of patients suffering from mental disorder – Code of practice requiring hospitals to have written guidelines on use of seclusion – High security hospital's policy set out in guidelines differing from code of practice – Whether policy unlawful – Whether policy breaching prohibition of inhuman or degrading treatment – Whether policy breaching right to respect for private and family life

R (on the application of Munjaz) v Mersey Care NHS Trust .. .. .. HL 736

NEGLIGENCE – Cause of action – Damage – Negligent exposure of employees by employers to asbestos – Employees developing pleural plaques – Employees at risk of asbestos related diseases – Employees suffering anxiety or depressive illness – Whether cause of action could be founded by aggregating heads of claim – Whether employers owing duty of care not to expose employees to risk of psychiatric injury as consequence of anxiety about future health

Rothwell v Chemical & Insulating Co Ltd .. .. CA 1161

——Duty to take care – Defendant publishing hydrogeological report on water samples from Bangladesh – Implied statement in report as to absence of arsenic – Claimant seeking to recover damages for personal injury caused by drinking water contaminated by arsenic – Whether defendant owing duty of care to claimant

Sutradhar v Natural Environment Research Council .. .. HL 490

OPTION – Option to purchase – Shares – Construction of scheme rules – Remedy for unlawful decision under scheme rules

McCarthy v McCarthy & Stone plc .. .. Peter Smith J 1127

PLEADING – Striking out – Defendant making pre-action admission – Defendant withdrawing pre-action admission and filing defence – Claimant applying to strike out defence as abuse of process or likely to obstruct just disposal of proceedings – Applicable test

Walley v Stoke-on-Trent City Council .. .. CA 1230

POLICE – Powers – Searching for articles of a kind which could be used in connection with terrorism – Senior police officer issuing authorisation – Secretary of State confirming authorisation – Whether authorisation and confirmation lawful – Whether exercise of search powers lawful

R (on the application of Gillan) v Metropolitan Police Comr .. .. .. HL 1041

PRACTICE – Pre-trial or post judgment relief – Search order – Privilege against self-incrimination – Material constituting freestanding evidence which had not been created by respondent to search order under compulsion – Whether privileged at common law – Whether court having power to modify application of common law privilege

C plc v P (Secretary of State for the Home Office intervening) Evans-Lombe J 311

PRECEDENT – House of Lords – Decision of European Court of Human Rights inconsistent with previous decision of the House – Whether appropriate for House of Lords to depart from previous decision of the House

Lambeth London BC v Kay . .. . HL 128

PRISONS – Release on licence – Life sentence – Right to liberty and security – Statutory scheme for recall of life prisoners while on licence – Whether statutory scheme compatible with right to liberty and security

R (on the application of Hirst) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept .. CA 639

PROBATE – Costs – Discontinuance – Claimant commencing probate action – Claimant subsequently applying to discontinue action – Incidence of costs on discontinuance

Re Wylde (decd). .. .. George Bompas QC 345

PROCEEDS OF CRIME – Knowledge or suspicion of arrangement facilitating acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property – Bank forming relevant suspicion in relation to customer's account – Bank refusing to carry out customer's instructions – Whether customer entitled to mandatory injunction – Meaning of 'suspect' – Whether evidence of suspicion required to be adduced

K Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc .. .. CA 907

SENTENCE – Custodial sentence – Whether sentence of imprisonment for public protection capable of being ordered to run consecutively to another sentence of imprisonment for public protection – Whether sentence of imprisonment for public protection capable of being ordered to run consecutively to period of return to prison where offence committed during original sentence – Guidance

R v O'Brien .. .. CA 1012

SOLICITOR – Negligence – Damages – Assessment of damages – Cost of cure

Fulham Leisure Holdings Ltd v Nicholson Graham & Jones (a firm) (No 2) (Note) .. .. Mann J 1397

STATUTE – Construction – Anomalies – Correction of obvious drafting error – Statute abolishing sections containing offence in previous statute before implementing sections in new statute recreating repealed offences – Whether permissible for court to use interpretive powers to achieve clear intention of legislation

R (on the application of the CPS) v Bow Street Magistrates' Court . .. DC 1342

STATUTORY INSTRUMENT – Power to make instrument – Preamble – General enabling words in preamble – Interpretation and effect of general enabling words – Whether general enabling words could be interpreted as referring to enabling power not expressly invoked

Vibixa Ltd v Komori UK Ltd .. .. CA 294

STREET TRADING – Offence – Displaying for sale notice in private vehicle – Private vehicle parked in road – Test for determining whether statutory defence satisfied

Onasanya v Newham London BC .. .. DC 459

VICARIOUS LIABILITY – Employer and employee – Prohibited act by employee – Statutory prohibition – Harassment – Whether employer vicariously liable for harassment committed by employee in course of employment in breach of statutory prohibition

Majrowski v Guy's and St Thomas's NHS Trust .. .. HL 395

House of Lords petitions

This list, which covers the period 10 October 2006 to 6 December 2006, sets out all cases which have formed the subject of a report in the All England Law Reports in which an Appeal Committee of the House of Lords has, subsequent to the publication of that report, refused leave to appeal. Where the result of a petition for leave to appeal was known prior to the publication of the relevant report a note of that result appears at the end of the report.

Flora v Wakom (Heathrow) Ltd [2006] 4 All ER 982. Leave to appeal refused 6 December 2006 (Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, Lord Hoffmann and Lord Mance).

Forbes v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2006] 4 All ER 799. Leave to appeal refused 22 November 2006 (Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Lord Rodger of Earlsferry and Lord Carswell).

Harding v Wealands

[2006] UKHL 32

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD WOOLF, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY AND LORD CARSWELL

2–4 MAY, 5 JULY 2006

Conflict of laws – Tort – Damages – Assessment – Proper law of tort law of New South Wales – Whether provisions of New South Wales statute restricting allowable damages applicable – Whether statutory provisions substantive – International Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1995, s 14(3).

The claimant was English and the defendant was Australian. They were together on holiday in New South Wales when the claimant was injured in a motor accident. The circumstances were that the claimant had been a passenger in a vehicle driven by the defendant. The vehicle belonged to the defendant and was insured with an Australian insurance company. After the accident the claimant and the defendant returned to England. The claimant brought an action for damages for personal injury. The relevant Australian law was contained in the Motor Accidents Compensation Act 1999 of New South Wales (the MACA) which limited the amounts which could be recovered in damages. Liability was conceded and trial of a preliminary issue was ordered as to the assessment of damages and the 'applicable law' selected in accordance with the rules in Pt III of the Private International Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1995. Part III of the 1995 Act abolished the common law rules of double actionability and provided rules for the choice of the applicable law in questions of private international law. Once the applicable law had been chosen it was to be used to determine the issues arising in a claim. Section 14(2)[a] provided that nothing in Pt III affected any rules of law except those abolished and sub-s (3)(b), without prejudice to the generality of sub-s (2), provided, inter alia, that nothing in Pt III 'authorises questions of procedure in any proceedings to be determined otherwise than in accordance with the law of the forum'. The judge held that English law, not the MACA, applied to the assessment of damages as the assessment of damages was a matter of procedure and so governed by the law of the forum. The Court of Appeal allowed the defendant's appeal, holding that the restrictions in the MACA were not procedural but substantive law. The claimant appealed to the House of Lords.

a Section 14, so far as material, is set out at [31], below

Held – The amount of damages for an injury actionable by the applicable law had to be determined according to the law of the forum in accordance with s 14(3)(b) of the 1995 Act because the question was one of procedure. In Pt III of the 1995 Act Parliament had not enacted a comprehensive scheme and a number of exceptions. The common law distinction between questions of liability and questions of remedy or procedure had been unaffected by Pt III. Part III had abolished the requirement of double actionability and the exceptions to that rule; it had substituted a general rule as to the applicable law and provided for the displacement of that general rule where it was substantially more appropriate for the applicable law to be different. But s 14 provided that nothing in Pt III affected any rules of law other than those abolished and although s 14(3)(b) referred only to 'questions of procedure' as being not authorised to be determined otherwise than in accordance with the law of the forum that did not mean that the common law rule that remedies were a matter for the law of the forum was to be abolished and the rule preserved only so far as it related to questions which could strictly speaking be regarded as procedure. In that context 'remedy' and 'procedure' had been regularly used interchangeably. When Parliament had legislated it was generally understood that for the purposes of private international law questions as to the quantification of damages for actionable heads of claim related to the remedy and so were classified as procedural. There was no basis on which altering that interpretation could be justified. The relevant provisions of the MACA were to be characterised as procedural for the purposes of s 14(3)(b) of the 1995 Act and therefore inapplicable by an English court. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [1], [2], [12], [13], [31]–[33], [39], [42], [48], [51], [53], [58], [60], [63]–[66], [69], [72], [77]–[79], [84], below).

Chaplin v Boys [1969] 2 All ER 1085, Stevens v Head (1993) 112 ALR 7, John Pfeiffer Pty Ltd v Rogerson (2000) 172 ALR 625 and Roerig v Valiant Trawlers Ltd [2002] 1 All ER 961 considered.

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2005] 1 All ER 415 reversed.

Notes

For the law covering procedural matters: damages, see 8(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 22.

For the Private International Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1995, s 14, see 45 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2003 reissue) 1856.

Cases referred to in opinions

Adams v Cape Industries plc [1991] 1 All ER 929, [1990] Ch 433, [1990] 2 WLR 657, CA.

Black-Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG [1975] 1 All ER 810, [1975] AC 591, [1975] 2 WLR 513, HL.

Caltex Singapore Pte Ltd v BP Shipping Ltd [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep 286.

Chaplin v Boys [1969] 2 All ER 1085, [1971] AC 356, [1969] 3 WLR 322, HL.

Cope v Doherty (1858) 2 De G & J 614, CA; affg (1858) 4 K & J 367.

De La Vega v Vianna (1830) 1 B & Ad 284, 109 ER 792.

Don v Lippmann (1837) 5 Cl & Fin 1, 7 ER 303, HL.

Huber v Steiner (1835) 2 Bing NC 203, 132 ER 80.

Lowsley v Forbes (t/a LE Design Services) [1998] 3 All ER 897, [1999] 1 AC 329, [1998] 3 WLR 501, HL.

Machado v Fontes [1897] 2 QB 231, [1895–9] All ER Rep Ext 1832, CA.

McKain v RW Miller & Co (SA) Pty Ltd (1991) 104 ALR 257, (1991) 174 CLR 1, Aus HC.

Mitchell v McCulloch 1976 SC 1, Ct of Sess.

Panozza (Allan J) & Co Pty Ltd v Allied Interstate (Qld) Pty Ltd [1976] 2 NSWLR 192, NSW CA.

Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593, [1992] 3 WLR 1032, HL.

Pfeiffer (John) Pty Ltd v Rogerson (2000) 172 ALR 625, (2000) 203 CLR 503, Aus HC.

Phillips v Eyre (1870) LR 6 QB 1.

Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] 1 All ER 556, [1980] AC 827, [1980] 2 WLR 283, HL.

R v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, ex p Spath Holme Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 195, [2001] 2 AC 349, [2001] 2 WLR 15, HL.

R (on the application of Jackson) v A-G [2005] UKHL 56, [2005] 4 All ER 1253, [2006] 1 AC 262, [2005] 3 WLR 733.

Red Sea Insurance Co Ltd v Bouygues SA [1994] 3 All ER 749, [1995] 1 AC 190, [1994] 3 WLR 926, PC.

Regie National des Usines Renault SA v Zhang (2002) 187 ALR 1, (2002) 210 CLR 491, Aus HC.

Robinson v Bland (1760) 2 Burr 1077, 97 ER 717.

Roerig v Valiant Trawlers Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 21, [2002] 1 All ER 961, [2002] 1 WLR 2304.

Royal College of Nursing of the United Kingdom v Department of Health and Social Security [1981] 1 All ER 545, [1981] AC 800, [1981] 2 WLR 279, HL.

Stevens v Head (1993) 112 ALR 7, (1993) 176 CLR 433, Aus HC.

Tolofson v Jensen, Lucas v Gagnon (1994) 120 DLR (4th) 289, Can SC.

Western Regent, The, Seismic Shipping Inc v Total E & P UK plc [2005] EWCA Civ 985, [2005] 2 All ER (Comm) 515.

Wilson v First County Trust Ltd [2003] UKHL 40, [2003] 4 All ER 97, [2004] 1 AC 816, [2003] 3 WLR 568.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Abidin Daver, The [1984] 1 All ER 470, [1984] AC 398, [1984] 2 WLR 196, HL.

Amalia, The (1863) 2 Moo PCCNS 471.

Amor v Macpak Pty Ltd (1989) 95 FLR 10, NSW SC.

Anderson v Eric Anderson Radio & TV Pty Ltd [1966] ALR 423, (1965) 114 CLR 20, Aus HC.

Aries Tanker Corp v Total Transport Ltd, The Aries [1977] 1 All ER 398, [1977] 1 WLR 185, HL.

Assicurazioni General SpA v Arab Insurance Group (BSC) [2002] EWCA Civ 1642, [2003] 1 All ER (Comm) 140, [2003] 1 WLR 577.

Baschet v London Illustrated Standard Co [1900] 1 Ch 73.

Biogen Inc v Medeva plc (1996) 38 BMLR 149, HL.

Boys v Chaplin [1968] 1 All ER 283, [1968] 2 QB 1, [1968] 2 WLR 328, CA.

Breavington v Godleman (1988) 80 ALR 362, (1988) 169 CLR 41, Aus HC.

Chief Adjudication Officer v Foster [1993] 1 All ER 705, [1993] AC 754, [1993] 2 WLR 292, HL.

Computers (OT) (in administration), Re [2004] EWCA Civ 653, [2004] 2 All ER (Comm) 331, [2004] Ch 317, [2004] 3 WLR 886.
Cooke v United Bristol Healthcare NHS Trust, Sheppard v Stibbe, Page v Lee [2003] EWCA Civ 1370, [2004] 1 All ER 797, [2004] 1 WLR 251.
Cookson v Knowles [1978] 2 All ER 604, [1979] AC 556, [1978] 2 WLR 978, HL.
Coupland v Arabian Gulf Petroleum Co [1983] 3 All ER 226, [1983] 1 WLR 1136, CA.
D'Almeida Araujo (J) Lda v Sir Frederick Becker & Co Ltd [1953] 2 All ER 288, [1953] 2 QB 329, [1953] 3 WLR 57.
Davidsson v Hill [1901] 2 KB 606, DC.
Edmunds v Simmonds [2001] 1 WLR 1003.
Esso Malaysia, The, Cox v The Esso Malaysia (Owners) [1974] 2 All ER 705, [1975] 1 QB 198, [1974] 3 WLR 341.
General Iron Screw Collier Co v Schurmanns (1860) 1 John & H 180.
Giambrone v JMC Holidays Ltd (formerly Sunworld Holidays Ltd) (No 2) [2004] EWCA Civ 158, [2004] 2 All ER 891.
Grayan Building Services Ltd (in liq), Re [1995] 1 BCLC 276, [1995] Ch 241, [1995] 3 WLR 1, CA.
Hadmor Productions Ltd v Hamilton [1982] 1 All ER 1042, [1983] 1 AC 191, [1982] 2 WLR 322, HL.
Hamlyn & Co v Talisker Distillery [1894] AC 202, [1891–4] All ER Rep 849, HL.
Hansen v Dixon (1906) 23 TLR 56.
Happy Fellow, The [1997] 1 Lloyd's Rep 130.
Heil v Rankin [2000] 3 All ER 138, [2001] QB 272, [2000] 2 WLR 1173, CA.
Helmsing Schiffahrts GmbH & Co KG v Malta Drydocks Corp [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep 444.
Hulse v Chambers [2002] 1 All ER (Comm) 812, [2001] 1 WLR 2386.
Hunt v Severs [1994] 2 All ER 385, [1994] 2 AC 350, [1994] 2 WLR 602, HL.
Jefford v Gee [1970] 1 All ER 1202, [1970] 2 QB 10, [1970] 2 WLR 702, CA.
John v MGN Ltd [1996] 2 All ER 35, [1997] QB 586, [1996] 3 WLR 593, CA.
Kohnke v Karger [1951] 2 All ER 179, [1951] 2 KB 670.
Koop v Bebb [1952] ALR 37, (1951) 84 CLR 629, Aus HC.
Kuwait Oil Tanker Co SAK v Al Bader [2000] 2 All ER (Comm) 271, CA.
Liverpool, Brazil and River Plate Steam Navigation Co Ltd v Benham, The Halley (1868) LR 2 PC 193, PC.
Livesley v Horst [1925] 1 DLR 159, Can SC.
M'Elroy v M'Allister 1949 SC 110, Ct of Sess.
Matthews v Ministry of Defence [2003] UKHL 4, [2003] 1 All ER 689, [2003] 1 AC 1163, [2003] 2 WLR 435; affg [2002] EWCA Civ 773, [2002] 3 All ER 513, [2002] 1 WLR 2621.
Norowzian v Arks Ltd (No 2) [1999] IP & T 223, [2000] FSR 363, CA.
Owusu v Jackson (t/a Cilla Holidays Bal-Inn Villas) [2005] 2 All ER (Comm) 577, [2005] QB 801, [2005] 2 WLR 942, ECJ.
Pickett v British Rail Engineering Ltd [1979] 1 All ER 774, [1980] AC 136, [1978] 3 WLR 955, HL.
Pozniak v Smith (1982) 41 ALR 353, (1982) 151 CLR 38, Aus HC.
Pro Sieben Media AG v Carlton UK Television Ltd [1999] 1 WLR 605, CA.
R (on the application of Westminster City Council) v National Asylum Support Service [2002] UKHL 38, [2002] 4 All ER 654, [2002] 1 WLR 2956.
R v Warwickshire CC, ex p Johnson [1993] 1 All ER 299, [1993] AC 583, [1993] 2 WLR 1, HL.
Somers v Fournier (2002) 214 DLR (4th) 611, Ont CA.

South Cone Inc v Bessant (t/a Reef) [2002] EWCA Civ 763, [2003] RPC 101.
Spiliada Maritime Corp v Cansulex Ltd, The Spiliada [1986] 3 All ER 843, [1987] AC 460, [1987] 3 WLR 972, HL.
Stubbings v Webb [1993] 1 All ER 322, [1993] AC 498, [1993] 2 WLR 120, HL.
T & N Ltd, Re [2005] EWHC 2990 (Ch), [2006] 3 All ER 755, [2006] 1 WLR 1792.
Todorovic v Waller (1981) 37 ALR 481, (1981) 150 CLR 402, Aus HC.
Warriner v Warriner [2002] EWCA Civ 81, [2003] 3 All ER 447, [2002] 1 WLR 1703.
Wells v Wells [1998] 3 All ER 481, [1999] 1 AC 345, [1998] 3 WLR 329, HL.
Wild Ranger, The (1862) Lush 553.
Wong v Wei (1999) 10 WWR 296, BC SC.
Zollverein, The (1856) Sw 96.

Appeal

Giles Christian Harding appealed with permission of the Court of Appeal from its decision on 17 December 2004 (Arden LJ and Sir William Aldous, Waller LJ dissenting) ([2004] EWCA Civ 1735, [2005] 1 All ER 415) allowing the appeal of Tanya Wealands from the decision of Elias J on 27 May 2004 ([2004] EWHC 1957 (QB), [2004] All ER (D) 428 (May)) on a preliminary issue as to the applicable law under ss 11, 12, 14 of the International Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1995 in relation to the assessment of damages in an action for damages for personal injury brought by Mr Harding against Ms Wealands. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hoffmann.

Charles Haddon-Cave QC and Michael McParland (instructed by Stewarts) for the appellant.
Howard Palmer QC and Charles Dougherty (instructed by Kennedys) for the defendant.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

5 July 2006. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, I am in full agreement with the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Hoffmann and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry, which I have had the advantage of reading in draft. For the reasons which they give, I also would allow the appeal and restore the order of Elias J.

LORD WOOLF.

[2] My Lords, I am able to confine my opinion to a single issue because I agree with the opinions of Lord Hoffmann and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry which I have read in draft.

[3] I have also had the advantage of reading the opinion of Lord Carswell in draft. While Lord Carswell agrees with Lord Hoffmann's and Lord Rodger's 'reasons' and 'conclusions', he does so subject to 'one slight qualification' (see [79], below).

[4] Lord Carswell makes his qualification because of his understanding of what is the natural meaning of the word 'procedure' (see [83], below). As to this, Lord Carswell is in agreement with the judgments of Arden LJ and Sir William Aldous in the Court of Appeal (see [2004] EWCA Civ 1735, [2005] 1 All ER 415, [2005] 1 WLR 1539). Arden LJ accepted (at [58]) that 'Damages are not naturally regarded as procedure' and Sir William suggests (at [86]) that the natural meaning of 'procedure' is 'the mode or rules used to govern and regulate the conduct of the court's proceedings'. Lord Carswell adds, however, that in the field of private international law the word 'procedure' has a 'special meaning' which is wider than that which might be regarded as 'natural' (see [83], below). a

[5] Lord Carswell, having adopted this approach to the natural meaning of procedure, treats the 'special meaning' as justifying reliance on Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593 to resolve the significant issue of construction at the heart of this appeal. b

[6] I am in agreement with Lord Carswell that, if it is necessary to rely on Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart to decide the meaning of 'procedure' in s 14(3)(b) of the Private International Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1995, the evidence of what was said in Parliament by the then Lord Chancellor conclusively resolves this issue in the appellant's favour. Lord Carswell rightly points out that this is an outstanding example of a case where the evidence as to what was said during the passage of the legislation through the parliamentary process makes it abundantly clear that it was the intention of Parliament by enacting s 14(3)(b) that the law of this country and not that of New South Wales is to be applied by the courts of this jurisdiction to the calculation of the appellant's damages. This is despite the fact that the appellant's accident occurred and his injuries were caused as the result of negligence of the respondent in New South Wales. c d

[7] However, I unfortunately differ from Lord Carswell as to his reasoning for relying on Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart. The word 'procedure' is frequently used in contrast to 'substance' in order to distinguish between questions of procedural law and substantive law. Thus, unsurprisingly it is used together with the word 'practice' in this context in s 1 of and Sch 1 to the Civil Procedure Act 1997 to identify the scope of the CPR. The scope of the language is wide enough to encompass the contents of a civil procedure code which deals with evidence and remedies. e f

[8] In determining the meaning of the word 'procedure' the context in which the word is being used is of the greatest significance. In s 14(3)(b) of the 1995 Act 'procedure' is used in conjunction with 'rules of evidence, pleading or practice'. In that context it is natural to regard the assessment of damages as being a matter of procedure rather than substance. g

[9] The fact that the present context is one in the field of conflicts of law does not mean that 'procedure' is being used in a special sense rather than in the sense in which you would expect it to be used having regard to the context in which it appears. It makes good practical sense to draw a distinction between the treatment of questions of procedure and questions of substance; the former to be dealt, as you would expect in accordance with the procedure normally applied by the court in which the proceedings are brought. h

[10] This does not however mean that a cap on the amount of damages is obviously a question of procedure rather than a question of substance and if I had been left in doubt as to the correct answer I would certainly have been prepared to apply Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart. j

[11] The limits on the amount of damages on which the respondent seeks to rely are contained in the Motor Accidents Compensation Act 1999 of New South Wales. That Act contains in Chs 3, 4, 5 and 6 a detailed statutory procedural code containing the machinery for recovering compensation for motor accident injuries, including the way damages are to be assessed. The code is clearly one that has provisions which it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to apply in proceedings brought in this country, even though they may be capable of being applied in other parts of Australia. To have different parts of that code dealt with by different systems of law would not be an attractive result and in some cases this would produce an impractical result. (See for example s 132 which requires, in the case of a dispute over non-economic loss, for the degree of impairment to be assessed by a medical assessor in New South Wales.) The greater part of the code is clearly procedural and those parts which could be arguably regarded as substantive should be treated as being procedural as well.

[12] For these reasons, as well as those given by Lord Hoffmann and Lord Rodger, I would allow this appeal and restore the judgment of Elias J.

LORD HOFFMANN.

[13] My Lords, the issue is whether damages for personal injury caused by negligent driving in New South Wales should be calculated according to the applicable law selected in accordance with Pt III of the Private International Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1995 (hereafter 'Pt III') or whether it is a question of procedure which falls to be determined in accordance with English law. The Court of Appeal, by a majority ([2004] EWCA Civ 1735, [2005] 1 All ER 415, [2005] 1 WLR 1539: Arden LJ and Sir William Aldous, Waller LJ dissenting) held that it should be determined in accordance with the applicable law, which they decided was the law of New South Wales. In my opinion the dissenting opinion of Waller LJ was correct and the question is one of procedure governed by the law of the forum. I also agree with the speech to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Rodger of Earlsferry, which I have had the advantage of reading in draft.

[14] The accident happened on 3 February 2002 on a dirt track near Huskisson in New South Wales, when the respondent Ms Wealand lost control of the vehicle she was driving and it turned over. Negligence is admitted. The appellant Mr Harding, who was a passenger, was severely injured and is now tetraplegic. Mr Harding is English and Ms Wealand Australian. They had formed a relationship when Mr Harding visited Australia in March 2001 and in consequence Ms Wealand had come to England in June 2001 to live with Mr Harding. At the time of the accident they had gone together to Australia for a holiday and a visit to Ms Wealand's parents. The vehicle belonged to Ms Wealand and she was insured with an Australian insurance company. After the accident, Mr Harding and Ms Wealand returned to England.

[15] The action was tried by Elias J (see [2004] EWHC 1957 (QB), [2004] All ER (D) 428 (May)), who applied English law to the assessment of damages for two reasons. First, because the assessment of damages was a matter of procedure governed by the lex fori and secondly, because even if it was a matter of substantive law, it was in this case 'substantially more appropriate' to apply English law (see s 12 of Pt III). The Court of Appeal, as I have said, allowed the appeal on the first point by a majority and allowed it unanimously on the second. I shall first address the question of substance and procedure.

[16] Personal injury caused by negligence is an actionable wrong in Australian common law. In New South Wales, common law liability for transport accidents was briefly abolished by the Transport Accidents Compensation Act 1987 (New South Wales) and a statutory scheme of compensation substituted but the Motor Accidents Act 1988 (New South Wales) repealed the 1987 Act and s 6 reinstated the common law:

> 'The law relating to a right to or a claim for damages or compensation or any other benefit (pecuniary or non-pecuniary) against any person for or in respect of the death of or bodily injury to a person caused by or arising out of a transport accident . . . shall be as if the [1987 Act] had not been passed and the common law and the enacted law (except that Act) shall have effect accordingly.'

[17] The 1988 Act did however contain detailed provisions concerning awards of damages for injuries suffered in motor accidents. These have been replaced by Ch 5 of the Motor Accidents Compensation Act 1999 (hereafter 'MACA'), which was in force at the time of the accident. Section 123 provides that 'A court cannot award damages to a person in respect of a motor accident contrary to this Chapter'. The provisions of Ch 5 which would have been relevant to an award of damages by a court in New South Wales are: (a) the maximum recoverable for non-economic loss (pain and suffering, loss of amenities of life, loss of expectation of life, disfigurement) is $A309,000 subject to indexation (see s 134); (b) in assessing loss of earnings, an excess of net weekly earnings over $A2,500 must be disregarded (see s 125); (c) there is no award for the loss of the first five days of earning capacity (see s 124); (d) no award may be made for gratuitous care which does not exceed six hours a week and is for less than six months and the amount recoverable for care exceeding these minima is limited to sums specified in s 128; (e) the discount rate for calculating the present value of future economic loss is prescribed as 5% (see s 127); (f) credit must be given for payments made to the claimant by 'an insurer' (see s 130); (g) no interest is payable on damages for gratuitous care or non-economic loss and entitlement to interest on other damages is subject to conditions, principally relating to the timely provision of information by the claimant (see s 137).

[18] None of these provisions forms part of English law. Perhaps the most striking difference is the 5% discount rate, compared with the 2·5% rate set by the Lord Chancellor under the Damages (Personal Injury) Order 2001, SI 2001/2301 pursuant to his power under s 1 of the Damages Act 1996 as the rate appropriate to ensure that the claimant is fully compensated. The claimant says that under the provisions of MACA he would recover about 30% less than he would under English law.

[19] Until Pt III was enacted, the English common law rule for determining whether damage caused by acts committed abroad was actionable in tort was that laid down by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Phillips v Eyre (1870) LR 6 QB 1 at 28–29:

> 'As a general rule, in order to found a suit in England for a wrong alleged to have been committed abroad, two conditions must be fulfilled. First, the wrong must be of such a character that it would have been actionable if committed in England . . . Secondly, the act must not have been justifiable by the law of the place where it was done.'

[20] I observe in passing that, since the common law of Australia is on this point the same as the law of England, there is no doubt that the damage suffered by Mr Harding would have satisfied this double actionability test. But Willes J, giving the judgment of the court, went on to say (at 29): 'the law is clear that, if the foreign law touches only the remedy or procedure for enforcing the obligation . . . such law is no bar to an action in this country . . .'

[21] What distinction was Willes J seeking to draw by saying that the foreign law would not affect an action in this country if it touched 'only the remedy or procedure'? He referred to Huber v Steiner (1835) 2 Bing NC 203, 132 ER 80, which concerned an action brought in 1835 on a French promissory note made in 1813 and payable in 1817. The defendant pleaded that by French law an action upon the note was prescribed but Tindal CJ held that, upon its true construction, the French law did not extinguish the debt but only barred the creditor from obtaining a remedy. It was therefore a matter of French procedure which an English court would disregard. Conversely, Don v Lippmann (1837) 5 Cl & Fin 1, 7 ER 303 was an action brought in Scotland in 1829 on two French bills of exchange accepted in 1810. The House of Lords held the defendant entitled to rely on the Scottish six-year period of prescription because, as Lord Brougham said ((1837) 5 Cl & Fin 1 at 13, 7 ER 303 at 307): 'whatever relates to the remedy to be enforced, must be determined by the lex fori, the law of the country to the tribunals of which the appeal is made.'

[22] Lord Brougham in turn referred to De La Vega v Vianna (1830) 1 B & Ad 284, 109 ER 792 in which the plaintiff, a Spaniard, had the defendant, a Portuguese, arrested in England for non-payment of a debt contracted in Portugal. The defendant claimed to be released on the ground that in Portugal imprisonment for debt had been abolished in 1774. Lord Tenterden CJ ((1830) 1 B & Ad 284 at 288, 109 ER 792 at 793) was unmoved:

> 'A person suing in this country must take the law as he finds it; he cannot, by virtue of any regulation in his own country, enjoy greater advantages than other suitors here, and he ought not therefore to be deprived of any superior advantage which the law of this country may confer. He is to have the same rights which all the subjects of this kingdom are entitled to.'

[23] An even earlier case touching upon the same distinction between the cause of action and the remedy is Robinson v Bland (1760) 2 Burr 1077, 97 ER 717, an action upon a bill of exchange given in Paris in payment of gaming debts. By English law the debt was unenforceable but the plaintiff alleged that in France the debt could be enforced in a Court of Honour. Wilmot J said ((1760) 2 Burr 1077 at 1084, 97 ER 717 at 721: 'I cannot help thinking, that where a person appeals to the law of England, he must take his remedy according to the law of England, to which he has appealed.'

[24] In applying this distinction to actions in tort, the courts have distinguished between the kind of damage which constitutes an actionable injury and the assessment of compensation (ie damages) for the injury which has been held to be actionable. The identification of actionable damage is an integral part of the rules which determine liability. As I have previously had occasion to say, it makes no sense simply to say that someone is liable in tort. He must be liable for something and the rules which determine what he is liable for are inseparable from the rules which determine the conduct which gives rise to liability. Thus the rules which exclude damage from the scope of liability on the grounds that it does not fall within the ambit of the liability rule or does not have the prescribed causal connection with the wrongful act, or which require that the damage should have been reasonably foreseeable, are all rules which determine whether there is liability for the damage in question. On the other hand, whether the claimant is awarded money damages (and if so, how much) or, for example, restitution in kind, is a question of remedy.

[25] This was the distinction made by the House of Lords in Chaplin v Boys [1969] 2 All ER 1085, [1971] AC 356, in which the plaintiff had been injured in a traffic accident in Malta. By the law of Malta, non-economic damage (pain and suffering, loss of amenity) was not actionable. Only financial loss was compensatable. The plaintiff brought proceedings in England and one of the questions raised by the appeal was whether the rule excluding liability for non-economic damage was part of the substantive law of Malta or concerned only the remedies which a Maltese court could provide.

[26] Lord Hodson, Lord Wilberforce and Lord Pearson agreed that the rule was part of the substantive law of tort liability. In Malta, causing non-economic damage was not an injuria; not an actionable wrong. Lord Hodson said ([1969] 2 All ER 1085 at 1903, [1971] AC 356 at 379):

> 'questions such as whether loss of earning capacity or pain and suffering are admissible heads of damage must be questions of substantive law. The law relating to damages is partly procedural and partly substantive, the actual quantification under the relevant heads being procedural only.'

[27] Lord Wilberforce said ([1969] 2 All ER 1085 at 1102, [1971] AC 356 at 389):

> 'The broad principle should surely be that a person should not be permitted to claim in England in respect of a matter for which civil liability does not exist, or is excluded, under the law of the place where the wrong was committed. This non-existence of exclusion may be for a variety of reasons and it would be unwise to attempt a generalisation relevant to the variety of possible wrongs. But in relation to claims for personal injuries one may say that provisions of the lex delicti, denying, or limiting, or qualifying recovery of damages because of some relationship of the defendant to the plaintiff, or in respect of some interest of the plaintiff (such as loss of consortium) or some head of damage (such as pain and suffering) should be given effect to.'

[28] Lord Pearson said ([1969] 2 All ER 1085 at 1106, [1971] AC 356 at 394):

> 'If the difference between the English law and the Maltese law could be regarded only as a difference of procedural (or adjectival or non-substantive) law, there would be an easy solution of the problem in this appeal. On that basis the nature and extent of the remedy would be matters of procedural law regulated by the lex fori, which is English and the proper remedy for the plaintiff in this case according to English law would be that he should recover damages for all the relevant consequences of the accident, including pain and suffering as well as pecuniary expense and loss . . .
>
> But I am not convinced that the difference between the English law and the Maltese law can reasonably be regarded as only a difference of procedural law. There is a radical difference in the cause of action, the right of action, the jus actionis. A claim to be reimbursed or indemnified or compensated for actual economic loss is substantially different in character from a claim for damages for all the relevant consequences of the accident to the [plaintiff], including pain and suffering. If an accident caused no economic loss, but only pain and suffering, there would be a cause of action according to English law, but not according to Maltese law. Surely that must be a matter of substantive law.'

[29] On the other hand, Lord Guest said ([1969] 2 All ER 1085 at 1096, [1971] AC 356 at 382) that:

> 'It would not be correct, in my view, to talk of compensation for pain and suffering as a head of damage apart from patrimonial loss. It is merely an element in the quantification of the total compensation' —and Lord Donovan said ([1969] 2 All ER 1085 at 1097, [1971] AC 356 at 383) that once the claim was actionable in an English court, 'it was right that it should award its own remedies'.

[30] Thus the majority held that the Maltese law denying liability for non-economic damage was substantive law to be governed by the lex causae while the minority thought that it was a matter of remedy to be governed by the lex fori. All of them agreed that the quantification of the damages to be awarded for actionable heads of damage was a question of remedy or procedure.

[31] The next question is whether this distinction between questions of liability and questions of remedy or procedure was affected by Pt III. Section 10 abolishes the Phillips v Eyre (1870) LR 6 QB 1 requirement of double actionability 'for the purpose of determining whether a tort or delict is actionable' and the common law exceptions to that rule created by cases like Chaplin v Boys and Red Sea Insurance Co Ltd v Bouygues SA [1994] 3 All ER 749, [1995] 1 AC 190. Section 11 substitutes a 'general rule' that the applicable law is the 'law of the country in which the events constituting the tort or delict in question occur'. Section 12 provides for displacement of the general rule in certain cases in which it is 'substantially more appropriate' for the applicable law to be different. This was the provision applied by Elias J on his alternative hypothesis that the MACA restrictions were substantive. But s 14 provides:

> '. . . (2) Nothing in this Part affects any rules of law (including rules of private international law) except those abolished by section 10 above.
>
> (3) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (2) above, nothing in this Part . . . (b) affects any rules of evidence, pleading or practice or authorises questions of procedure in any proceedings to be determined otherwise than in accordance with the law of the forum . . .'

[32] It will be noticed that whereas the older cases spoke of questions of 'remedy' being governed by the lex fori and Willes J in Phillips v Eyre (1870) LR 6 QB 1 at 29 spoke of 'remedy or procedure', s 14(3)(b) refers only to 'procedure'. Does that mean that the old rule that remedies were a matter for the lex fori was to be abolished and the rule preserved only so far as it related to questions which could strictly speaking be regarded as procedure? In my opinion this would be absurd. In this context, the terms 'remedy' and 'procedure' had been regularly used interchangeably. Thus in Chaplin v Boys Lord Hodson said ([1969] 2 All ER 1085 at 1092, [1971] AC 356 at 378) that 'the nature of a plaintiff's remedy is a matter of procedure to be determined by the lex fori. This includes the quantification of damages . . .'. Lord Guest posed the question ([1969] 2 All ER 1085 at 1095, [1971] AC 356 at 381) as: 'Assuming that the conduct was actionable in Malta, what law is to be applied to the ascertainment of the damages? Is it to be the substantive law, the law of Malta, or is to be the procedural law which is the lex fori?'

[33] Furthermore, s 14(3) is expressed to be without prejudice to the generality of s 14(2), which says that nothing in Pt III is to affect any rules of law except those abolished by s 10. Section 10 is concerned with the rules which determine 'whether a tort . . . is actionable' and not with the rules concerning the remedies available for actionable injury. a [34] The conclusion that the amount of damages for an injury actionable by the lex causae must be determined according to the lex fori was to be left untouched is confirmed by the Report of the Law Commission and the Scottish Law Commission (Private International Law: Choice of Law in Tort and Delict (Law Com no 193, Scot Law Com no 129), published in 1990, on which Pt III was based. b Paragraph 3.38 (p 22) dealt with damages:

> 'The Consultation Paper [Law Commission Working Paper no 87 and Scottish Law Commission Consultative Memorandum no 62, which had been published in 1984] provisionally recommended that there should be no change in the present law on the question of damages, which we confirm. c Accordingly, the applicable law in tort or delict determines the question of the availability of particular heads of damages whereas the measure or quantification of damages under those heads is governed by the lex fori . . .'

[35] There are several statements in the Consultation Paper to the same effect, d which it is unnecessary to cite.

[36] Mr Haddon-Cave QC, who appeared for the appellant, said that if the House thought that the language of s 14(2) and (3) was ambiguous or obscure, it should resolve the ambiguity by reference to a statement made in Parliament by the Lord Chancellor during the passage of the bill. For my part, I do not think e that there is any ambiguity or obscurity. Of course, taken out of context, the word 'procedure' is ambiguous. In its narrow and perhaps most usual sense it means, as La Forest J expressed it in Tolofson v Jensen, Lucas v Gagnon (1994) 120 DLR (4th) 289 at 321 those rules which 'make the machinery of the forum court run smoothly as distinguished from those determinative of the rights of both parties'. Or it can have a wider meaning which embraces what Mason CJ in f Stevens v Head (1993) 112 ALR 7 at 14, (1993) 176 CLR 433 at 445 called 'the traditional equation drawn between matters relating to a remedy and matters of procedure'. This is the sense it which the term has always been used in English private international law. If s 14 is read in its context, against the background of the existing rules of common law and the report of the Law Commission, there g can be no doubt that the latter meaning was intended. For my part, therefore, I see no need for Mr Haddon-Cave to resort to Hansard.

[37] If, however, there had been any ambiguity which needed to be resolved, I am bound to say that this is as clear a case within the principle stated in Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593 as anyone could hope h to find. At the Report stage in the House of Lords, Lord Howie of Troon put down an amendment to add a further paragraph to what is now s 14(3), so that it would read '[nothing in this Part] (d) authorises any court of the forum to award damages other than in accordance with the law of the forum'. Lord Howie declared an interest on behalf of Cape Industries plc, which had a few years earlier been sued in Texas for asbestos-related injuries (see Adams v Cape Industries plc j [1991] 1 All ER 929, [1990] Ch 433) and was anxious that Pt III should not import American scales of compensation into English courts. In the debate on 27 March 1995 the Lord Chancellor, Lord Mackay of Clashfern, made what was obviously a carefully prepared statement (562 HL Official Report (5th series) cols 1421–1422):

'With regard to damages, issues relating to the quantum or measure of damages are at present and will continue under Part III to be governed by the law of the forum; in other words, by the law of one of the three jurisdictions in the United Kingdom. Issues of this kind are regarded as procedural and, as such, are covered by Clause 14(3) (b).

It follows from this that the kind of awards to which the noble Lord referred of damages made in certain states, in particular in parts of the United States, will not become a feature of our legal system by virtue of Part III. Our courts will continue to apply our own rules on quantum of damages even in the context of a tort case where the court decides that the "applicable law" should be some foreign system of law so far as concerns the merits of the claim.

Some aspects of the law of damages are not regarded as procedural and, in accordance with the views of the Law Commissions in their report on the subject, Part III does not alter this. These aspects concern so-called "heads of damages"—the basic matter which is being compensated for—such as special damage relating to direct financial loss. Whether a particular legal system permits such a head of damage is not regarded as procedural but substantive and therefore not automatically subject to the law of the forum. This seems right given the intimate connection between such a concept and the particular nature of the case in issue. But again, I foresee no significant increase in awards of damages because a particular head of damage permitted by some foreign system of law would continue, so far as the quantum allocated to it in any finding is concerned, to be regulated by our own domestic law of damages.

I hope the noble Lord will feel reassured . . .'

[38] Lord Howie declared himself reassured and did not move his amendment. The Lord Chancellor's statement clearly satisfied the requirements of being (a) clear and (b) made by the minister promoting the bill.

[39] My Lords, the next question is whether the provisions of MACA to which I have referred should be characterised as relating to the actionability of the economic and non-economic damage suffered by Mr Harding or to the remedies which the courts of New South Wales provide for such damage. On this point we could not have better authority than that of the High Court of Australia in Stevens v Head (1993) 112 ALR 7, (1993) 176 CLR 433. The majority (Brennan, Dawson, Toohey and McHugh JJ) analysed the equivalent damages-limitation provisions of the Motor Accidents Act 1988 ((1993) 112 ALR 7 at 21–26, (1993) 176 CLR 433 at 454–460), and concluded that they were concerned with quantification rather than heads of damage. Although MACA is more restrictive of the court's power to award damages than the 1988 Act, the character of the relevant provisions is in my opinion the same. Thus the majority said of s 79(3) of the 1988 Act, which provided that the maximum amount ('only in a most extreme case') which might be awarded for non-economic loss was $A 180,000:

> '[It] is plainly a provision which affects the measure of damages but does not touch the heads of liability in respect of which damages might be awarded. It is simply a law relating to the quantification of damages and that, as we have seen, is a matter governed solely by the lex fori.' (See (1993) 112 ALR 7 at 25, (1993) 176 CLR 433 at 459.)

[40] These extracts are from the opinion of the majority. But there is nothing in the dissenting judgments by Mason CJ and Deane and Gaudron JJ to suggest that, if they had accepted that the court should apply the traditional distinction between actionability and remedy, including quantification of damages, they would have disagreed with the way the majority characterised the provisions of the 1988 Act. It was the traditional distinction itself which the minority rejected. Thus Mason CJ proposed ((1993) 112 ALR 7 at 14, (1993) 176 CLR 433 at 445) that the court should adopt—

> 'a new criterion for the substance-procedure distinction which ... characterise[s] as procedural "those rules which are directed to governing or regulating the mode or conduct of court proceedings". All other provisions or rules are to be classified as substantive.'

[41] Deane J likewise said ((1993) 112 ALR 7 at 28, (1993) 176 CLR 433 at 462) that the lex fori should be applied 'only to the extent that it was procedural in the narrow sense of being directed to regulating court proceedings in that State' and Gaudron J adopted the same test (see (1993) 112 ALR 7 at 33–34, (1993) 176 CLR 433 at 469–470).

[42] In principle, therefore, I think that the relevant provisions of MACA should be characterised as procedural and therefore inapplicable by an English court. But Mr Palmer QC, who appeared for the defendant, submitted that in English private international law a limit or 'cap' on the damages recoverable is regarded as substantive. There is, it is true, some authority for this proposition. The seventh edition of Dicey's Conflict of Laws (1958), edited by Dr JHC Morris, contained the statement (p 1092), 'statutory provisions limiting a defendant's liability are prima facie substantive; but the true construction of the statute may negative this view' with a footnote: 'This is suggested by two dicta in Cope v Doherty (1858) 4 K & J 367, 384-385 and (1858) 2 De G & J 614, 626.'

[43] Cope v Doherty concerned an application by the owners of an American ship which had collided with and sunk another American ship to limit its liability pursuant to s 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. Wood V-C held that the section did not apply to collisions between foreigners. The owners argued that the limitation rule was procedural and should therefore be applied as part of the lex fori. I should have thought that the short answer was that whether the rule was substantive or procedural, Parliament had said that it should not apply to foreigners and that was the end of the matter. But the Vice-Chancellor dealt with the argument on its own terms ((1858) 4 K & J 367 at 384–385):

> 'clearly an Act, which limits the damages to which the ship owner is to be liable under circumstances like the present, deals with the substance and not the form of the procedure. It in effect forms a contract, that, whereas by the natural law, the owner of the ship or property that has been injured would be entitled to damages to the full extent of the loss he has sustained, all those persons upon whom the Legislature can impose such a contract, that is to say, all its own subjects, shall forego that which the natural law—the common law, as we should call it in England—would give them, and shall be entitled only to the amount of the value of the ship by which the injury has been inflicted, and of the freight due or to grow due in respect of such ship during the voyage.'

[44] Thus his reasoning was that the statute operates as if it imposed a contractual term limiting the damages recoverable. In fact, one of the reasons why the Vice-Chancellor held that the statute did not apply to foreigners was that he thought that, as a matter of international law, the United Kingdom could only impose such a deemed contract upon British ships. Such a term in a contract would clearly be a modification of the substantive obligations of the parties. As Lord Diplock said in Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] 1 All ER 556 at 566, [1980] AC 827 at 849:

> 'The contract . . . is just as much the source of secondary obligations as it is of primary obligations; and like primary obligations that are implied by law secondary obligations too can be modified by agreement between the parties . . .'

[45] When Cope v Doherty went to the Court of Appeal, Turner LJ dealt with the point very briefly ((1858) 2 De G & J 614 at 626):

> 'An attempt was made on the part of the Appellants to bring this case within Don v Lippman and cases of that class, but I think those cases have no bearing upon the point. This is a question of liability, and not of procedure.'

[46] In my opinion the proposition in Dicey was too widely stated. Cope v Doherty is authority for the proposition that a contractual term which limits the obligation to pay damages for a breach of contract or a tort, or a statutory provision which is deemed to operate as such a term, qualifies the substantive obligation. It is not part of the rules of the lex fori for the assessment of damages. I therefore agree with the opinion of Street CJ in Allan J Panozza & Co Pty Ltd v Allied Interstate (Qld) Pty Ltd [1976] 2 NSWLR 192 at 196–197 that a statutory limitation on damages deemed to be incorporated into a contract of carriage is 'an express limitation upon the substantive liabilities'. But, as the majority said in Stevens v Head (1993) 112 ALR 7 at 24–25, (1993) 176 CLR 433 at 458:

> 'Where the sources of the rights and obligations of contracting parties are in part the express terms of the contract and in part the provisions of its proper law, the courts of the forum are constrained to ascertain the parties' rights and obligations from those sources, not from the lex fori. In our respectful opinion, there is no valid analogy between the rules for determining the contractual rights and obligations arising in part from the proper law of the contract and the conflict of law rules governing the assessment of damages in respect of extraterritorial torts.'

[47] The Merchant Shipping (Amendment) Act 1862 extended the right to limit liability to all ships of whatever nation and thereafter it became impossible to regard such a provision as equivalent to a contractual term imposed upon British subjects. In my opinion, therefore, Clarke J was right in Caltex Singapore Pte Ltd v BP Shipping Ltd [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep 286 to treat a modern limitation statute (in that case, of Singapore) as a procedural provision, limiting the remedy rather than the substantive right: see also The Western Regent, Seismic Shipping Inc v Total E & P UK plc [2005] EWCA Civ 985 at [52], [2005] 2 All ER (Comm) 515 at [52].

[48] There is accordingly in my opinion no English authority to cast any doubt upon the conclusion of the Australian High Court in Stevens v Head that, for the purposes of the traditional distinction between substance and procedure which treats remedy as a matter of procedure, all the provisions of MACA, including limitations on quantum, should be characterised as procedural. This was also the view of the Court of Appeal in Roerig v Valiant Trawlers Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 21, [2002] 1 All ER 961, [2002] 1 WLR 2304. In John Pfeiffer Pty Ltd v Rogerson (2000)

172 ALR 625, (2000) 203 CLR 503, however, the High Court reversed itself, abandoned the traditional rule (at least for torts committed in Australia) and confined the role of the leges fori of the Australian States to procedure in the narrow sense of rules 'governing or regulating the mode or conduct of court proceedings' (see (2000) 172 ALR 625 at 651, (2000) 203 CLR 503 at 543–544). This change was said to be required by constitutional imperatives of Australian federalism. In a later decision (Regie National des Usines Renault SA v Zhang (2002) 187 ALR 1 at 21, (2002) 210 CLR 491 at 520 (para 76)) the court left open the question of whether it would apply to foreign torts. But the decision in John Pfeiffer Pty Ltd v Rogerson clearly influenced the judgments of the majority in the Court of Appeal in this case, to which I must now turn.

[49] Arden LJ said ([2005] 1 All ER 415 at [52], [2005] 1 WLR 1539) that 'The meaning of substance and procedure for the purposes of s 14 of the 1995 Act must be sought in the context of the 1995 Act'. That, if I may respectfully say so, seems to me plainly right. But then, instead of putting the 1995 Act into the context of the previous common law and the proposals of the Law Commission, she approached the matter in a more abstract way, saying that a reference to the law of the forum must be 'justified by some imperative which, relative to the imperative of applying the proper law, has priority'. Such a reason, she suggested, might be the inability of the English court to 'put itself into the shoes of the foreign court' and adopt some procedure which was not available in this country. But otherwise, she thought that the principle adopted in John Pfeiffer Pty Ltd v Rogerson should be applied and restrictions on the right to recover damages in the foreign law should not be regarded as procedural.

[50] Arden LJ may have been influenced in her approach to the construction of s 14(3)(b) by her view, expressed earlier in her judgment (at [51]) that what she called 'the damages principle', ie the rule that the assessment of damages is governed by the lex fori, was 'one of uncertain meaning and application'. So she felt that she was entitled to start on the basis that s 14(3)(b) was, so to speak, written on a clean sheet of paper. Of course there were peripheral uncertainties and differences of opinion. We have seen that in Chaplin v Boys [1969] 2 All ER 1085, [1971] AC 356 Lord Guest and Lord Donovan were willing to give the concept of procedure wider application than the majority, although, if I may say so with respect, the majority were in my opinion plainly right. There was also some uncertainty, largely generated by Dicey's interpretation of Cope v Doherty (1858) 2 De G & J 614;(1858) 4 K & J 367, about whether a statutory limitation on damages could be construed as substantive. I could add other possible uncertainties which have not yet come before the courts. For example, there may be rules of foreign or domestic law, under which a tort or other wrongful act gives rise to a liability to pay a conventional sum of money, which make it impossible to separate the concept of actionable damage from the concept of a remedy for that damage. It might be more realistic to say that the rule simply lays down the conditions under which the claimant is entitled to payment of a prescribed sum of money. But I do not propose to explore this or other hypothetical cases because they do not arise in this case and, so far as I know, have not arisen in the past.

[51] There can however be no doubt about the general rule, stated by Lord Mackay in the House of Lords debate, that 'issues relating to the quantum or measure of damages' are governed by the lex fori. And this was the rule which Parliament intended to preserve. Even if there appeared to be more logic in the principle in John Pfeiffer Pty Ltd v Rogerson (and the thirteenth edition of Dicey and Morris (2000) Vol 1, p 172 (para 7-039), supports Arden LJ on this point) the question is not what the law should be but what Parliament thought it was in 1995. As Lord Lloyd of Berwick said of a provision in the Limitation Act 1980 in Lowsley v Forbes (t/a LE Design Services) [1998] 3 All ER 897 at 906, [1999] 1 AC 329 at 342:

> 'It is Parliament's understanding of the existing law when enacting the Limitation Amendment Act 1980 that matters, not what the law is subsequently shown to have been. As Lord Simon of Glaisdale said in Black-Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG [1975] 1 All ER 810 at 845, [1975] AC 591 at 648:
>
> > "Once it is accepted that the purpose of ascertainment of the antecedent defect in the law is to interpret Parliament's intention, it must follow that it is Parliament's understanding of that law as evincing such a defect which is relevant, not what the law is subsequently declared to be."
>
> If common error can make the law, so can parliamentary error.'

[52] Sir William Aldous likewise said ([2005] 1 All ER 415 at [86], [2005] 1 WLR 1539) that the term 'procedure' in s 14(3)(b) 'should be given its natural meaning'. He placed considerable reliance upon John Pfeiffer Pty Ltd v Rogerson, despite the express statements in that case that it was, for Australian reasons, departing from traditional principles of English law. Such a construction was, he said, supported by Dicey and Morris, which is true, and by the Law Commission's Report, which in my opinion is not true. The only passage in the Commission's Report which may be said to support the conclusion reached by Sir William Aldous (although not his reasoning) is para 3.39 (p 22), which reproduces Dicey's comment that 'a statutory ceiling on damages' is a question of substance. But the Law Commission appears to have thought this proposition could be reconciled with its statement in the previous paragraph (3.38) which I have already quoted (at [34], above). In my opinion, that paragraph is consistent neither with the narrow construction of 'procedure' adopted by Sir William Aldous nor with a characterisation of limits on damages as not being procedural in the broader sense.

[53] In my opinion, therefore, Elias J was right to treat the MACA restrictions as entirely inapplicable. In the circumstances it is unnecessary to decide whether, if they had been properly characterised as substantive, it was open to the Court of Appeal to reverse his judgment that it was substantially more appropriate to apply English law. The hypothesis necessary to raise this question is in my view somewhat artificial, because most of the reasons why it may be more appropriate to apply English law are the reasons why the assessment of damages is traditionally characterised as a matter for the lex fori. I would therefore prefer not to express a view on this question. In my opinion the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of Elias J restored.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[54] My Lords, in January 2002 the claimant and the defendant were living together in London. The defendant, who is Australian, travelled to New South Wales to attend a family wedding. A fortnight later the claimant flew out to join her. On 3 February near Huskisson, New South Wales, the claimant was a passenger in a car driven by the defendant when it was involved in an accident. As a result of the accident the claimant was rendered tetraplegic. He subsequently commenced the present action for damages for his injuries against the defendant who was living in England at the time. She admits liability. The claimant contends that the English court should assess the damages according to English law, while the defendant contends that the assessment of damages is regulated by the law of New South Wales which limits the amounts which can be recovered.

[55] Until comparatively recently, any private international law questions in a case like the present would have been decided according to the common law. A person who had suffered damage abroad and who wished to bring proceedings to recover compensation for that damage in the English courts had to show that his claim, or any particular head of claim, relating to the damage was actionable both under English law, the lex fori, and under the law of the country where the injury had been sustained, the lex loci delicti (see Phillips v Eyre (1870) LR 6 QB 1). In Machado v Fontes [1897] 2 QB 231, [1895–9] All ER Rep Ext 1832 the Court of Appeal had relaxed the rule to a certain extent by holding that it was sufficient if the act was wrongful in the country where it was committed, even though any damage would not have been actionable in civil proceedings there. In Chaplin v Boys [1969] 2 All ER 1085, [1971] AC 356 this House overruled Machado v Fontes and declared that, in general, the damage or head of damage had indeed to be actionable under the lex loci delicti as well as under English law. Provided that the claim passed this test, the foreign law then fell out of the picture and the defendant's liability for the damage or head of damage was determined in accordance with English law (see [1969] 2 All ER 1085 at 1098–1099, [1971] AC 356 at 385–386 per Lord Wilberforce). The remedy to make good the plaintiff's damage was, however, a matter for the law of the forum. So, in assessing and awarding damages, an English court would apply English law.

[56] When this House restored the double actionability rule to its full rigour in Chaplin v Boys, there was a somewhat increased risk that the test would exclude certain claims which it would actually be just to admit. Recognising this, the House held that, in appropriate cases, a claim or head of claim could proceed even though it was not actionable under the lex loci delicti. The flexible test for recognising these situations which Lord Wilberforce formulated came to win acceptance. In Red Sea Insurance Co Ltd v Bouygues SA [1994] 3 All ER 749, [1995] 1 AC 190, the Privy Council held, conversely, that, where justice required in particular circumstances, an action could proceed in the courts of the forum on the basis of the lex loci delicti, even though the damage or head of damage would not be actionable under the lex fori.

[57] In the eyes of their supporters, in this version the common law rules for determining whether damage or a head of damage was actionable in an English court displayed a welcome pragmatic flexibility; to their critics, the rules were too uncertain to provide sure guidance for practitioners. In 1990 in a joint report, Private International Law: Choice of Law in Tort and Delict (Law Com no 193, Scot Law Com no 129), the English and Scottish Law Commissions sided with the critics and recommended that the common law rules for determining actionability should be replaced by a statutory scheme. The Commissions confirmed, however, that 'the measure or quantification of damages . . . [should be] governed by the lex fori' (see p 22 (para 3.38)). In due course Parliament enacted the Private International Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1995, Pt III of which makes provision for new choice of law rules in tort and, for Scotland, in delict.

[58] The first step which Parliament had to take was to abolish the pre-existing common law rules of double actionability which were perceived to be causing the problem. Except for defamation claims, where the common law is preserved by s 13, Parliament abolished these rules in s 10. Indeed Pt III affects these rules and no others. This is stated expressly in s 14(2): 'Nothing in this Part affects any rules of law (including rules of private international law) except those abolished by section 10 above.' This provision serves to delimit the scope of the enactment in Pt III and means that there is no room for arguing that the abolition of the rules covered by s 10 must have impliedly effected a change in some other rule of law. More particularly, it immediately suggests that Pt III does not affect the assessment of damages since that matter was never governed by the double actionability rules which were abolished by s 10. If that is so, the assessment of damages must continue to be governed by the lex fori.

[59] The abolition of the common law rules was just the first step in the reform. The next step was to replace them with new rules. That is what Pt III is designed to do. As s 9(1) explains, the rules in Pt III are to apply for choosing the law ('the applicable law') to be used for determining 'issues relating to tort or (for the purposes of the law of Scotland) delict'. So Pt III does three things. First, it provides that the English court is to use a particular law (the applicable law) to determine whether an actionable tort has occurred (see s 9(4)). In effect, this replaces the double actionability test. But, secondly, s 9(4), read along with sub-s (1), goes on to provide that the applicable law is to be used to determine other 'issues relating to tort'. Finally, ss 11 and 12 provide the rules by which the applicable law, which is to be used to determine these issues, is to be chosen. Under s 12 the English court can separate out various issues relating to the tort and, where appropriate, a different law is to be used to determine different issues (dépeçage).

[60] Where matters are in dispute, the first step will be for the court to use the rules in ss 11 and 12 to decide what the applicable law is. Rather as, under Chaplin v Boys [1969] 2 All ER 1085, [1971] AC 356, there was a general rule of double actionability which could be disapplied in certain circumstances, so too s 11 gives the general rule for choosing the applicable law, while s 12 provides for that general rule to be displaced where it would be substantially more appropriate for the law of another country to apply. Once the court has chosen the applicable law or laws in accordance with these sections, the judge will use the chosen system or systems to determine whether an actionable tort has occurred and any other issue 'relating to [the] tort' which arises. Parliament has not defined 'issues relating to tort', but it has at least indicated certain matters which do not fall within that category. These are to be found in s 14(3) which provides inter alia:

> 'Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (2) above, nothing in this Part ... (b) affects any rules of evidence, pleading or practice or authorises questions of procedure in any proceedings to be determined otherwise than in accordance with the law of the forum.'

This provision reinforces s 14(2) by spelling out three types of rule which Pt III is not to affect and one approach which it is not to authorise. It is not to affect any rules of evidence, pleading or practice and it is not to authorise a court to determine 'questions of procedure in any proceedings' otherwise than in accordance with its own law. So, while Pt III authorises—indeed requires—an English court to use the applicable law to determine 'issues relating to tort', it does not authorise the court to use anything other than English law to determine any 'questions of procedure' which arise in the proceedings.

[61] Here the defendant argues that under ss 11 and 12 the applicable law relating to the issue of the assessment of damages is the law of New South Wales. So the claimant is not entitled to recover any more by way of damages for his personal injuries than he would be entitled to recover under the Motor Accidents Compensation Act 1999 of New South Wales (MACA). For his part, the claimant says that questions relating to the assessment of damages are 'questions of procedure' and so, in accordance with s 14(3)(b), the English court must determine them by using English law. By a majority (Arden LJ and Sir William Aldous, Waller LJ dissenting), the Court of Appeal upheld the defendant's contention that the MACA rules should be applied to the assessment of damages. The result is that the maximum which the claimant could recover by way of damages for his injuries is substantially less than he would be able to recover if the judge had to apply English law.

[62] The critical question concerns the interpretation of the expression 'questions of procedure' in s 14(3)(b). In the Court of Appeal ([2004] EWCA Civ 1735, [2005] 1 All ER 415, [2005] 1 WLR 1539) Arden LJ explained (at [52]) how, in her view, the English court should approach it:

> '. . . In the context of s 14, a principled approach requires the court to start from the position that it has already decided that the proper law of the tort is not the law of the forum, ie that some other law applies to the tort, either because it is the lex loci delicti or because it is substantially more appropriate than the lex loci delicti. On this basis, a reference to the law of the forum must be the exception, and it must be justified by some imperative which, relative to the imperative of applying the proper law, has priority . . .'

Later, Arden LJ held (at [66]) that there was 'a guiding principle' that '[o]nce the court has decided that the law of New South Wales is the proper law of the tort, it is logical, so far as possible, to apply the law of New South Wales throughout'. Adopting this approach, she considered (at [61]) that the context of s 14 suggested that 'the approach of Mason CJ in [McKain v RW Miller & Co (SA) Pty Ltd (1991) 104 ALR 257, (1991) 174 CLR 1] that procedure covers matters as to the mode and conduct of trial is the basic approach of s 14'. On that basis the assessment of damages was not a question of procedure and so was, presumably, to be included among the 'issues in the claim' which s 9(4) directs the court to determine by using the applicable law.

[63] In my respectful view Arden LJ was wrong to see s 9(4) as containing a guiding principle and s 14(3)(b) as containing an exception which the court can invoke only where there is some overriding imperative for doing so.

[64] In Pt III Parliament did not enact a comprehensive scheme and a number of exceptions. It simply provided that the law chosen in accordance with ss 11 and 12 is to be used to determine certain issues, while the law of the forum is to continue to be used to determine others. The matters where the United Kingdom courts are to continue to use the law of the forum are spelled out in s 14(3). In particular, Parliament has decided not to authorise an English court to use anything other than English law to determine 'questions of procedure'. This policy may be criticised as being liable to encourage forum shopping or on some other ground, but it is the policy of the legislature and, as such, it is entitled to exactly the same weight and respect as the policy in s 9(4) that certain other issues are to be determined by the law chosen in accordance with ss 11 and 12. There is accordingly no reason to regard the rule requiring an English court to use English law to determine questions of procedure as 'the exception', for which some overriding imperative must be found. On the contrary, the words of s 14(3)(b) should be interpreted and applied in a straightforward fashion, giving them the meaning which is appropriate in the context in which they occur.

[65] So, does the expression 'questions of procedure' in s 14(3)(b) include questions relating to the assessment of damages? Like Arden LJ, Sir WilliamAldous adopted a restrictive interpretation of those words: for him, 'the word "procedure" in the 1995 Act should be given its natural meaning namely, the mode or rules used to govern and regulate the conduct of the court's proceedings' (see [2005] 1 All ER 415 at [86], [2005] 1 WLR 1539). In many contexts something like that might well be regarded as the appropriate meaning and it might very well not include the assessment of damages. But here the expression 'questions of procedure' is being used within Pt III of a statute on private international law. So it is a fair assumption that Parliament meant the expression to be understood in the way that it would be understood in the field of private international law. In fact, the scheme of Pt III would not work on any other basis. In a case like the present, the English court has to decide whether to characterise the relevant aspects of the assessment of damages as issues relating to tort, to be governed by the applicable law, or to regard them as questions of procedure, to be governed by English law. Given that the characterisation under s 9(2) is 'for the purposes of private international law', in carrying it out, the court must have regard to the general principles of private international law. To be consistent, the court must apply the same general approach when considering the other side of the question, which involves interpreting and applying s 14(3)(b).

[66] By the time Parliament legislated in 1995, it was generally understood that, for the purposes of private international law, some questions relating to damages were substantive while others were procedural. Questions relating to the actionability of heads of claim were substantive, while questions as to the quantification of damages for actionable heads of claim related to the remedy and so were classified as procedural. So, for instance, Lord Hodson said in Chaplin v Boys [1969] 2 All ER 1085 at 1093, [1971] AC 356 at 379:

> 'I am now, however, persuaded that questions such as whether loss of earning capacity or pain and suffering are admissible heads of damage must be questions of substantive law. The law relating to damages is partly procedural and partly substantive, the actual quantification under the relevant heads being procedural only.'

Lord Wilberforce was somewhat dismissive of an analysis purely in terms of what he called 'the accepted distinction between substance and procedure' (see [1969] 2 All ER 1085 at 1104, [1971] AC 356 at 392–393), but none the less he too envisaged that certain questions relating to damages were to be classified as 'procedure' and so as a matter for the application of the lex fori. Similarly, Lord Pearson spoke ([1969] 2 All ER 1085 at 1106, [1971] AC 356 at 394) of 'procedural (or adjectival or non-substantive) law' which would regulate the recovery of damages. In Mitchell v McCulloch 1976 SC 1 at 7, Lord McDonald referred to counsel for the pursuer's argument that 'procedural matters, including the measure of damages are determined solely by the lex fori'. In Stevens v Head (1993) 112 ALR 7 at 15, (1993) 176 CLR 433 at 447, Mason CJ summarised the current thinking:

'The law relating to damages is partly procedural and partly substantive. According to the traditional application of the substance-procedure distinction, the question whether legislative provisions dealing with awards of damages are substantive or procedural has been approached by asking whether the provisions affect the character of the wrong actionable or go only to the measure of compensation. This approach is consistent with the equation traditionally drawn between matters of procedure and matters relating to remedies.'

[67] These references, which could be multiplied, demonstrate that questions of the quantification or assessment of damages had long been regarded as 'procedural' as opposed to 'substantive'. I have accordingly no doubt that when Parliament used the expression 'questions of procedure' it was intended to cover questions relating to the assessment of damages. Indeed, if that were not so and the assessment of damages were to be regarded as an issue relating to tort to be determined by reference to the applicable law, Parliament would have made a major change in this aspect of the law—despite the Law Commissions' recommendation that the existing state of the law should be preserved.

[68] Counsel for the defendant contended, however, that, even if Parliament had used the expression 'questions of procedure' in that way when it passed the 1995 Act, the common law was not set in stone and an 'updating construction' should be given to s 14(3)(b), to take account of developments since 1995. In particular, the High Court of Australia, which would, in 1995, have accepted that the assessment of damages was procedural (see Stevens v Head), had now changed direction and held, in the words of the majority, that 'all questions about the kinds of damage, or amount of damages that may be recovered, would . . . be treated as substantive issues governed by the lex loci delicti' (see John Pfeiffer Pty Ltd v Rogerson (2000) 172 ALR 625 at 651, (2000) 203 CLR 503 at 544 (para 100)). In making this change, members of the court had regard to the view of La Forest J, giving the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada in Tolofson v Jensen, Lucas v Gagnon (1994) 120 DLR (4th) 289 at 321, that—

'the purpose of substantive / procedural classification is to determine which rules will make the machinery of the forum court run smoothly as distinguished from those determinative of the rights of both parties.'

Counsel for the defendant submitted that the expression 'questions of procedure' in s 14(3)(b) should now be interpreted in a way which took account of this development. In effect, by adopting the High Court's revised classification of questions relating to the assessment of damages as matters of substance, Arden LJ and Sir William Aldous accepted that argument.

[69] In my view, however, the argument falls down for a variety of reasons. This is not a case of the kind envisaged by Lord Wilberforce in Royal College of Nursing of the United Kingdom v Department of Health and Social Security [1981] 1 All ER 545 at 564–565, [1981] AC 800 at 822, where a new state of affairs, or a fresh set of facts bearing on policy, has come into existence since the 1995 Act was passed and the courts have to consider whether they fall within the parliamentary intention expressed in the words of the enactment. Indeed the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Tolofson v Jensen antedated the 1995 Act—but Parliament did not follow its lead. All that the appellant can point to, therefore, is a change in the way that the High Court of Australia classifies questions about the quantum of damages for purposes of the common law rule in intra-Australian cases. As is plain from the judgments in John Pfeiffer Pty Ltd v Rogerson (2000) 172 ALR 625, (2000) 203 CLR 503, however, their Honours were knowingly altering what had previously been well-settled law. Moreover, they were doing so because they felt impelled by what they saw as a requirement of the federal nature of the constitution. A similar consideration influenced the Canadian Supreme Court in Tolofson v Jensen. It remains to be seen whether the High Court will hold that all questions about the kind or amount of damages are to be determined by the lex loci delicti in international cases (see Regie National des Usines Renault SA v Zhang (2002) 187 ALR 1 at 21, (2002) 210 CLR 491 at 520 (para 76)). These decisions of the Canadian and Australian courts, which show how the common law can be reshaped, may give ammunition, or food for thought, for critics of the policy adopted by Parliament in the 1995 Act. But they contain nothing which can justify the House in altering what would otherwise be the appropriate interpretation of the statute.

[70] The passage which Lord Hoffmann has quoted (at [37], above) from the Hansard report of the speech of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Mackay of Clashfern (562 HL Official Report (5th series) cols 1421–1422), in reply to the probing amendment in the name of Lord Howie of Troon, confirms the construction which I would, in any event, have placed on the words in s 14(3)(b). But more importantly, perhaps, it shows that Parliament was assured that the provision would prevent damages being awarded by reference to the law and standards of other countries. The particular problem raised by Lord Howie related to the high level of damages in the United States which he was anxious should not be replicated here. But it would be equally unacceptable if, say, United Kingdom courts had to award damages according to a statutory scale which, while adequate in another country because of the relatively low cost of services etc there, would be wholly inadequate in this country, having regard to the cost of the corresponding items here. As Parliament was assured by the Lord Chancellor, s 14(3)(b) guards against such eventualities. The interpretation advocated by the defendant would undermine the basis on which Parliament legislated.

[71] The defendant relies on the provisions of MACA. So the ultimate question is whether the relevant provisions are to be regarded as procedural or substantive for the purposes of private international law. If they are procedural, they are to be disregarded since questions of procedure are to be regulated by the law of the forum in accordance with s 14(3)(b). If they are substantive, then they would apply if the law of New South Wales were the applicable law, as the Court of Appeal held, reversing Elias J ([2004] EWHC 1957 (QB), [2004] All ER (D) 428 (May)).

[72] Lord Hoffmann has analysed the passage in Dicey and Morris Conflict of Laws to the effect that 'statutory provisions limiting a defendant's liability are prima facie substantive; but the true construction of the statute may negative this view'. I respectfully agree with his analysis. In any event, as the passage recognises, in any given case the answer to the question must depend on the construction of the relevant provision in the context of the particular statute. In the present case the defendant relies on various provisions in Ch 5 of MACA, headed 'Award of damages'. Many of them derive from equivalent provisions in the Motor Accidents Act 1988. The restrictions on the damages recoverable for non-economic loss under that Act were considered by the High Court of Australia in Stevens v Head (1993) 112 ALR 7, (1993) 176 CLR 433. Applying the customary common law approach in private international law, the High Court classified them as procedural. That decision is not conclusive of any or all of the matters in dispute, but it does provide useful guidance from the highest court in the country.

[73] Section 122(1) of MACA explains that Ch 5 applies to, and in respect of, 'an award of damages' relating to death or injury in motor accidents. Section 123 provides that 'A court cannot award damages to a person in respect of a motor accident contrary to this Chapter'. While, of course, it may be necessary to look beneath the surface of a statutory provision to ascertain its nature, the legislature is here signalling that the provisions in Ch 5 are directed to what a New South Wales court can award by way of damages. In other words, prima facie at least, they are concerned, not with the scope of the defendant's liability for the victim's injuries as such, but with the remedy which the courts of New South Wales can give to compensate for those injuries. For purposes of private international law, prima facie they are procedural in nature.

[74] Of course, when it enacted MACA the Parliament of New South Wales was not concerned with the categories of private international law. So, not surprisingly, Ch 5 contains provisions on matters which would traditionally fall on the substantive side of the line for purposes of private international law. This is the case, for example, with mitigation of damages in s 136. The same goes for s 138, on contributory negligence, and s 140, on volenti non fit injuria.

[75] Nevertheless, in Pts 5.2 and 5.3, dealing respectively with damages for economic and non-economic loss, the provisions are formulated in a way that emphasises their nature as directions to the courts of New South Wales. For instance, where the legislature refers to 'an award of damages', it is referring to something that can only be made by a court. So, under s 125(2), in 'an award of damages' for economic loss, 'the court is to disregard' any amount by which the injured person's weekly earnings would have exceeded $A2,500, subject to indexation. Under s 127(1), 'Where an award of damages is to include compensation' for future economic loss, the present value of that future loss 'is to be qualified by adopting the prescribed discount rate'—clearly a direction to a judge who is going to include this kind of compensation in an award of damages as to how to go about it. Similarly, under s 134, the maximum amount 'that a court may award' for non-economic loss is now $A309,000, again subject to indexation.

[76] Undoubtedly, in practice these and other provisions can be expected to govern the amounts for which claims are settled outside the courts. But that does not make them substantive. It merely means that litigants, who know what the court can and cannot award, will settle their claims accordingly. More particularly, it does not mean that the provisions are to be regarded as substantive rather than procedural for purposes of private international law. In that context, the brocard ubi remedium ibi ius would be an unsafe guiding principle.

[77] I would accordingly hold that the provisions of Ch 5 of MACA on which the defendant relies relate to the remedy which the courts of New South Wales can award and are procedural for the purposes of s 14(3)(b) of the 1995 Act. That being so, they fall to be ignored when the English court awards damages for the claimant's injuries. I recognise that this means that the defendant's insurers may have to meet a higher claim for damages than would be the case if the provisions of MACA applied. I recognise also that making a higher award would conflict with certain of the overall objects set out in s 5 of MACA. But I do not regard that as a compelling consideration since, as defendant's counsel was careful to acknowledge, the impact on the scheme of applying a different scale of damages in claims litigated in this country is unlikely to be anything other than marginal.

[78] For these reasons, as well as for those given by Lord Hoffmann, with whose speech I am in full agreement, I would allow the appeal and hold that the quantification of damages is to be determined in accordance with English law. Since all the issues in dispute relate to the quantification of damages, it is unnecessary to decide which law would be the applicable law for determining issues relating to tort in accordance with s 9(1) and (4) of the 1995 Act.

LORD CARSWELL.

[79] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinions prepared by my noble and learned friends Lord Hoffmann and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry. I fully agree with their reasons and conclusions, with one slight qualification on one aspect of the case, on which I shall add a few words.

[80] Your Lordships have found it possible to decide the question of construction of s 14(3)(b) of the Private International Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1995 without recourse to external aids. The appellant's counsel also relied strongly, however, on the statement made in the House of Lords on 27 March 1995 by the then Lord Chancellor, Lord Mackay of Clashfern, set out in para [37] of Lord Hoffmann's opinion. This was not just an expression of the government's intention from a most authoritative source, it was a reassurance to Lord Howie of Troon that his amendment was not necessary, since issues relating to the quantum or measure of damages would come within the ambit of the words 'questions of procedure' in s 14(3)(b). As Lord Hoffmann has said (at [37], above), it is as clear a case for the application of the principle stated in Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593 as anyone could hope to find. If the officious bystander had volunteered his opinion on the point, it could have been nothing short of conclusive.

[81] Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart has been out of judicial favour in recent years (no doubt largely because there were some instances of its over-use, though there have been some trenchant and irreconcilable critics), and courts have constantly striven to avoid resorting to it. I do consider, however, that the principle has a place in statutory interpretation. As Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead remarked in R (on the application of Jackson) v A-G [2005] UKHL 56 at [65], [2005] 4 All ER 1253 at [65], [2006] 1 AC 262, it would be unfortunate if Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart were now to be sidelined, as there are occasions when ministerial statements are useful in practice as an interpretative aid, perhaps especially as a confirmatory aid. I would simply remark myself that it would be wilful blindness for courts to deprive themselves of its assistance in proper cases.

[82] The conditions for the application of the Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart principle have been authoritatively stated in a number of cases and do not require repetition. It is sufficient to refer to the opinion of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42 at 64–65, [1993] AC 593 at 634–635 and to the several expressions by Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead in R v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, ex p Spath Holme Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 195 at 215–218, [2001] 2 AC 349 at 396–399, Wilson v First County Trust Ltd [2003] UKHL 40 at [56]–[59], [2003] 4 All ER 97 at [56]–[59], [2004] 1 AC 816 and R (on the application of Jackson) v A-G [2005] 4 All ER 1253 at [65]–[66], [2006] 1 AC 262.

[83] I would regard the essential precondition of ambiguity as satisfied in the present case. I agree with the remarks of Arden LJ in the Court of Appeal ([2004] EWCA Civ 1735 at [58], [2005] 1 All ER 415 at [58], [2005] 1 WLR 1539) that 'Damages are not naturally regarded as procedure' and Sir William Aldous (at [86]) that the natural meaning of 'procedure' is 'the mode or rules used to govern and regulate the conduct of the court's proceedings'; cf La Forest J in Tolofson v Jensen, Lucas v Gagnon (1994) 120 DLR (4th) 289 at 321 on the purpose of the substantive/procedural classification. In the field of private international law, however, the word bears a special meaning, as your Lordships have indicated. It is the context which gives it the wider meaning than that which might be regarded as natural (see [36], above, per Lord Hoffmann). So long as one could be quite satisfied that in using the words 'questions of procedure' in s 14(3)(b) Parliament intended that special meaning to be adopted, then the interpretation is clear. There are strong reasons, as your Lordships have set out, for concluding that it did intend to adopt the special meaning, and it is quite possible to say that no ambiguity exists. In my opinion there may, however, be said to be sufficient possible ambiguity to justify resort to the Lord Chancellor's statement in Hansard as a confirmatory aid. The other conditions in Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593 are obviously satisfied. When one does so, the intention of Parliament is entirely clear and the correctness of the conclusions reached by your Lordships on the construction of s 14(3)(b) is fully confirmed.

[84] I would allow the appeal and restore the judgment of Elias J.

Appeal allowed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Astley and others v North Wales Training and Enterprise Council Ltd (trading as Celtec Ltd)

[2006] UKHL 29

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY, LORD CARSWELL AND LORD MANCE

4 APRIL, 21 JUNE 2006

Employment – Continuity – Transfer of trade, business or undertaking – Employment by transferor immediately before transfer – Employees seconded from transferor to transferee – Employees later electing to resign from transferor and take up employment with transferee – Employees seeking to establish continuity of service to retain benefit of terms and conditions of previous employment – Reference to European Court of Justice to establish date of transfer of undertaking – Following European judgment employees seeking to advance new argument – Whether employees to be permitted to argue new point – Whether employees having decided freely not to continue with relationship with transferee so as to exclude themselves from claiming continuity of service – Council Directive (EEC) 77/187, art 3(1).

The employees were civil servants responsible for vocational training in North Wales. The Department of Education transferred part of its vocational training responsibilities to training and enterprise councils (TECs). In September 1990, the employees were seconded to the North East Wales Training and Enterprise Council, whose successor was Celtec. In 1993, the employees resigned from the civil service and became employed by Celtec. The employees sought a determination by the employment tribunal as to the length of their period of continuous employment. They relied, inter alia, on Council Directive (EEC) 77/187 (on the approximation of laws of the member states relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses). By art 3(1)a[a] of the directive the transferor's rights and obligations arising from a contract of employment existing on the date of a transfer were, by reason of the transfer, transferred to the transferee. The employment tribunal found that the employees had continuous employment from the start of their employment with the civil service as there had been a transfer commencing in September 1990 and continuing until 1996 when the last of the secondments from the civil service came to an end. The Employment Appeal Tribunal subsequently allowed Celtec's appeal against that decision. The Court of Appeal quashed that decision. Celtec appealed to the House of Lords, which stayed the proceedings and referred questions to the Court of Justice of the European Communities (ECJ). The ECJ ruled that art 3(1) had to be interpreted as meaning that the date of a transfer within the meaning of that provision was the date on which responsibility as employer for carrying on the business of the unit transferred moved from the transferor to the transferee, namely a Article 3, so far as material, is set out at [20], below

September 1990. It also held that for the purposes of applying that provision, contracts of employment or employment relationships existing on the date of the transfer were deemed to be handed over, on that date, from the transferor to the transferee, regardless of what had been agreed between the parties in that respect with the sole reservation that the workers themselves, following a decision taken freely by them, were at liberty not to continue the employment relationship with the transferee. The matter came back before their Lordships. Celtec submitted that, in the light of the ECJ's rulings as to the date of the transfer, the appeal should be allowed and that it be determined that the employees' periods of continuous service began when, after resigning from the civil service, they took up direct employment with Celtec. The employees contended that the only issue that had to be determined was whether, in the light of the ECJ judgment, the employees' continuity of employment was broken in 1993 when they resigned from the civil service and accepted an offer of employment with Celtec. They argued that, assuming that the date of the transfer was in September 1990 and not over a period as they had previously submitted, their accrued rights were protected by the directive because their contracts of employment were deemed to have been handed over at the date of the transfer. Issues, therefore, arose as to (i) whether the employees should be permitted to run the new argument and, if so, whether that issue could be determined by their Lordships on the information available or whether it had to be remitted to the employment tribunal for its determination; and (ii) whether the employees were caught by the reservation.

Held – (1) The effectiveness of the provision for the making of a reference to the ECJ for a preliminary ruling would be impaired if the national court were prevented from forthwith applying Community law in its entirety in accordance with the decision or the case law of the court. It followed that every national court had, in a case within its jurisdiction, to apply Community law in its entirety and protect the rights which the latter conferred on individuals. In the instant case, in view of the ECJ's ruling that contracts of employment existing on the date of the transfer between the transferor and workers assigned to the undertaking transferred were deemed to be handed over from the transferor to the transferee on the date of the transfer, it was the duty of the national court to give the employees the opportunity to put forward their additional argument (see [8], [41]–[43], [77], [92], [93], [114], below); Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v Simmenthal SpA (No 2) Case 106/77 [1978] ECR 629 applied.

(2) (Lord Rodger and Lord Mance dissenting) The extent of the sole reservation was that it was open to an employee, whose contract of employment would otherwise be transferred automatically from the transferor to the transferee, on the date of the transfer of his own free will to withdraw from that arrangement by declining to enter the employment of the transferee. The application of the rule that the employee could withdraw from the arrangement, however, depended on two things: first, that the employee was in a position to choose whether or not to enter the employment of the transferee after the date of the transfer; and, second, that he in fact exercised that choice by deciding of his own free will not to do so. The general rule was that contracts of employment of workers assigned to the undertaking transferred were automatically transferred from the transferor to the transferee on the date of the transfer. It was clear from Community jurisprudence it was not possible for the general rule to be derogated from in a manner unfavourable to employees. The rights conferred on them by the directive could not be made subject to the consent either of the transferor or transferee nor the consent of the employees' representatives or the employees themselves. The gulf between what the parties themselves might have contemplated and what the rule required might be large, but the rule had to prevail. On the other hand it was the fundamental right of the employee to be free to choose his employer. He could not be obliged to work for an employer whom he had not freely chosen. In the instant case, the reservation did not apply. The employees had continuous employment with Celtec from the start of their employment with the civil service by virtue of the directive. They were in a position on or after the date of the transfer to choose of their own free will not to work for Celtec. They did not make that choice and therefore their contracts of employment were transferred automatically to Celtec with continuity of employment on the date of transfer (see [9], [54], [55], [61], [92], below); Botzen v Rotterdamsche Droogdok Maatschappij BV Case 186/83 [1985] ECR 519, Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v A/S Danmols Inventar Case 105/84 [1985] ECR 2639, Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v Daddy's Dance Hall A/S Case 324/86 [1988] IRLR 315, Berg v Besselsen Joined cases 144/87 and 145/87 [1989] IRLR 447, d'Urso v Ercole Marelli Elettromeccanica Generale SpA Case C-362/89 [1992] IRLR 136 and Katsikas v Konstantinidis Joined cases C-132/91, C-138/91 and C-139/91 [1993] IRLR 179 considered.

(3) (Lord Mance dissenting) Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed. It would not be necessary for the case to be remitted to the employment tribunal for further determination. Their decision would be affirmed, although on different grounds, that the employees had continuous employment with Celtec from the start of their employment with the civil service by virtue of the directive (see [9], [62], [90], [93], below).

Notes

For employees' rights under Community law on transfers of undertakings, see 52 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) para 21.20.

Cases referred to in judgment

Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v Simmenthal SpA (No 2) Case 106/77 [1978] ECR 629, ECJ.

Berg v Besselsen Joined cases 144/87 and 145/87 [1989] IRLR 447, [1990] ICR 396, [1988] ECR 2559, ECJ.

Botzen v Rotterdamsche Droogdok Maatschappij BV Case 186/83 [1985] ECR 519, ECJ.

d'Urso v Ercole Marelli Elettromeccanica Generale SpA Case C-362/89 [1992] IRLR 136, [1991] ECR I-4105, ECJ.

Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v A/S Danmols Inventar Case 105/84 [1985] ECR 2639, ECJ.

Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v Daddy's Dance Hall A/S Case 324/86 [1988] IRLR 315, [1988] ECR 739, ECJ.

Foster v British Gas plc [1991] 2 All ER 705, [1991] 2 AC 306, [1991] 2 WLR 1075, HL.

Katsikas v Konstantinidis Joined cases C-132/91, C-138/91 and C-139/91 [1993] IRLR 179, [1992] ECR I-6577, ECJ.

Leicestershire CC v UNISON [2005] IRLR 920, EAT.

Moloney v Hampshire Training & Enterprise Council Ltd (30 September 1996, unreported), ET.

North Staffordshire Railway Co v Edge [1920] AC 254, HL.

Redmond Stichting (Dr Sophie) v Bartol Case C-29/91 [1992] IRLR 366, [1992] ECR I-3189, ECJ.

Rotsart de Hertaing v J Benoidt SA (in liq) Case C-305/94 [1997] All ER (EC) 40, [1996] ECR I-5927, ECJ.

Rygaard v Strø Mølle Akustik A/S Case C-48/94 [1996] ICR 333, [1995] ECR I-2745, ECJ.

Spijkers v Gebroeders Benedik Abbatoir CV Case 24/85 [1986] ECR 1119, ECJ.

Cases also referred to in list of authorities

Archambault v Archambault [1902] AC 575, PC.

Brady v Brady [1988] 2 All ER 617, [1989] AC 755, [1988] 2 WLR 1308, HL.

Connecticut Fire Insurance Co v Kavanagh [1892] AC 473, PC.

Hay v George Hanson (Building Contractors) Ltd [1996] IRLR 427, EAT.

Jones v Governing Body of Burdett Coutts School [1998] IRLR 521, [1999] ICR 38, CA.

Kumchyk v Derby CC [1978] ICR 1116, EAT.

Landsorganisationen i Danmark v Ny Mølle Kro Case 287/86 [1989] IRLR 37, [1989] ICR 330, [1987] ECR 5465

Perkowski v Wellington Corp [1958] 3 All ER 368, [1959] AC 53, [1958] 3 WLR 564, PC.

Senior Heat Treatment Ltd v Bell [1997] IRLR 614, EAT.

Teesside Times Ltd v Drury [1980] IRLR 72, [1980] ICR 338, CA.

United Marketing Co v Hasham Kara [1963] 2 All ER 553, [1963] 1 WLR 523, PC.

Appeal

The North Wales Training and Enterprise Council Ltd (trading as Celtec Ltd), petitioned the House of Lords for leave to appeal against the order of the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 1035, [2002] IRLR 629), of 19 July 2002, filed on behalf of the employees, John Astley, Julie Owens and Deborah Hawkes from the order of the Employment Appeal Tribunal ([2001] IRLR 788), dated 5 October 2001, allowing the employees' appeal and quashing the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal, sent to the parties on 23 December 2001, and restoring the decision of the employment tribunal. The employees had raised the proceedings in the employment tribunal as representatives of a group of employees to which they belonged. On 6 March 2003, the House of Lords gave leave to appeal in order to allow questions to be referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities (ECJ) on the interpretation of art 3(1) of Council Directive (EEC) 77/187. Following delivery of the ECJ judgment, on 26 May 2005 ([2005] IRLR 647), Celtec sought to argue that the issue referred had been determined in their favour. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hope of Craighead.

John Bowers QC and Jeremy Lewis (instructed by Mace & Jones, Manchester) for the appellant.

Gavin Millar QC and Thomas Linden (instructed by Russell Jones & Walker) for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

21 June 2006. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Hope of Craighead, Lord Rodger of Earlsferry and Lord Mance. I am greatly indebted to them for their summary of the facts, materials and decisions relevant to this appeal, which I need not attempt to repeat. I shall for convenience refer throughout to Celtec Ltd (Celtec), since nothing turns on the transfer from Newtec Ltd to it.

[2] If an employer transferred his business undertaking to another party, the position at common law of an employee who worked for the first employer before the transfer and for the new employer after it was in principle clear. His previous contract of employment was not varied, because the second contract was made between different parties. But the first contract was the subject of an express or implied novation, involving the termination of the first contract and its replacement by a new contract. This was a readily intelligible and rational analysis. But it could work disadvantageously to the employee in any situation where his rights depended on showing that his employment had been continuous for a given period, since a novation necessarily involved a discontinuity. It was this disadvantage which the legislation now under consideration was intended to obviate. The benign intent of the legislation is not in question. But its effect is, inevitably, to introduce a fictional element into this tripartite relationship, since (where the legislative conditions are satisfied) the employee is treated as having been employed by the new employer all along and ex hypothesi such is not the case. The Court of Justice of the European Communities (ECJ) acknowledges this in its judgment on the reference in this case, when it rules that:

> '. . . the workers assigned to the undertaking transferred are deemed to be handed over, on that date, from the transferor to the transferee, regardless of what has been agreed between the parties to the transfer process in that respect.' (See [2005] IRLR 647 at 658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1434–1435 (para 43).)

In legal parlance, a matter is only deemed to be the case when it is not, or may not, in fact be so, or would not or might not be thought to be so if not deemed to be so. The complexity of this case, I think, derives from the fiction which underlies it.

[3] Certain very important questions, which were the subject of discussion and argument below, have effectively ceased to be controversial. The employment tribunal began, in a logical way, by seeking to define the undertaking whose transfer was in issue. Its answer (in para 11 of its reasons) was clear:

> '. . . the management of the government-funded post-16 vocational training and enterprise activities in England and Wales together with the information systems and database, some staff and some premises. That we think is a recognisable and definable economic entity.'

It went on to observe (at para 12) that the undertaking in question was a 'labour intensive' undertaking, and therefore the movement of staff from the Department of Education (the department) to Celtec was an important defining part of the undertaking and transfer. The Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) did not understand Celtec to attack this description (see [2001] IRLR 788 at 794 (para 46)) and thought the tribunal's description could not be faulted. The Court of Appeal took the same view ([2002] EWCA Civ 1035 at [7], [2002] IRLR 629 at [7], [2002] ICR 1289).

[4] The employment tribunal then asked (at para 13) whether the individual respondents were assigned to the undertaking at the time of the transfer commencing. In its view they clearly were. The Court of Appeal considered (at [30]) that the tribunal had been fully entitled to conclude that the management skills of such of the department's employees as were happy to continue in work under the supervision of Celtec formed part of the undertaking which was being transferred.

[5] It was of course necessary for the employment tribunal to decide whether the undertaking it had defined had been transferred. It concluded (at paras 11–12) that it had. In the EAT (at paras 3, 43) Celtec accepted that there had been a transfer of an undertaking. In the Court of Appeal (at 7) it was effectively agreed that the undertaking had been transferred.

[6] What was and remains the divisive question is when the transfer occurred. The employment tribunal assumed (at para 20) that September 1990 when Celtec commenced business was the date on which the transfer commenced, but thought transfer was a long process 'starting some time in 1990 as affects these applicants and ending on a national basis some time in 1996'. In the EAT ([2001] IRLR 788 at 800 (para 99)) the majority view was that the tribunal, rightly directing itself, would have concluded that the transfer was probably completed in about September 1990 and certainly long before 1993. The Court of Appeal accepted (at [32]) the tribunal's test and its conclusion. In the statement of facts and issues agreed in the House it was accepted that Celtec became operational in September 1990 (see para 12). In summarising the essential facts agreed between the parties in its reference to the ECJ the House recorded (in para 13) that the respondent employees were 'full-time employees whose work was dedicated to the undertaking and they were therefore assigned to the undertaking prior to the transfer', and the summary continued (in para 14):

> 'On the day in September 1990 when NEWTEC commenced operations there was no difference between the work they did and the work they had done as civil servants the day before. They worked from the same desks, in the same building. The programmes which the Government had guaranteed to provide for prospective, and current, trainees had to be continued. The careers of young people depended on these and there could be no interruption of activities. The Government had a responsibility to the trainees which could not be interrupted. A seamless transition was important even if the economic structure was to change with time.'

In its written case on this appeal Celtec affirms that Celtec 'commenced operations in September 1990 when it took over the premises, information systems and databases of the [department] area offices'.

[7] As the opinions of my noble and learned friends make clear, the arguments of the parties were advanced below on a basis somewhat different from that which they now put forward. Celtec said that the transfer was in September 1990; but the respondent employees were not (in effect) part of what was then transferred; so they cannot gain the benefit of the legislation. The respondent employees contended that the transfer took place over a period, and each of the respondent employees was part of what was transferred from time to time, so that they could claim the benefit of the legislation. The ECJ accepted neither of these approaches, ruling (if I understand the judgment correctly) that transfer must take place on a single date on which responsibility as employer for carrying on the business transferred moves from the transferor to the transferee and that this date cannot be postponed to another date at the will of either. It seems to me to follow inexorably that the transfer took place in September 1990 and the later dates of transfer agreed with the individual respondent employees are to be disregarded.

[8] In agreement with my noble and learned friend Lord Hope I conceive it to be the duty of this House to give effect to the law as declared in Luxembourg. But I agree, of course, that if it would unfairly prejudice Celtec to do so without giving it an opportunity to adduce further evidence or argument that course would have to be followed, however reluctantly after the lapse of so many years. In this instance, I agree with my noble and learned friend that such a course need not be followed, for two main reasons: (1) Celtec have long accepted September 1990 as the date of effective transfer. This is a matter partly of fact, partly of law. But the factual element is very prominent. The facts cannot be changed because an unforeseen legal argument makes them damaging to Celtec's case. (2) It is plain from the findings made below that Celtec set up in business in September 1990 and the employees seconded from the department were the core of the business: without them there could have been no effective transfer. It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that they were the business. I readily accept that the respondent employees did not think that they became employees of Celtec in September 1990, and it was not intended that they should become employees then. There are other potential difficulties and problems in concluding that they did. But these spring from the fiction to which I alluded at the outset, and from the government's decision to structure the transfer in this unusual way.

[9] For the reasons given by Lord Hope, and these brief reasons of my own, I would dismiss this appeal and invite written submissions on costs within 21 days.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[10] My Lords, this case arises out of a dispute between the appellant, North Wales Training and Enterprise Council Ltd, trading as Celtec Ltd (Celtec), and a group of its employees about the length of their continuous employment with the company for the purpose of establishing redundancy entitlements and other accrued rights. The dispute relates to the interpretation and application of art 3(1) of Council Directive (EEC) 77/187 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses) (OJ 1977 L061 p 26) (the acquired rights directive), which has now been consolidated with subsequent amendments and repealed by Council Directive (EC) 2001/23 (OJ 2001 L082 p 16).

[11] The respondents, John Astley, Julie Owens and Deborah Lynn Hawkes, were all employed by the Department of Employment (the DoE) as civil servants before they took up direct employment with a predecessor of Celtec following the transfer of part of the DoE's undertaking to the predecessor as part of a privatisation initiative. They contend that their periods of continuous employment with Celtec and its predecessor should include their periods of service with the civil service prior to the date when they entered into the direct employment of the predecessor. Celtec contend that the respondents' periods of service with the civil service should be excluded from the computation. The respondents raised proceedings for determination of this issue in the employment tribunal as representatives of the group of employees to which they belong. The issue affects a large number of other civil servants who transferred from the civil service to other employers in the private sector during the early 1990s in similar circumstances.

BACKGROUND

[12] Until 1989 the DoE managed the training of young people and unemployed adults in England and Wales through about 60 local area offices. These area offices were all staffed by civil servants. In December 1988 the government published a White Paper entitled Employment for the 1990s (Cm 540) which set out an agenda for action for the next decade. Among the changes which it envisaged was the transfer of part of the DoE's vocational training responsibilities to bodies to be known as training and enterprise councils (TECs). The TECs were to plan and deliver training and to promote and support the development of small businesses and self-employment within their area under contracts with the government. They were to take over all the training work that had previously been carried on in the area offices. These proposals were put into effect, and 82 TECs were set up. By November 1991 all the TECs in England and Wales had become operational.

[13] It was understood from the outset between the TECs and the DoE, on whom the TECs were dependent for the funding of their operations, that the TECs were to be entitled to recruit their own staff. Most of them did so from the date they became operational. But they were new organisations, and the work to be undertaken required an understanding of the government policy that the contracts were designed to deliver. So the DoE, with the agreement of the TECs, issued an invitation to staff in its area offices to volunteer for secondment to the newly created TECs. They were invited to do so initially for a period of three years. Those who wished to volunteer were told that during the secondment period they would continue to be civil servants employed by the DoE. As such, they would retain their normal pay and terms and conditions of employment as embodied in the DoE's personnel handbook. They were also told that they could, if they wished, accept additional payments and benefits offered to them by the TEC, but that the right to any such payments or benefits would cease at the end of their secondment. They would not form part of their terms and conditions of employment as civil servants.

[14] The TECs welcomed the contribution made by the seconded staff. But they made it clear that, as private companies, they wanted to employ all their own staff on terms and conditions determined by them. In 1991 discussions took place with the TECs, seconded staff and the relevant trade unions about future staffing arrangements. All seconded staff were informed that they would be free to choose any offer of employment that a TEC might make or, if they preferred, to return to the DoE or the wider civil service for redeployment. In December 1991 the Secretary of State announced that secondments would be phased out by the end of each TEC's fifth year of operation. The DoE agreed with the TECs that it would reimburse them should a court or tribunal decide, in the case of a dismissal of a former civil servant, that his or her period of employment with the TEC must be deemed to have been continuous with that in the civil service for the purpose of calculating that person's rights on redundancy.

[15] The area offices of the DoE in Wrexham and Bangor were taken over by the North East Wales TEC (Newtec). It had a board of directors drawn from local businessmen. It became operational in September 1990. On 1 April 1997 Newtec and the TEC for North West Wales, called Targed, were merged by the creation of a new body called Celtec. 43 civil servants were initially seconded to Newtec. When the secondments ended 18 of them resigned from the civil service and took up employment with Newtec. Ten chose to remain as civil servants, and they were redeployed. 13 resigned from the civil service, and two left the civil service for other reasons. Of the 40 civil servants seconded to Targed, ten resigned to take up employment with the TEC, nine retired and the rest left for other reasons.

[16] Mr Astley, Ms Hawkes and Ms Owens entered the civil service on 31 August 1973, 4 November 1985 and 21 April 1986 respectively. As civil servants they were responsible for vocational training in North Wales. Their work was entirely devoted to that service prior to its transfer to Newtec. They were all seconded to Newtec when it commenced operations on 17 September 1990. There was no difference between the work they did before and after the date of their secondment. They worked from the same desks in the same building. This arrangement ensured that there was a seamless transition from the old system to the new in the provision of the programmes which the government had undertaken to provide for the trainees. Towards the end of the period of their secondment they resigned from civil service to become direct employees of the TEC. Ms Hawkes and Ms Owens resigned from the civil service on 30 June 1993. Mr Astley resigned on 31 August 1993. Ms Hawkes's and Ms Owens's contract of employment with the TEC commenced on 1 July 1993. Mr Astley's contract commenced on 1 September 1993. There was no gap in time between their resignations from the civil service and their employment by Newtec.

[17] In 1998 Ms Hawkes was dismissed by Celtec on the ground of redundancy. The DoE took the view that there was no continuity of service between the periods of her employment with the civil service and the TEC, as she had chosen freely to resign from the civil service to take up employment with an employer in the private sector. Mr Astley and Ms Owens feared that they too were at risk of being dismissed for redundancy. All three sought a determination by the employment tribunal as to the length of the period of continuous employment on which they were able to rely. Their argument was that it should include their periods of employment with the civil service as well as those with Newtec and Celtec.

THE LEGISLATION

[18] The respondents all rely on the provisions of the acquired rights directive and s 218 of the Employment Rights Act 1996. Mr Astley also relies on reg 5 of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981, SI 1981/1794 (TUPE), as amended by s 33 of the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993 with effect from 30 August 1993. As from that date, which was the day before Mr Astley resigned from the civil service, the definition of the expression 'undertaking' in reg 2(1) of TUPE which had previously been restricted to commercial organisations was amended to include any trade or business. It is common ground however that Celtec fails to be treated as an emanation of the state for present purposes and that Mr Astley's primary claim is under the acquired rights directive.

[19] The preamble to the acquired rights directive stated that it was adopted because it was 'necessary to provide for the protection of employees in the event of a change of employer, in particular, to ensure that their rights are safeguarded'. Article 1(1) provided: 'This Directive shall apply to the transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business to another employer as a result of a legal transfer or merger.' Article 2 provided:

> 'For the purposes of this Directive: (a) "transferor" means any natural or legal person who, by reason of a transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1), ceases to be the employer in respect of the undertaking, business or part of the business; (b) "transferee" means any natural or legal person who, by reason of a transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1), becomes the employer in respect of the undertaking, business or part of the business . . .'

[20] Article 3(1) of the acquired rights directive was in these terms:

> 'The transferor's rights and obligations arising from a contract of employment or from an employment relationship existing on the date of a transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1) shall, by reason of such transfer, be transferred to the transferee.
>
> Member States may provide that, after the date of transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1) and in addition to the transferee, the transferor shall continue to be liable in respect of obligations which arose from a contract of employment or an employment relationship.'

[21] The acquired rights directive was transposed into domestic law by TUPE. Regulation 5(1) of TUPE, as amended by s 33 of the 1993 Act, provides:

> 'Except where objection is made under paragraph (4A) below, a relevant transfer shall not operate so as to terminate the contract of employment of any person employed by the transferor in the undertaking or part transferred but any such contract which would otherwise have been terminated by the transfer shall have effect after the transfer as if originally made between the person so employed and the transferee.'

[22] Part XIV of the 1996 Act contains the interpretation provisions for the purposes of the statutory employment rights conferred by the Act. Chapter 1 of that Part deals with the concept of continuous employment, which is entirely a creature of statute. Section 210(1) states that references in any provision of the Act to a period of continuous employment are to a period computed in accordance with that chapter. Section 218 deals with how that period is to be computed in the event of a change of employer. Subsections (1) and (2) of that section are in these terms:

> '(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, this Chapter relates only to employment by the one employer.

a (2) If a trade or business, or an undertaking (whether or not established by or under an Act), is transferred from one person to another—(a) the period of employment of an employee in the trade or business or undertaking at the time of the transfer counts as a period of employment with the transferee, and (b) the transfer does not break the continuity of the period of employment.'

b

THE PROCEEDINGS

[23] On 22 December 1999 an employment tribunal sitting at Abergele determined that all three respondents had continuous employment from the start of their employment with the civil service under s 218 of the 1996 Act and the c acquired rights directive, and that Mr Astley also had continuity of employment by virtue of art 5(1) of TUPE. It found that there had been a TUPE transfer commencing in September 1990 when Newtec started business. It also found that the transfer took place over a number of years until 1996 when the last of the secondments to TECs from the civil service came to an end. In para 20 of its d determination the tribunal said:

'Our analysis is that each time a seconded employee became directly employed by the TEC there was another transaction and immediately before that transaction ("any transaction") that employee was employed by the transferor, ie by the civil service and therefore that employee's rights passed e over to the transferee which was the TEC. We see no reason in principle why such a very long period should not be found to be a period of the transfer when that was plain from the outset.'

[24] On 5 October 2001 the Employment Appeal Tribunal, by a majority, f allowed an appeal by Celtec against the employment tribunal's determination (see [2001] IRLR 788). It had been accepted for the purposes of that appeal that the tribunal's conclusion that there was a transfer of an undertaking was not open to challenge. The appeal was directed to the question when the transfer took place. It was held that the test for determining the time at which a transfer is completed was when the new employer was in actual occupation and control of g the old business. On that basis the tribunal ought to have concluded that the transfer was probably completed in about September 1990 and certainly long before 1993. It followed that the respondents remained employed by the civil service after the transfer, and their continuity of employment was not preserved when they accepted employment with Newtec.

h [25] On 19 July 2002 the Court of Appeal (Schiemann and Laws LJJ, Jackson J) allowed an appeal by the respondents against the determination of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (see [2002] EWCA Civ 1035, [2002] IRLR 629, [2002] ICR 1289). Delivering the opinion of the court, Schiemann LJ said that the employment tribunal was entitled to hold that the management skills of j the seconded employees formed part of the undertaking that was being transferred (see [30]). Addressing then the question whether the wording of the acquired rights directive implied that the transfer of the undertaking must take place at a moment in time, he said that the acquired rights directive was sufficiently wide in its terms to embrace a transfer of a business which took place over a period (see [31]). At [32] he said:

'. . . Once one accepts that a business can be transferred over a period of time, the establishment of the period of time during which the transfer takes place is a task for the tribunal of fact. We see no legal error in what was done by the [employment tribunal].'

[26] Celtec appealed against that decision to your Lordships' House. The parties were agreed that the respondents remained employees of the civil service during the period of their secondments. They were also agreed that the issue in the appeal was whether the employment tribunal erred in law in finding that the relevant transfer took place over a long period of time. They submitted that a reference should be made to the Court of Justice of the European Communities (ECJ) under art 234 EC for a preliminary ruling on this point. On 10 November 2003 the House referred the following questions to the ECJ:

'1. Are the words "the transferor's rights and obligations arising from a contract of employment or from an employment relationship existing on the date of a transfer" in Article 3(1) of Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses to be interpreted as meaning that there is a particular point of time at which the transfer of the undertaking or part thereof is deemed to have been completed and the transfer of rights and obligations pursuant to Article 3(1) is effected?

2. If the answer to question 1 is "yes", how is that particular point of time to be identified?

3. If the answer to question 1 is "no", how are the words "on the date of a transfer" in Article 3(1) to be interpreted?'

[27] Celtec's contention before the ECJ was that the relevant words in art 3(1) of the acquired rights directive should be interpreted as meaning that there was a particular point of time at which a transfer of an undertaking or part thereof was deemed to have been complete and the rights and obligations of the transferor arising from a contract of employment existing on the date of the transfer were transferred to the transferee. They submitted that any later movement of employees from the transferor to the transferee was not within the scope of the acquired rights directive. The respondents' contention was that, while it was necessary to identify a date on or by which a transfer of an undertaking had been completed, this did not preclude the national court from finding that the transfer took place in stages, or over a period of time, or was effected by a series of transactions. They submitted that employees who remained employed in the undertaking during the process of transfer, or who were employed at the time of the stages or transactions by which the transfer was effected and who did not resign from the transferor's employment voluntarily or otherwise object to the transfer, are entitled to the protection of the acquired rights directive.

[28] On 26 May 2005 the ECJ made the following rulings (see [2005] IRLR 647 at 658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1435 (para 46)):

'1. Article 3(1) of Council Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses must be interpreted as meaning that the date of a transfer within the meaning of that provision is the date on which responsibility as employer for carrying on the business of the unit transferred moves from the transferor to the transferee. That date is a particular point in time which cannot be postponed to another date at the will of the transferor or transferee.

2. For the purposes of applying that provision, contracts of employment or employment relationships existing on the date of the transfer within the meaning stated in para. 1 of the operative part between the transferor and the workers assigned to the undertaking transferred are deemed to be handed over, on that date, from the transferor to the transferee, regardless of what has been agreed between the parties in that respect.'

THE ISSUES BEFORE THE HOUSE

[29] One might have expected the rulings by the ECJ as to whether the transfer took place over period of time to have resolved the issue between the parties. The case has been argued hitherto on the assumption that the respondents remained civil servants during their secondment to Newtec. A statement to this effect appears in para 7 of the statement of facts and issues. Celtec submit that in the light of the ECJ's ruling as to the date of the transfer the appeal should be allowed and that it be determined that the respondents' periods of continuous service began when, after resigning from the civil service, they took up direct employment with Newtec.

[30] The respondents submit however that the only issue that has to be determined is whether, in the light of the ECJ's judgment, their continuity of employment was broken in 1993 when they resigned from the civil service and accepted an offer of employment with Newtec. They contend that, assuming now that the date of the transfer was in September 1990 and not over a period as they had previously submitted, their accrued rights were protected by the acquired rghts directive. This is because their contracts of employment are deemed to have been handed over to Newtec at the date of the transfer. This, they say, is the inevitable consequence of art 3 of the acquired rights directive as interpreted by the ECJ.

[31] Mr Bowers QC for Celtec pointed out that the argument which the respondents were now seeking to advance is a new argument. The premise on which the case had been sent for a preliminary ruling was that the only question between the parties was whether there had to be a single date for the transfer. It had been assumed that the answer to that question would determine the case. He submitted that the respondents ought not to be permitted to raise this new point at this stage. In any event, the effect of the ECJ's ruling was that the employment tribunal had been proceeding on a false premise when it assumed that the transfer could take place over a long period. As a result the basis on which the respondents chose to remain with the transferor after the date of the transfer was not before the tribunal for its determination. So it had not been asked to consider whether it was by their own decision that the respondents agreed to be seconded to Newtec while remaining as employees of the DoE If this question was to be considered now it would have to be remitted to the tribunal for its determination.

[32] There are then two preliminary questions which your Lordships must consider before applying the rulings by the ECJ to the facts of this case. These are whether the respondents should be permitted to argue that the effect of the ruling by the ECJ is that the continuity of their employment was not broken in 1993

despite the fact that the transfer of the undertaking to Newtec must now be held to have taken place on a single date in September 1990 and, if so, whether that issue can be determined by the House on the information that is available or must be remitted to the tribunal for its determination.

THE ECJ'S JUDGMENT

[33] There is no doubt that the ECJ's ruling went further than was strictly necessary for a determination of the question whether the transfer of the undertaking took place on a single date or over a period. It went out [of] its way to make it plain, in its answer in para 1 to the questions on which a preliminary ruling had been sought, that that date was a particular point of time which could not be postponed to another date at the will of the transferor or transferee. And it went further still when it ruled in para 2, drawing on its previous case law, that contracts of employment existing on the date of the transfer between the transferor and the workers assigned to the undertaking transferred are deemed to be handed over on that date from the transferor to the transferee regardless of what has been agreed between the parties in that respect.

[34] I take this to be a clear indication that, notwithstanding the court's ruling that the transfer took place on a particular point of time and not over a period, it was open to the national court to hold that the respondents' continuity of employment was not broken when they accepted employment with Newtec in 1993. This feature of the decision makes it necessary to examine the court's reasoning more closely.

[35] The reasoning on which the first sentence of the ruling in para 1 was based appears in paras 26–36 of the ECJ's judgment (see [2005] IRLR 647 at 657–658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1432–1434). In para 26 the court referred to what it has repeatedly held to be the purpose of the acquired rights directive in, for example, d'Urso v Ercole Marelli Elettromeccanica Generale SpA Case C-362/89 [1992] IRLR 136 at 138, [1991] ECR I-4105 at 4142–4143 (para 9). It is intended to safeguard the rights of workers in the event of a change of employer by making it possible for them to continue to work for the new employer on the same conditions as those agreed with the transferor. Its purpose is to ensure, as far as possible, that the contract of employment continues unchanged with the transferee, in order to prevent the workers concerned from being placed in a less favourable position solely as a result of the transfer. Accordingly art 3(1) of the acquired rights directive covers the transferor's rights and obligations arising from a contract of employment existing on the date of the transfer and entered into with employees who, in order to carry out their duties, were assigned to the undertaking transferred (see [2005] IRLR 647 at 657, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1432–1433 (para 28)). In para 29 the court said that the protection of art 3(1) covers workers assigned to the unit affected by the transfer whose contract of employment or employment relationship is in force on the 'date of a transfer', and not those who have ceased to be employed by the transferor on that date or those who were engaged by the transferee after that date.

[36] In para 30 the court added this observation, the effect of which was to emphasise the close link that exists between establishing the date of the transfer and the protection of workers whose contracts of employment were in force at that date:

> 'Both the choice of the word "date" and reasons of legal certainty indicate that, in the mind of the Community legislature, the workers entitled to benefit from the protection established by Article 3(1) of Directive 77/187 must be identified at a particular point in the transfer process and not in relation to the length of time over which that process extends.'

The court concluded this part of its discussion with these words (at para 36):

'In those circumstances, the term "date of a transfer" in Article 3(1) of Directive 77/187 must be understood as referring to the date on which responsibility as employer for carrying on the business of the unit in question moves from the transferor to the transferee.'

[37] The court then turned its attention to the issue which it saw as lying at the heart of the reference. This was the subject of the second sentence of its ruling in para 1 and of its ruling in para 2. It introduced this part of the discussion with these observations ([2005] IRLR 647 at 658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1434):

'37. As the court has already held, implementation of the rights conferred on employees by Article 3(1) of Directive 77/187 may not be made subject to the consent of either the transferor or the transferee nor to the consent of the employees' representatives or the employees themselves, with the sole reservation, as regards the workers themselves, that, following a decision freely taken by them, they are at liberty, after the transfer, not to continue the employment relationship with the new employer (see [Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v A/S Danmols Inventar Case 105/84 [1985] ECR 2639 at 2651 (para 16)] and [d'Urso v Ercole Marelli Elettromeccanica Generale SpA Case C-362/89 [1992] IRLR 136 at 138, [1991] ECR I-4105 at 4143 (para 11)]).

38. It follows that, with that sole reservation, contracts of employment or employment relationships existing on the date of the transfer referred to in Article 3(1) of Directive 77/187 between the transferor and the workers assigned to the undertaking transferred are automatically transferred from the transferor to the transferee by the mere fact of the transfer of the undertaking (see [d'Urso v Ercole Marelli Elettromeccanica Generale SpA Case C-362/89 [1992] IRLR 136 at 138, [1991] ECR I-4105 at 4145 (para 20)], and [Hertaing v J Benoidt SA (in liq) Case C-305/94 [1997] All ER (EC) 40 at 50, [1996] ECR I-5927 at 5945–5946 (para 18)]).'

[38] In para 40 the court referred, in support of that interpretation, to the second subparagraph of art 3(1) which gives member states the option of providing that, after the date of the transfer, the transferor is to be liable, alongside the transferee, for the obligations arising from a contract of employment or employment relationship. It said that this rule implies that in any event those obligations are transferred to the transferee on the date of the transfer. It added ([2005] IRLR 647 at 658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1434 (para 42)) that to allow the transferor or transferee the possibility of choosing the date from which the contract of employment or employment relationship is transferred would amount to allowing employers to derogate, at least temporarily, from the provisions of the acquired rights directive. As those provisions are mandatory, it is not possible to derogate from them in a manner unfavourable to employees.

[39] The court concluded this part of the discussion with these observations (at para 43):

'For the same reasons as those stated in paragraphs 40 to 42 of this judgment, it must be held that, for the purposes of applying Article 3(1) of

Directive 77/187, contracts of employment or employment relationships existing on the date of the transfer referred to by that provision between the transferor and the workers assigned to the undertaking transferred are deemed to be handed over, on that date, from the transferor to the transferee, regardless of what has been agreed between the parties to the transfer process in that respect.'

[40] The court's judgment shows that the respondents' original position, that the continuity of employment which they sought was preserved because the transfer took place over a period of time, was based on a misunderstanding of the effect of art 3(1) of the acquired rights directive. But it also shows that there were two aspects to that misunderstanding. The first relates to the date of the transfer. The second relates to the question whether that date can be postponed at the will of the transferor or the transferee. The respondents' argument had assumed that it was not possible for their contracts of employment to be transferred to the transferee during the period of their secondment. The court's ruling that contracts of employment existing on the date of the transfer between the transferor and the workers assigned to the undertaking transferred are deemed to be handed over from the transferor to the transferee on the date of the transfer casts an entirely different light on this argument.

SHOULD LEAVE BE GIVEN TO ARGUE THIS POINT?

[41] The question then is whether the respondents should be permitted to argue that the effect of the ruling by the ECJ is that the continuity of their employment was not broken when they resigned from the civil service and accepted an offer of employment by Newtec, notwithstanding the fact that this took place after the date of the transfer. In effect, the question is whether your Lordships should decline to give effect to the ECJ's judgment because the ruling which it has given has raised a point that was not previously argued. I would hold that the answer to this question is to be found by applying the principles described in Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v Simmenthal SpA (No 2) Case 106/77 [1978] ECR 629. It is necessary also to have regard to art 10 EC, which provides that member states shall take all appropriate measures to ensure fulfilment of the obligations arising out of the Treaty and abstain from any measure which could jeopardise the attainment of those obligations.

[42] In the Simmenthal case the court said that direct applicability of a provision of Community law means that rules of Community law must be fully and uniformly applied in all the member states as from the date of their entry into force and for so long as they continue in force (see 643 (para 14)). Referring to the structure of art 177 of the EC Treaty (now art 234 EC) which provides for the making of a reference to the court for a preliminary ruling, it said that the effectiveness of that provision would be impaired if the national court were prevented from forthwith applying Community law in its entirety in accordance with the decision or the case law of the court and that it followed that every national court must, in a case within its jurisdiction, apply Community law in its entirety and protect rights which the latter confers on individuals (see 644 (paras 19, 20)).

[43] In the light of that guidance I would reject Celtec's contention that it is not open to the respondents to argue at this stage that, for the purposes of art 3(1) of the acquired rights directive, their contracts of employment must be deemed to have been handed over to Newtec on the date of the transfer. In my opinion it is the duty of the national court to give them that opportunity, in view of the ECJ's ruling that contracts of employment existing on the date of the transfer between the transferor and workers assigned to the undertaking transferred are deemed to be handed over from the transferor to the transferee on the date of the transfer.

SHOULD THE HOUSE DETERMINE THE ISSUE?

[44] There remains however the question whether Celtec's argument that the respondents' contracts of employment were not transferred to Newtec on the date of the transfer because they freely decided to remain in the civil service can be determined by the House on the information that is available. This question is best divided into two parts. It is first necessary to identify the precise extent of the sole reservation from the general rule that contracts of employment are automatically transferred from the transferor to the transferee on the date of the transfer. It is then necessary to decide whether the question whether the reservation applies to this case can be answered on the existing material or must be remitted to the employment tribunal for its determination.

(a) The extent of the reservation

[45] The ECJ dealt with the consent issue in para 37 of its judgment ([2005] IRLR 647 at 658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1434: see [37], above). The basic proposition which is set out in that paragraph is that implementation of the rights conferred on employees by art 3(1) of the acquired rights directive may not be made subject to the consent of either the transferor or the transferee nor to the consent of the employees' representatives or the employees themselves. From this it follows that the fact that it was agreed between the DoE and the TECs that the staff who understood the government policy that the contracts were designed to deliver would be provided to the TECs on secondment initially for a period of three years is irrelevant to the question whether the respondents' employment contracts are to be deemed to have been handed over to Newtec on the date of the transfer. So too is the fact that it was agreed between the DoE and those who volunteered for secondment that they would continue to be employed by the civil service during the period of their secondment. But the basic proposition is subject to the sole reservation as regards the workers themselves referred to in para 37, that they are at liberty after the transfer, following a decision freely taken by them, not to continue the employment relationship with the transferee. Are the respondents' cases caught by that reservation?

[46] Celtec's argument is that the reservation applies to the respondents' cases because they freely decided to remain civil servants after the date of the transfer by volunteering for secondment to Newtec. It is not in doubt that they volunteered for secondment on the terms that were offered to them. They were to continue to be civil servants employed by the DoE, and they were to retain their normal pay and terms and conditions of employment during the period of their secondment. But is this the kind of arrangement that the ECJ had in mind when expressing what it described as 'the sole reservation' (para 37)? Mr Millar QC for the respondents submitted that it applied only to cases where the workers objected to taking up employment with the transferee in circumstances where taking up that employment was an option that was available.

[47] To answer this question it is necessary to examine the two cases to which reference is made at the end of para 37 of the ECJ's judgment. These are Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v A/S Danmols Inventar Case 105/84 [1985] ECR 2639, sometimes referred to as the Mikkelsen case after the name of the person whose action against the defendant company led to the making of the reference, and d'Urso v Ercole Marelli Elettromeccanica Generale SpA Case C-362/89 [1992] IRLR 136, [1991] ECR I-4105.

[48] In the Mikkelsen case Mr Mikkelsen was employed by the transferor Danmols Inventar A/S as works foreman. The undertaking of that company was transferred to Danmols Inventar og Møbelfabrik A/S. He continued to carry out his duties as works foreman in the new company. He did the same work and he received the same pay in that capacity as before the transfer (see [1985] ECR 2639 at 2647 (para 4)). But, unlike his previous situation where he [was] doing his work under a contract of employment, he was a shareholder in the new company. He held 33% of its shares, was chairman of the Board of Directors and held 50% of its voting rights. One of the questions in the case was whether the expression 'employee' in art 3(1) of the acquired rights directive must be interpreted as applying to persons who were employed by the transferor at the date of the transfer but who did not continue to work as employees of the transferee. The court answered this question in the negative. In para 16 (at 2651) it said that the protection which the acquired rights directive was intended to guarantee is redundant where the person concerned decides of his own accord not to continue the employment relationship with the new employer after the transfer, adding:

> 'That is the case where the employee in question terminates the employment contract or employment relationship of his own free will with effect from the date of the transfer, or where that contract or relationship is terminated with effect from the date of the transfer by virtue of an agreement voluntarily concluded between the worker and the transferor or the transferee of the undertaking. In that situation Article 3(1) of the directive does not apply.'

[49] In d'Urso's case Mr d'Urso was one of a group of 518 employees of a company called EMG which was made subject to a special administration procedure in 1981 but was authorised to continue trading. In 1985 its entire undertaking was transferred to a new company called Nuova EMG. Pursuant to the contract of transfer, and in accordance with agreements reached with the trade unions, 940 of the employees of the transferor were transferred into the service of the transferee. But Mr d'Urso and the other employees in his group remained in the service of the transferor. One of the questions in the case was whether art 3(1) of the acquired rights directive was to be interpreted as meaning that all the contracts and relationships of employment existing at the date of the transfer are automatically transferred to the transferee by the mere fact of the transfer. The court said ([1992] IRLR 136 at 138, [1991] ECR I-4105 at 4143 (para 10)) that it followed from its case law that art 3(1) covered the rights and obligations of the transferor arising from a contract of employment or an employment relationship existing on the date of the transfer and entered into with employees who, in order to carry out their duties, are assigned to the part of the undertaking or business transferred (see Botzen v Rotterdamsche Droogdok Maatschappij BV Case 186/83 [1985] ECR 519 at 528 (para 16)). In para 11 it referred to its decision in Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v Daddy's Dance Hall A/S Case 324/86 [1988] IRLR 315 at 317, [1988] ECR 739 at 754 (para 14), that the rules of the acquired rights directive had to be considered mandatory. It was not possible to derogate from them in a manner unfavourable to employees. The court then added these words:

> '... the implementation of the rights conferred on employees by the Directive may not therefore be made subject to the consent of either the transferor or the transferee nor the consent of the employees' representatives or the employees themselves, with the sole reservation, as regards the workers themselves, that, following a decision freely taken by them, they are at liberty, after the transfer, not to continue the employment relationship with the new employer (judgment in [Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v A/S Danmols Inventar Case 105/84 [1985] ECR 2639 at 2651 (para 16)]).'

In para 12 the court said that it followed that, in the event of the transfer of an undertaking, the contract of employment or employment relationship between the staff employed by the undertaking transferred may not be maintained with the transferor. It is automatically continued with the transferee.

[50] In Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v Daddy's Dance Hall A/S Mr Tellerup was employed as a restaurant manager by the transferor, Irma Catering A/S. When its lease was terminated Irma Catering dismissed all its staff including Mr Tellerup, whose statutory period of notice expired on 30 April 1983. But it continued to run the business with the same staff until 25 February 1983, with effect from which date a new lease was concluded between the landlord and Daddy's Dance Hall A/S. Daddy's Dance Hall immediately re-employed the employees of the former lessee including Mr Tellerup to do the same jobs as before. The new management contract which was concluded with Mr Tellerup provided that his remuneration, which had previously been in the form of commission, would take the form of a fixed salary. At his request a trial period of three months was agreed on, during which either side could give 14 days' notice. This was a shorter period of notice than that to which Mr Tellerup was entitled if his employment with the transferor was taken into account. He was dismissed on 26 April 1983 with 14 days' notice. One of the questions was whether an employee may waive rights conferred on him by the acquired rights directive if the disadvantages resulting from his waiver are offset by such benefits that, taking the matter as a whole, he is not placed in a worse position. The court gave a qualified answer to this question. In para 14 ([1988] ECR 739 at 754) it said that the purpose of the acquired rights directive is to ensure that the rights of employees affected by the transfer of an undertaking are safeguarded, adding that:

> 'Since this protection is a matter of public policy, and therefore independent of the will of the parties to the contract of employment, the rules of the directive, in particular those concerning the protection of workers against dismissal by reason of the transfer, must be considered to be mandatory, so that it is not possible to derogate from them in a manner unfavourable to employees.' (See also [1988] IRLR 315 at 317.)

In para 15 the court said that it followed that employees are not entitled to waive the rights conferred on them by the acquired rights directive, and that those rights cannot be restricted even with their consent. But in para 16 the court said that the acquired rights directive could be relied on only to ensure that the employee is protected in his relations with the transferee to the same extent as he was in his relations with the transferor under the legal rules of the member state. In para 17 it said:

> 'Consequently, in so far as national law allows the employment relationship to be altered in a manner unfavourable to employees in situations other than the transfer of an undertaking, in particular as regards their protection against dismissal, such an alternative is not precluded merely because the undertaking has been transferred in the meantime and the agreement has therefore been made with the new employer.'

[51] Mr Millar referred to two other cases to illustrate the application of these principles. These were Berg v Besselsen Joined cases 144/87 and 145/87 [1989] IRLR 447, [1990] ICR 396 and Katsikas v Konstantinidis Joined cases C-132/91, C-138/91 and C-139/91 [1993] IRLR 179, [1992] ECR I-6577.

[52] In Berg v Besselsen Mr Berg had been employed by a Mr Besselsen who operated a bar-discothèque. The operation of the establishment was taken over by a third party under a lease-purchase agreement entered into between Mr Besselsen and a commercial partnership. The agreement provided that the object sold should not become the property of the purchaser by the mere transfer. Mr Berg continued to work in the establishment following its transfer to the purchaser. The lease-purchase agreement was later terminated on the ground of the purchaser's non-performance and restored to Mr Berg's former employer. Mr Berg then applied for an order against Mr Besselsen for payment of his arrears of salary for the period while the establishment was managed by the purchaser. The court said that an analysis of art 3(1) showed that the transfer of an undertaking entails the automatic transfer from the transferor to the transferee of the employer's obligations arising from a contract of employment or an employment relationship, subject to the right of the member state to provide for joint liability of the transferor and the transferee following the transfer. It followed that, unless the member states availed themselves of that possibility, the transferor was released from his obligations as an employer by reason of the transfer. That consequence was not conditional on the consent of the employees (see [1989] IRLR 447 at 450, [1990] ICR 396 at 405 (para 11)). The court then said ([1990] ICR 396 at 405 (para 12)), referring to its judgment in the Daddy's Dance Hall case, that the acquired rights directive was intended to safeguard the rights of workers in the event of a change of employer by making it possible for them to work for the transferee under the same conditions as those agreed with the transferor:

> 'Its purpose is not, however, to ensure that the contract of employment or the employment relationship with the transferor is continued where the undertaking's employees do not wish to remain in the transferee's employ.' (See also [1989] IRLR 447 at 450.)

[53] In Katsikas v Konstantinidis Joined cases C-132/91, C-138/91 and C-139/91 [1993] IRLR 179, [1992] ECR I-6577 Mr Katsikas objected to continuing to work for the transferee after the date of the transfer. One of the questions in his case was whether he was entitled to do so. The court, referring to its judgment in the Daddy's Dance Hall case, said that, while the acquired rights directive allowed the employee to remain in the employ of his new employer on the same conditions as were agreed with the transferor, it could not be interpreted as obliging the employee to continue his employment relationship with the transferee (see [1993] IRLR 179 at 183, [1992] ECR I-6577 at 6609 (para 31)). The court then went on to say this ([1992] ECR I-6577 at 6609 (para 32)):

> 'Such an obligation would jeopardize the fundamental rights of the employee, who must be free to choose his employer and cannot be obliged to work for an employer whom he has not freely chosen.' (See also [1993] IRLR 179 at 183.)

[54] From this jurisprudence I would draw these conclusions as to the extent of the reservation. The starting point is to be found in the general rule that the contracts of employment of workers assigned to the undertaking transferred are automatically transferred from the transferor to the transferee on the date of the transfer. Then there is the fact that it is not possible for this rule to be derogated from in a manner unfavourable to the employees. The rights conferred on them by the acquired rights directive may not be made subject to the consent either of the transferor or the transferee nor the consent of the employees' representatives or the employees themselves (see Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v Daddy's Dance Hall A/S Case 324/86 [1988] IRLR 315 at 317, [1988] ECR 739 at 754 (para 14); d'Urso v Ercole Marelli Elettromeccanica Generale SpA Case C-362/89 [1992] IRLR 136 at 138, [1991] ECR I-4105 at 4143 (para 11)). The gulf between what the parties themselves may have contemplated and what the rule requires may be quite large, as it is in this case. My noble and learned friend Lord Rodger of Earlsferry says that this puts in place a fictional version of events in place of what actually happened. But, as I read paras 37 and 38 of the court's judgment, it is the rule that must prevail. So I cannot agree with him that, to accommodate the arrangements that the parties thought they were entering into, the date of transfer must be taken to be 1 July 1993. The transfer took place in September 1990 when responsibility as employer for carrying on the business of the unit transferred moved to the TECs from the DoE.

[55] On the other hand it is a fundamental right of the employee to be free to choose his employer. So he cannot be obliged to work for an employer whom he has not freely chosen (see Katsikas v Konstantinidis Joined cases C-132/91, C-138/91 and C-139/91 [1993] IRLR 179 at 183, [1992] ECR I-6577 at 6609 (para 32)). From this it follows that it is open to an employee whose contract of employment would otherwise be transferred automatically from the transferor to the transferee on the date of the transfer of his own free will to withdraw from this arrangement by declining to enter the employment of the transferee (see the Mikkelsen case [1985] ECR 2639 at 2651 (para 16); Berg v Besselsen Joined cases 144/87 and 145/87 [1989] IRLR 447 at 450, [1990] ICR 396 at 405 (para 12); Katsikas v Konstantinidis Joined cases C-132/91, C-138/91 and C-139/91 [1993] IRLR 179 at 183, [1992] ECR I-6577 at 6609 (para 32)). That, then, is the extent of the sole reservation referred to in para 37. It does not, as my noble and learned friend Lord Mance suggests, work the other way round. It does not enable effect to be given to an employee's wish to continue to be employed by the transferor while continuing to be employed in the unit to which he has been assigned after its transfer to the transferee. But the application of the rule that he can withdraw from the arrangement depends on two things: first, that the employee is in a position to choose whether or not to enter the employment of the transferee after the date of the transfer; and second, that he in fact exercises that choice by deciding of his own free will not to do so.

(b) The facts

[56] The crucial question then is whether, in the light of that jurisprudence, the reservation to which the ECJ referred (in para 37) applies in this case. Were the respondents in a position on or after the date of the transfer to choose whether or not to enter the employment of Newtec? And did they in fact exercise that choice by deciding of their own free will not to do so?

[57] Celtec's position before the ECJ, as noted by Advocate General Poiares Maduro in his opinion ([2005] IRLR 647 at 652, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1435 (para 45)), was that the respondents implicitly refused to allow their contracts of employment to be transferred to Newtec. This was because they entered into a voluntary agreement with the DoE that they were to be seconded to the TECs whilst remaining DoE employees. This, Celtec argued, must be taken as a refusal by them to transfer their contracts of employment to the TECs. In para 46 the Advocate General said:

> 'Such an analysis cannot be accepted, since Celtec acknowledged at the hearing that the Department of Employment employees had not been offered a contract of employment with the TECs in September 1990. In any event, to accept that employees can tacitly refuse to transfer their contracts of employment would run counter to the spirit of Directive 77/187, which instead provides for the automatic transfer of contracts of employment as the consequence of the transfer . . .'

[58] I have not been able to find anything in the material before your Lordships that is inconsistent with the opinion on this issue which was formed by the Advocate General. The arrangements for the setting up of the TECs are described in a note by Andrew Tabor of the Operations Directorate in the Department for Education and Employment, which was formed on the merger of the DoE and the Department of Education in 1996. He makes it clear in para 8 of this note that the arrangement which led to the invitation to staff in the DoE's area offices to volunteer for secondment was arrived at by agreement between the DoE and the TECs. There is no suggestion that it was envisaged that the staff were to be presented with the option of taking up employment direct with the TECs at that stage. Nor is there any mention in the letters which were issued to the staff, of which the letter written to Mr Astley on 3 September 1990 is an example, of any such option. The only choice that he was offered was whether or not to apply for secondment.

[59] The letters did not address the problem about continuity of employment that would arise in the event of the staff being involved in a TUPE transfer of the unit to which they were assigned to Newtec. But the effect of what the letters did say ought not to be underestimated. Mr Astley was told that he would continue to be a civil servant during the secondment period, and he appears to have acted on this assurance. It was not suggested at any time during the hearing before your Lordships that giving effect to the judgment of the ECJ in the way I have indicated would deprive the staff of the benefit of any pension rights accrued between September 1990 and the summer of 1993. That is not surprising, in view of the assurances they were given that they would retain their normal pay and conditions during that period. It should be noted too that the judgment of the ECJ does not affect those civil servants who decided in September 1990 to be deployed elsewhere rather than volunteer for secondment to a TEC. They had no need of the continuity of employment that the judgment gives to employees who are involved in a TUPE transfer. It is to employees in that position, and to them only, that the concept of the deemed transfer applies.

[60] Of course it can be said that the respondents were in a position on the date of the transfer to choose not to work for Newtec. They could have made their position plain by declining to accept secondment. The effect of the DoE's invitation was that they were free to decline secondment if they wished. They could also have withdrawn from their agreement to accept secondment by refusing to work for Newtec as soon as the management of the area offices in which they were employed were transferred to it by the DoE. But it is equally plain that this was not what they chose to do. They continued to work in the area offices after the date of the transfer. The arrangement which the DoE had entered into with the TECs that their services were made available to them not as direct employees but under secondment did not affect the respondents' right to continuity of employment under the acquired rights directive, as their contracts were transferred to Newtec automatically on the date of the transfer.

[61] It seems to me to be plain in these circumstances that the sole reservation to the general rule to which the ECJ referred in para 37 of its judgment does not apply in this case. The respondents were in a position on or after the date of the transfer to choose of their own free will not to work for Newtec. But they did not make that choice. The fact is that they continued to do the same work in the area offices after the transfer of the undertaking to Newtec, albeit in the belief that they remained in the employment of the DoE This leads inevitably to the conclusion that their contracts of employment were transferred automatically to Newtec with continuity of employment on the date of the transfer.

CONCLUSION

[62] I would hold that it is not necessary for the case to be remitted to the employment tribunal for a further determination. I would affirm the decision of the employment tribunal, although on different grounds, that the respondents had continuous employment with Celtec from the start of their employment with the civil service by virtue of the acquired rights directive. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[63] My Lords, the respondents in these appeals worked at one time as civil servants in the Department of Employment (the department) in Wrexham. (No point is taken about the precise nature of the employment of civil servants and therefore I shall for convenience refer to the respondents as having had contracts of employment with the department.) The respondents were subsequently employed by the North East Wales Training and Enterprise Council Ltd (Newtec) whose successor is the appellant. The respondents each received from Newtec a statement of terms and conditions of employment as required by s 1 of the Employment Rights Act 1996. Each statement gave a date in 1993 (1 July or, in the case of John Astley, 1 September) as the date of commencement of the respondent's continuous employment with Newtec.

The respondents challenged that date and, in 1998, under s 11 of the 1996 Act they required a reference to be made to the employment tribunal to determine the appropriate date of commencement of their continuous employment. In their statements of complaint they all contended that they had become employees of Newtec on 31 August 1993 but that their employment with Newtec should be regarded as continuous with their employment with the department. Therefore the appropriate date of commencement of continuous employment was the date on which each of them had first been employed as a civil servant.

[64] In advancing this contention the respondents argued that, when they became employees of Newtec in 1993, there had been a transfer of the undertaking in which they worked from the department to Newtec in terms of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981, SI 1981/1794 (the TUPE regulations). As a result, by virtue of reg 5(1), their contracts with the department had effect after the transfer as if they had originally been made between the respondents and Newtec. For its part the appellant contended inter alia that, if there had been a transfer of part of the undertaking of the department to Newtec, that transfer had taken place at the time, or over the period, when Newtec became established and operational in September 1990. The respondents became employees some three years after that time or period and accordingly could not have continuity of employment under the TUPE regulations or the antecedent Council Directive.

[65] The TUPE regulations were made to give effect in United Kingdom law to Council Directive (EEC) 77/187 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses) (OJ 1977 L061 p 26), commonly known as the acquired rights directive (the directive). Notoriously, reg 2(1) of the TUPE Regulations was originally drafted so as to exclude from the definition of an 'undertaking' any undertaking or part of an undertaking which was not in the nature of a commercial venture. In May 1992, however, in Dr Sophie Redmond Stichting v Bartol Case C-29/91 [1992] IRLR 366, [1992] ECR I-3189, the European Court of Justice held ([1992] ECR I-3189 at 3219 (para 18)), that 'the fact that in this case the origin of the operation lies in the grant of subsidies to foundations or associations whose services are allegedly provided without remuneration does not exclude that operation from the scope of the Directive' (see also [1992] IRLR 366 at 369). The definition of 'undertaking' in reg 2 of the TUPE regulations required to be amended to take account of that decision and this was done by s 33(2) of the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993 which came into force on 30 August 1993 and removed the exclusion. According to the relevant documentation, the respondent John Astley became an employee of Newtec on 1 September 1993 and therefore he can properly frame his case in terms of the TUPE regulations—although, in my view, it ultimately falls to be determined by reference to the directive.

[66] According to the documentation in their cases, the respondents Deborah Hawkes and Julie Owens became employees of Newtec on 1 July 1993. So, by reason of the exclusion of non-commercial undertakings in reg 2(1) at the time, they cannot rely on the TUPE regulations. But the directive was, of course, binding on the government and on any emanation of the state. So any failure to transpose the directive correctly would make no difference to the position of the department: the directive bound it. Equally, it would make no difference to the position of Newtec if it was an emanation of the state in terms of decisions such as Foster v British Gas plc [1991] 2 All ER 705, [1991] 2 AC 306. Although at one stage the appellant argued that Newtec had not been an emanation of the state, it now accepts that it was. It follows that at all relevant times the department and Newtec were bound by the directive in so far as the events in question involved, in terms of art 1(1), 'the transfer of an undertaking, business or part of a business to another employer as a result of a legal transfer or merger'. In particular, they were bound by art 3, which provides inter alia:

> '1. The transferor's rights and obligations arising from a contract of employment or from an employment relationship existing on the date of a transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1) shall, by reason of such transfer, be transferred to the transferee.
>
> Member States may provide that, after the date of transfer within the meaning of Article 1(1) and in addition to the transferee, the transferor shall continue to be liable in respect of obligations which arose from a contract of employment or an employment relationship . . .
>
> 3. [Paragraph 1] shall not cover employees' rights to old-age, invalidity or survivors' benefits under supplementary company or inter-company pension schemes outside the statutory social security schemes in Member States . . .'

The appellant now also accepts that art 3 had direct effect and so Deborah Hawkes and Julie Owens can rely on it, so far as it may have been applicable to the events in question. In practice, the issues under the TUPE regulations and the directive are, for the most part, the same and so I shall concentrate on the directive.

[67] The events in the present case have to be seen against a somewhat wider backdrop. In 1988, as their White Paper Employment for the 1990s (Cm 540) explained, the then government decided that training could be better delivered and the development of small businesses and self-employment could be better promoted and supported if these activities were carried on by locally based training and enterprise councils (TECs), which would be companies with directors, including top-level employers, who were familiar with local conditions. Under contracts with the department, the TECs would, for instance, run the training agency offices which the department had previously run, but they would have an extended remit. Newtec was set up to carry out these functions in the area which included Wrexham. It started work in September 1990.

[68] From the outset the policy appears to have been that, eventually, all the services would be delivered by employees of the TECs. At that stage it would be up to the individual TECs to decide how many employees they required and who they should be. To begin with, however, while the TECs recruited some staff, the people with the relevant experience in providing the core services were those who had been doing so in the training agency area offices as civil servants in the department. So, if a break in the provision of the training and enterprise programme was to be avoided, these civil servants had to continue to do this work when the TECs took over.

[69] The terms and conditions on which government civil servants are employed have been formulated in negotiations with the relevant trade unions over many years. Those which applied to department civil servants in September 1990 were to be found in the current version of its personnel handbook. Prominent among the available benefits was, of course, an entitlement to a civil service pension. The employment tribunal made no detailed findings in fact about exactly what happened when Newtec was due to take over the department's activities in North East Wales in 1990. But Mr Millar QC, who appeared for the respondents, did not dispute that civil servants in the department (and their trade union representatives) would have been understandably apprehensive that, if they stopped being civil servants and became employees of the TECs, they would lose the benefit of their civil service terms and conditions. Another cause for possible concern would have been that they might face a less certain future with the untried TECs, whose financial position was not secured for the longer term and whose ethos might turn out to be rather different from that of the department.

[70] In fact, however, in 1990 no immediate change in the status of the department civil servants was in contemplation, partly at least because the government had not yet worked out a scheme which would be acceptable to the TECs. Instead, the civil servants were to remain civil servants, entitled to all their existing terms and conditions, but they were be seconded to the TECs for an initial period of three years. After that, there might be a further period of secondment. For North East Wales this was spelled out, for instance, in the letter to Mr Astley of 3 September 1990 from the Head of Personnel for Wales in the training agency:

> 'During the secondment period you will continue to be a Civil Servant employed by the Department of Employment and as such will retain your normal pay and Terms & Conditions of Employment as embodied in the Department's Personnel Handbook. A summary outlining the main Terms & Conditions is enclosed with this letter. You may, if you wish, accept additional payments and benefits which may be offered by the TEC, but [indistinct word] will be for you to discuss and agree with the TEC. The Department of Employment accepts no liability for any agreement entered into between you and the TEC on such matters. The right to any such payments or benefits will cease at the end of your secondment and will not form part of your Terms & Conditions of employment as a civil servant.
>
> These arrangements will apply for the duration of the secondment period.
>
> If you are willing to accept secondment on the basis set out, please sign the Declaration form enclosed with this letter and return it to me within seven days.'

At some point Mr Astley and the other respondents must have signed and returned the necessary declaration forms.

[71] What the department and the TECs therefore envisaged was that initially the civil servants would not be offered employment by the various TECs but would be seconded to them. There the 'secondees' would remain employed as civil servants but would do what was required for the TECs to carry on their enterprise and training activities. And—so far as anyone could see—that was indeed exactly what happened. The department continued to regard the secondees working in the TECs as department civil servants, drawing their salaries from the department and enjoying all the benefits, including the pension, to which civil servants of their grades were entitled. More particularly, the respondents were not offered employment by Newtec, but when they started work with the company in September 1990, as the employment tribunal found, at para 13 of its decision, 'there was no difference between tasks they performed with Newtec and the tasks they had with the Department of Employment the day before'. They were working in an office that was now run by Newtec, but they were doing so as civil servants of the department on secondment. They continued to work in this way until the summer of 1993.

[72] In the meantime the government had gone on developing its policy on the future of the TECs and, in particular, on the status of those working in the TECs. On 16 December 1991 the Secretary of State announced the arrangements which were to enable all TECs to become employers of their own staff by the end of their fifth year of operation. A question and answer briefing of the same date shows that there had been meetings with various interested parties, including the trade unions. The unions had 'refused to accept the principle that secondments should end'. Although the decision that TECs should employ their staff had been announced, correspondence available to the employment tribunal shows that a lot more work still needed to be done behind the scenes because the TECs were apprehensive about the costs which they would incur if it were held that, when the secondments ended and the civil servants became their employees, the TUPE regulations applied so as to make for continuity of employment. There were also concerns about any liability for pensions. Eventually, however, a package was worked out and the necessary funding arrangements were put in place with effect from 1 January 1993.

[73] Newtec then moved to implement the policy of ending the use of secondees and of employing only its own staff. In May 1993 the managing director wrote to the respondents offering them employment and enclosing a summary of the general terms and conditions of employment negotiated with the union. Civil servants, such as the respondents, were not obliged to take up the offer of employment: they could, if they wished, ask for a post elsewhere in the department, but they could not continue to work for Newtec as seconded civil servants. Both the respondents Deborah Hawkes and Julie Owens agreed to take up the offer of direct employment with Newtec from 1 July. Miss Hawkes intimated her wish to resign from the civil service with effect from 1 July in a letter dated 2 July. Miss Owens wrote on 1 July protesting at the way that she had 'been resigned', and adding that '[w]hilst I am happy with my offer of employment and generally satisfied with the terms and conditions I would have preferred to remain on long term secondment from the Department. I realise that this is not on offer'. John Astley and four others indicated that they intended to return to the Employment Service, but Mr Astley must later have changed his mind since the documents show that he became an employee of Newtec on 1 September 1993. The respondents then worked as employees of Newtec until 1998 when Miss Hawkes was dismissed on the grounds of redundancy. All three respondents then referred the question of the length of their period of continuous employment to the tribunal.

[74] In each case the respondent's statement of complaint to the tribunal in 1998 was in similar terms and began: 'On 31 August 1993 I became employed full time by Newtec and remained so until it was merged in April 1997 to form CELTEC.' Why the date of 31 August, rather than 1 July or 1 September 1993, was chosen is not clear—perhaps in the hope of avoiding any question about the applicability of the TUPE regulations which had been amended with effect from the previous day. For present purposes what matters, however, is that, when applying to the tribunal, all three respondents proceeded on the basis that they had been employed by the department until the summer of 1993 and that it was only when they then resigned from the department and accepted the offer of direct employment with Newtec that they became employees of Newtec. This is hardly surprising since, as the narrative of events shows, that was precisely how the whole matter was seen by the department, by the TECs, by the trade unions and, of course, by the respondents themselves. It would have come as a considerable shock to the respondents, for example, if they had suddenly been told in the summer of 1993 that ever since September 1990 they had not, in fact, been civil servants and so their service during that period had not counted towards their civil service pension.

[75] At the hearing on the disposal of the appeal in light of the answers returned by the European Court of Justice to the questions referred by the House, it was common ground that the ruling of the European Court of Justice meant that the relevant part of the department's undertaking was transferred to Newtec in September 1990. For the appellant, Mr Bowers QC submitted that the appeal should accordingly be allowed, since the respondents' case had all along been perilled on the proposition that, in terms of art 3(1) of the directive, the transfer to Newtec of the relevant part of the department's undertaking, and hence of its obligations from its employment relationship with the respondents, occurred in 1993. If, as the European Court of Justice judgment now confirmed, the transfer of the relevant part of the undertaking occurred in 1990, then there was no transfer of the respondents' rights under their contracts of employment with the department when, three years later, they became direct employees of Newtec. By contrast, counsel for the respondents now argued that, since the directive was to be interpreted as meaning that the relevant part of the department's undertaking transferred in September 1990, by virtue of art 3(1) the department's obligations under its employment relationship with the respondents must also have transferred to Newtec at that time. So the directive still operated to maintain the respondents' continuity of employment—even though not in a way that their legal representatives had envisaged at any previous stage in the proceedings from the lodging of their applications with the employment tribunal until now.

[76] Counsel for the appellant submitted that it was too late for the respondents to perform this somersault and the House should not entertain the argument. If, however, the House were prepared to do so, the matter should be remitted to the employment tribunal so that the appellant could have an opportunity, if so advised, of leading further evidence about what happened in 1990. In the light of that further evidence, the appellant would hope to persuade the tribunal that, even though normally the effect of transferring the relevant part of the undertaking would have been to transfer the employer's obligations from the department to Newtec, this case should be regarded as exceptional since the respondents had so clearly decided that they wished to remain civil servants in the department, rather than to transfer to the employment of Newtec. Their deliberate choice should be respected. Counsel was not unaware of the potential difficulty posed for any such contention by the fact that, in paras 37 and 38 of its judgment ([2005] IRLR 647 at 658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1434), under reference to its previous case law, the European Court of Justice envisages as 'the sole reservation' to the transfer of the employment obligations from the transferor to the transferee the situation where 'following a decision freely taken by [the workers themselves], they are at liberty, after the transfer, not to continue the employment relationship with the new employer'.

[77] At the end of the hearing, I was satisfied that, since this is a test case, it would not be appropriate to refuse to consider the respondents' new argument—even though it was a complete volte face. On the other hand, it seemed to me that, precisely because the entire proceedings had been conducted on a completely different basis, justice to the appellant required that the matter should be remitted to the employment tribunal. This would at least give the appellant an opportunity to advance its fallback argument on the basis of a more detailed examination of the events in 1990 than had been required in a hearing where the focus had been on the position in 1993. The resulting further delay in the proceedings would be unfortunate but any resulting decision in the test case would be that much more securely based. Essentially, my position was the same as Lord Mance's. So, but for what I now go on to say, I would have taken much the same approach as he is to adopt in [114] and [115] of his speech.

[78] More fundamentally worrying for me throughout the hearing, however, was the idea, implicit in both parties' submissions, that, unless a new exception could be recognised—which would assuredly require a further reference to the European Court of Justice—in this case art 3(1) of the directive had the effect of obliterating what had actually happened and of putting in its place an entirely fictitious version of events. In that alternative world the department's civil servants were never seconded to Newtec in September 1990, never worked as secondees, never resigned from the civil service and never accepted an offer of employment from Newtec in 1993. The special terms in that supposed offer of employment, which were designed to provide additional protection in respect of redundancy and certain other employment rights, would never have been needed and could never have had any effect. For, it must now be held, by 1993 the civil servants were civil servants no more: since September 1990 they had all along been working as employees of Newtec—blissfully unaware that they were not earning any enhancement to their civil service pension since, by virtue of art 3(3), the department's pension obligations had not transferred to Newtec. Similarly, the complex negotiations between the government and the TECs in 1991 and 1992 had been in vain since, unbeknown to anyone, the department's obligations under its employment relationship with the relevant civil servants had already passed to those TECs, like Newtec, which had commenced operations.

[79] If the directive really had to be interpreted as having this effect, this legal fiction would play as spectacular a role in the law of the European Community as fictions ever played in the law of ancient Rome. More to the point perhaps, the fiction would produce apparently absurd and impractical results and difficulties. What, for instance, would be the status of any pension 'rights' which had apparently, but not actually, accrued between September 1990 and the summer of 1993? a

[80] Happily, closer inspection of the decision of the European Court of Justice which is supposed to have spawned this troublesome fiction reveals a rather different picture. b

[81] The second recital in the preamble to the directive ('Whereas it is necessary to provide for the protection of employees in the event of a change of employer, in particular, to ensure that their rights are safeguarded') reminds us that the only purpose of the directive is to provide protection to employees in the event of a change in their employer. In para 26 of its decision in the present case, the European Court of Justice emphasises this point when it refers to its earlier case law and says ([2005] IRLR 647 at 657, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1432): c

> 'Directive 77/187 is intended to safeguard the rights of workers in the event of a change of employer by making it possible for them to continue to work for the new employer on the same conditions as those agreed with the transferor. The purpose of the Directive is to ensure, as far as possible, that the contract of employment or employment relationship continues unchanged with the transferee, in order to prevent the workers concerned from being placed in a less favourable position solely as a result of the transfer . . .' d e

[82] If one stops and asks whether in September 1990 the respondents were in need of the protection of a directive which has this purpose, the answer is surely that they were not, because there was no change in their employer and it was never intended that there should be: they remained, and were intended by all concerned to remain, employees of the department with exactly the same rights as before, the only difference being that they had been seconded to work for Newtec for three years. Employees need the protection of the directive when there is a change of employer and they are at risk of finding that they have no job or that their conditions of employment have been changed for the worse. Neither eventuality arose in September 1990. f

[83] The European Court of Justice draws attention to the fact that the directive applies to transfers 'to another employer' in paras 31 and 32 of its opinion ([2005] IRLR 647 at 657, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1433): g

> '31. As is apparent from the actual wording of Article 3(1) of Directive 77/187, the term transfer in the expression "date of a transfer" in that provision is to be understood "within the meaning of Article 1(1) [of that Directive]". h
>
> 32. It is apparent from the latter provision that Directive 77/187 applies to transfers of an undertaking, business or part of a business "to another employer". In the words of the second recital in the preamble to the Directive, the Directive is intended to protect employees "in the event of a change of employer". In Article 2 of the Directive, the terms "transferor" and "transferee" are defined by reference to, respectively, ceasing to be or becoming "the employer in respect of the undertaking, business or part of the business".' j

This in turn leads on to the court's identification of the decisive criterion for establishing whether there is a transfer for the purposes of art 3(1). The court says ([2005] IRLR 647 at 657–658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1433–1434):

> '34. To establish whether there is a transfer within the meaning of Directive 77/187, it is necessary to assess whether the unit in question retains its identity, which follows in particular from the fact that its operation is actually continued or resumed by the new employer, with the same or similar economic activities (see [Spijkers v Gebroeders Benedik Abbatoir CV Case 24/85 [1986] ECR 1119 at 1112, 1113 (paras 11, 12 and 15)], and [Rygaard v Strø Mølle Akustik A/S Case C-48/94 [1995] ECR I-2745 at 2763–2764, [1996] ICR 333 at 345 (paras 15, 16)]).
>
> 35. It follows that the decisive criterion for establishing whether there is a transfer for the purposes of Article 1(1) of Directive 77/187 is whether a new employer continues or resumes the operation of the unit in question, retaining its identity.
>
> 36. In those circumstances, the term "date of a transfer" in Article 3(1) of Directive 77/187 must be understood as referring to the date on which responsibility as employer for carrying on the business of the unit in question moves from the transferor to the transferee.' (My emphases.)

This conclusion is reflected in para 1 of the operative part of the judgment ([2005] IRLR 647 at 658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1435 (para 46)):

> 'Article 3(1) of Council Directive 77/187/EEC of 14 February 1977 on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers of undertakings, businesses or parts of businesses must be interpreted as meaning that the date of a transfer within the meaning of that provision is the date on which responsibility as employer for carrying on the business of the unit transferred moves from the transferor to the transferee. That date is a particular point in time which cannot be postponed to another date at the will of the transferor or transferee.'

Again, I have emphasised the words 'as employer' which are an essential part of the court's conclusion.

[84] The decisive criterion identified by the European Court of Justice in para 35 of its judgment has to be applied to the facts as found by the employment tribunal. In considering the facts it must be borne in mind that the tribunal specifically found, at para 22 of the extended reasons, that there had been no attempt whatsoever for purposes of the TUPE regulations 'to engineer any particular outcome or to evade liabilities in the way the transfer has been structured. The rationale is justified in business and political terms'.

[85] The tribunal considered, at para 11, that the undertaking which was transferred from the department to the TECs was the management of the government-funded post-16 vocational training and enterprise activities in England and Wales, together with the information systems and database, some staff and some premises. The tribunal thought that this was a recognisable and definable economic entity. In the hearing before the House, neither side sought to challenge that description of the relevant unit or undertaking, which has, of course, to be applied to the situation in North East Wales.

[86] In para 13 the tribunal went on to consider whether the respondents were assigned to the part of the undertaking which was run by Newtec. In its view, the respondents clearly were assigned to the undertaking 'at the time of the transfer commencing'—by which the tribunal meant September 1990. The tribunal was certainly entitled to reach the view that, when Newtec began operations in September 1990 using the civil servants who had been doing the job the day before, those civil servants were included in the part of the undertaking for the management of which Newtec was then responsible.

[87] That does not mean, however, that, for the purposes of art 3(1) of the directive, there had been a transfer of the relevant part of the undertaking to Newtec in September 1990. As the European Court of Justice underlined in para 32 of its judgment, the reference back in art 3(1) to art 1(1) shows that the directive applies to transfers of an undertaking, business or part of a business 'to another employer'. And in this case, even although Newtec had taken over the running of the activities of enterprise and training, there is nothing in the tribunal's findings to show that it had done so 'as employer'. On the contrary, the picture which emerges is of a situation where, from September 1990, the essential work of the unit was being carried on by staff who were not employed by Newtec. As I have noted, Newtec did indeed employ some staff, but there is nothing in the case to suggest that they were concerned with the essentials of the operation. From all that appears in the employment tribunal's extended reasons, the essential work continued to be done by the civil servants who had the necessary experience and who remained employees of the department, but on secondment to Newtec for three years. Newtec no more employed them or intended to employ them than it would have employed or intended to employ the employees of some company with which it might have contracted for the supply of the same necessary expertise. In accordance with the understanding of all concerned—the department, Newtec and the civil servants—the civil servants did not have, and were not meant to have, a new employer. So, even though Newtec had taken over the offices, including presumably the desks and chairs on which the civil servants sat and the equipment which they operated, in terms of art 3(1) of the directive, they had not done so 'as employer' and so there was no transfer of the undertaking to them for the purposes of the directive in September 1990. Which is exactly what one would expect since at that stage there was no threat to the position of the civil servants who continued to be employed by the department and to enjoy all their rights as civil servants. There was no event or threat arising out of a change of employer for which they needed the protection of the directive and so no reason why it should apply to them. I would add that this analysis appears to me to be consistent with the approach of the European Court of Justice in Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v A/S Danmols Inventar Case 105/84 [1985] ECR 2639, as explained by Lord Mance in [108] and [109] of his speech.

[88] Therefore, contrary to the common position adopted by counsel at the hearing, I would hold that there was no transfer for the purposes of art 3(1) in September 1990 because, to adopt the terminology in para 35 of the judgment of the European Court of Justice, the operation of the unit was not being continued by 'a new employer'. This in turn means that the directive does not stand history on its head and, to a great extent at least, the case can be considered on its real facts.

[89] In reality, then, on the facts found by the employment tribunal, the first moment when the respondents could be said to have faced the risk of suffering the kind of disadvantage for which the directive affords protection came in 1993. As part of the culmination of the government's original policy, Newtec decided to put an end to the use of secondees and, from 1 July onwards, to have the work done by its own employees. Those working at the heart of Newtec's operations could no longer do so as seconded civil servants but had to choose either to seek employment elsewhere in the department or to become employees of Newtec. From that date, not only was Newtec continuing to run the unit or undertaking which had formed part of the department's undertaking before September 1990 but, as envisaged in the overall scheme for the privatisation of the delivery of the enterprise and training activities, it was now doing so 'as employer'. In my view, therefore, 1 July 1993 is the date on which, in terms of the test in para 1 of the operative part of the judgment of the European Court of Justice ([2005] IRLR 647 at 658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1435 (para 46)), responsibility 'as employer' for carrying on the business of the unit transferred moved from the transferor (the department) to the transferee (Newtec). On that date there was accordingly a transfer, within the meaning of art 3(1), of the relevant part of the department's undertaking to Newtec. It follows that the department's obligations under its contracts of employment with the respondents transferred to Newtec on that date. At the risk of introducing a little artificiality, I include the department's obligations to Mr Astley, since, even though he had contemplated moving to another part of the department, he changed his mind and there is nothing in the facts found by the tribunal to suggest that he was not employed by the department in the unit immediately before Newtec took over responsibility as employer on 1 July. So the department's employment obligations to Mr Astley passed to Newtec on that date, some two months before he purported to become its employee.

[90] Had there been any question of the House deciding the appeal on the basis which I have outlined, it would have been necessary to put the case out for a further hearing in order to allow counsel for both parties to make submissions on the point. Since, however, three of your Lordships are minded in any event to dismiss the appeal on the basis of the arguments at the hearing, a fresh hearing is, strictly speaking, unnecessary. In these circumstances, I can express the conclusion which I have reached on the basis of the reasoning which I have just set out. I would hold that, by virtue of the operation of art 3(1) of the directive, the respondents' employment with Newtec should be regarded as continuous with their employment with the department. So in each case the appropriate date of commencement of continuous employment is the date on which the respondent was first employed as a civil servant. In my respectful view the Court of Appeal reached the right conclusion even though, not having had the benefit of the judgment of the European Court of Justice, it did so for different reasons. In agreement with the majority of your Lordships but on quite a different basis, I would accordingly dismiss the appeal.

LORD CARSWELL.

[91] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinions prepared by my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hope of Craighead.

[92] For the reasons which they have given I agree that the date of transfer has to be taken to be September 1990 and that the respondents' contracts of employment must be deemed to have been handed over to Newtec Ltd (Newtec) on the date of the transfer. I appreciate that this may be regarded as the product of what both my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry have referred to as a fiction. It is in many ways unsatisfactory: it fails to represent the commercial reality of the arrangement and very probably is the opposite of what the respondents themselves thought to be the case at the time. I am also conscious of the force of the arguments put forward by Lord Rodger and his concern about the obliteration of reality in relation to such matters as the respondents' pension rights. I nevertheless am compelled by the reasons given by Lord Bingham and Lord Hope to agree that the consequence of the decision of the Court of Justice of the European Communities must be that the date of transfer is to be regarded as September 1990.

[93] I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD MANCE.

[94] My Lords, this appeal concerns the respondents' claim, under Council Directive (EEC) 77/187 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to the safeguarding of employees' rights in the event of transfers ofundertakings, businesses or parts of businesses) (OJ 1977 L061 p 26) (the directive), that their employment with the appellant North Wales Training and Enterprise Council Ltd, trading as Celtec Ltd (Celtec) and its predecessor, the North East Wales Training and Enterprise Council Ltd (Newtec) in training and enterprise activities in the 1990s is to be regarded as continuous with their prior employment in the same activities as civil servants with the Department of Employment (the department). Celtec and Newtec can for present purposes be treated as one. For simplicity I shall use 'Celtec' to embrace both. The problem which the claim has to meet is that the department transferred responsibility for such activities (the undertaking) to Celtec in September 1990, whereas the respondents remained, on the face of it, civil servants employed by the department and on secondment to Celtec until summer 1993 when they elected to forego civil servant status and to become employees of Celtec. So, the appellant asserts, there was no change of employer 'by reason of' the transfer of the undertaking within the language of arts 2 and 3 of the directive, and any change occurred separately and voluntarily some years later. Other (indeed a majority) of the civil servants ostensibly seconded by the department to Newtec from September 1990 never elected to become employees of Newtec, but retired or resigned or returned to other posts in the department from 1992 onwards.

[95] The respondents' claim succeeded in the employment tribunal, failed before the Employment Appeal Tribunal ([2001] IRLR 788), but succeeded in the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 1035, [2002] IRLR 629, [2002] ICR 1289). Their claim was pursued through all these instances, brought to this House and referred to the Court of Justice of the European Communities on the mutual assumption that its outcome depended upon whether the date of the transfer of an undertaking within the meaning of arts 1(1) and 3(1) of the directive is a single point in time or can take place 'progressively or in distinct stages'. Celtec have always contended for the former analysis and the respondents for the latter. The respondents have accepted, at every instance and in their written observations to the European Court, that they 'were seconded [by the department to Celtec] rather than directly employed in the period September 1990 to 1993'. The European Court having held on 26 May 2005 ([2005] IRLR 647, [2005] ICR 1409) in favour of the appellant that transfer of an undertaking takes place at 'a particular point in time', the respondents now submit that they should have leave to advance a new argument. This is that they were neither seconded by the department nor therefore civil servants in the period September 1990–1993, but were on the contrary employed by Celtec from September 1990 onwards.

[96] The basis for this argument is that the European Court, having in its judgment determined ([2005] IRLR 647 at 658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1433–1434 (para 36)) that the 'date of a transfer' in art 3(1) of the directive 'must be understood as referring to the date on which responsibility as employer for carrying on the business of the unit in question moves from the transferor to the transferee', went on in paras 37 and 38 to state that, where there is a transfer of an undertaking—

> 'contracts of employment or employment relationships existing on the date of the transfer . . . between the transferor and the workers assigned to the undertaking transferred are automatically transferred from the transferor to the transferee by the mere fact of the transfer of the undertaking (see [d'Urso v Ercole Marelli Elettromeccanica Generale SpA Case C-362/89 [1992] IRLR 136 at 138, [1991] ECR I-4105 at 4145 (para 20)] and [Rotsart de Hertaing v J Benoidt SA (in liq) Case C-305/94 [1997] All ER (EC) 40 at 50, [1996] ECR I-5927 at 5945–5946 (para 18)])'—'with the sole reservation, as regards the workers themselves, that, following a decision freely taken by them, they are at liberty, after the transfer, not to continue the employment relationship with the new employer (see Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v A/S Danmols Inventar Case 105/84 [1985] ECR 2639 at 2651 (para 16)], and [d'Urso v Ercole Marelli Elettromeccanica Generale SpA Case C-362/89 [1992] IRLR 136 at 138, [1991] ECR I-4105 at 4143 (para 11)]).'

[97] Relying on this passage, the respondents wish to submit that, whatever they thought or said from September 1990 until the European Court's judgment on 26 May 2005, there was in September 1990 an automatic transfer of their employment relationship. This occurred because, they say, they were not offered any employment relationship with Celtec and because, on their reading of the European Court's words, such an offer must be regarded as an essential pre-requisite to or element of any 'decision freely taken . . . not to continue the employment relationship with the new employer'. The appellant resists the grant of leave to advance any such submission as well as challenging its basis and substance.

[98] I make some preliminary observations. First, the European Court was not purporting to make new law, but based itself, as appears from its own paras 37 and 38, on its previous decisions. The respondents thus concede 'with hindsight' that they should have argued at previous instances in this case that there was continuity of employment throughout, even if transfer of the undertaking occurred at a single point in time in 1990. That they should have done is highlighted by the course of the submissions in the Court of Appeal when Mr Bowers QC for the appellant explained that on the appellant's case there had been no automatic transfer of the employment relationship in September 1990, because the respondents had freely opted to remain civil servants with the department by volunteering for secondment (cf the judgment of Schiemann LJ [2002] IRLR 629 at [20], [2002] ICR 1289). This elicited no contrary argument (late though any would have been even at that stage) from the respondents.

[99] Second, the circumstances in which the respondents came to be seconded to, rather than employed by, Celtec have not been investigated or adjudicated upon at any previous instance in this case. Third, if the respondents became (unwittingly) employees of Celtec in September 1990 (so that their continuity of employment continued in 1993, which is when they thought that they were choosing to become Celtec's employees), the larger number of other department employees who thought in 1990 that they were choosing to remain civil servants and volunteering to be seconded to Celtec or another training and enterprise council (TEC) must in law have ceased to be civil servants in September 1990; and their continuity of employment was broken in 1993, when, on this analysis, they chose to revert to being civil servants independently on any view of the transfer of any undertaking. A decision favourable to the respondents in this case might thus, in another case, prove unfavourable to a body of employees who thought that they had at all times maintained their employment status (in this case as civil servants) with their former employers. Fourth, I do not consider that the analysis adopted by my noble and learned friend, Lord Rodger of Earlsferry, is open, not only because it was not argued before the House, but also because, if the respondents freely chose to remain civil servants and to volunteer for secondment in September 1990, that seems to me the end of the matter, and to preclude any possibility of a later transfer of their employment relationship in connection with the transfer of the relevant TEC which on the European Court's analysis took place, once and for all, in September 1990.

[100] There is substantial Employment Appeal Tribunal and Court of Appeal authority to the effect that, even in the Employment Appeal Tribunal, new points may only in exceptional circumstances be raised (cf the cases cited in Leicestershire CC v UNISON [2005] IRLR 920 at 925 (para 37)). Quite apart from that, there is the authority of your Lordships' House in North Staffordshire Railway Co v Edge [1920] AC 254 that leave to advance a new point should be refused in this House, if there are any further matters of fact by reference to which there is 'reasonable ground for supposing' that one party 'might have been able to strengthen his case' (see 263 per Lord Birkenhead LC) or which 'would affect the argument' (see 266 per Lord Dunedin) or which 'could possibly and properly influence the judgment to be formed' (see 270 per Lord Buckmaster).

[101] The present cases were however selected by the employment tribunal as lead cases and have been pursued not simply in the interests of these particular respondents, but to enable other former department employees, who were on the face of it seconded to training enterprises from September 1990 to dates in or after 1992, to know their position. If leave is not given to raise the new point, other employees will have to bring fresh proceedings, and the three respondents to this appeal will also potentially suffer from allowing their names to be used. In these circumstances, if the new point raises no new factual matters for investigation (as the respondents submit), then I consider that the respondents should have leave to raise it. Even if the new point raises new factual matters, I think that the House can and should, exceptionally, be prepared to contemplate both allowing it to be raised, on appropriate terms as to costs, and if appropriate remitting the matter to the employment tribunal to investigate and make findings regarding the relevant facts. I would not accept Mr Bowers QC's submission that the facts must by now be so obscure that even this would be unfair to the appellant.

[102] Does the new point raise new factual matters? The respondents submit not. They point to paras 45 and 46 in the opinion of Advocate General Poiares Maduro ([2005] IRLR 647 at 652, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1423) addressing Celtec's submission that there was a single specific date of transfer in September 1990 (a submission that the Advocate General actually rejected, but the European Court accepted). The Advocate General said:

> 'In this case, Celtec's interpretation results in the date of transfer being set at September 1990. It follows that the applicant employees could have claimed protection of the rights arising from their contracts of employment at that time. However, according to Celtec, the Department of Employment employees implicitly refused to allow their contracts of employment to be transferred. Their decision to agree to be seconded to the TECs whilst remaining Department of Employment employees must be taken as a refusal to transfer their contracts of employment to the TECs.
>
> 46. Such an analysis cannot be accepted, since Celtec acknowledged at the hearing that the Department of Employment employees had not been offered a contract of employment with the TECs in September 1990. In any event, to accept that employees can tacitly refuse to transfer their contracts of employment would run counter to the spirit of Directive 77/187, which instead provides for the automatic transfer of contracts of employment as the consequence of the transfer of an undertaking.
>
> 47. Accordingly, were Celtec's interpretation of the date of transfer for the purposes of Article 3(1) of Directive 77/187 to be accepted, the necessary conclusion would be that the Department of Employment employees' contracts of employment would be transferred to the TECs with effect from September 1990. More generally, that interpretation would require the automatic transfer of the contracts of employment on a single date, unless the employees had made clear their refusal.'

[103] The European Court did not expressly endorse these paragraphs, but instead identified the general principles which I have quoted (at [96], above). The Advocate General focused on the question whether the respondents could be said to have 'refused to allow their contracts of employment to be transferred', while the European Court spoke of 'a decision freely taken' by employees 'not to continue the employment relationship with the new employer'. Mr Millar QC submits that neither test could be met when or if the respondents were not positively offered the opportunity of employment by Celtec in September 1990. Mr Bowers submits that the circumstances in which the respondents volunteered for secondment to Celtec call for evidential investigation, and that no conclusions can on present material safely be reached as to the voluntariness of the respondents' apparent choice to continue to be employed by the department and to be seconded to Celtec.

[104] I would accept Mr Bowers's submission. As a preliminary point, I note that—whatever may have been said at the (doubtless very) short hearing before the European Court of Justice on a point which was not in issue before that court—it is not even certain that the respondents could not have been employed by Celtec if they had wanted. The unchallenged evidence of Mr Tabor (which was before the employment tribunal and is quoted in para 25 of the Employment Appeal Tribunal's decision ([2001] IRLR 788 at 791) was that:

> '8. As private companies, TECs were entitled to recruit their own staff and most, if not all, did so from the day they became operational. The Department of Employment wished to assist TECs to become operationally effective as quickly as possible. As TECs were new organisations, and the work to be undertaken required an understanding of the government policy that contracts were designed to deliver, the Department, with the agreement of TECs, issued an invitation to staff in its area offices and elsewhere seeking volunteers for secondment to TECs. This invitation was initially for a three-year period . . .'

[105] Second, I note that there were considerable potential advantages for employees in keeping civil service status—particularly in retaining their membership of the Principal Civil Service Pension Scheme (see para 9 of Mr Tabor's statement), which they could not retain if they became employees of Newtec (cf art 3(3) of the directive). The documentation before the House shows that civil service trade unions supported secondment and resisted the decision eventually taken to phase it out. Mr Bowers informed the House that, although no evidence had been called on this aspect because it was not then material, the appellant's case would be that the original arrangements for secondment were the outcome of a long period of discussion, with trade unions representing the interests of the department's employees resisting any suggestion that such employees should lose their civil service status.

[106] Third, Mr Bowers pointed out that there had been no investigation of the basis on which the respondents were engaged as civil servants. Civil servants are traditionally engaged on a mobile basis, 'to serve wherever the Crown directs', in the language of the industrial tribunal in the early decision of Moloney v Hampshire Training & Enterprise Council Ltd (30 September 1996, unreported), para 40. On this basis, the department had the right to deploy the respondents in any other appropriate situation, and it is clear that, if the respondents had not volunteered for secondment to a TEC in September 1990, the department would have arranged to deploy them elsewhere. Further, those respondents who wished to maintain their civil service status when the arrangements for secondment were gradually ended in and after 1992 were also offered alternative situations by the department.

[107] Fourth, neither the Advocate General nor the European Court can have had the potential implications of the third point in mind, since it was not raised by the questions put to them, was not in issue and was not even mentioned, at least until brief reference must have been made to it during the oral submissions before the court. On the respondents' submission, the European Court must none the less be taken to have laid it down as an absolute and inflexible rule of European law that an employee of the transferor of an undertaking can never retain his or her employment status with the transferor or elect to be seconded to the transferee unless he or she has been offered and refused an employment relationship with the relevant transferee—even if the transferor would otherwise have had and exercised the right to deploy the employee in another situation. But the concern of the directive is to protect employees and to preserve continuity of employment on the same terms. It is not to give employees rights which they would not otherwise have, in particular a right to work in a particular situation, if he or she did not previously have this. These general propositions are supported by the reasoning in the previous European Court authorities to which I refer at [108]–[113], below, and I do not find in the reasoning of the present European Court decision anything which suggests a different purpose. If an employer is entitled to and would otherwise deploy an employee in another post which would preserve continuity of employment, I can no see no reason why the directive should prevent the employer from inviting the employee and the employee from agreeing, as an alternative, to stay in the same post and work on a seconded basis with the transferee of the undertaking. The civil servant employee had no previous right or obligation to work in that undertaking. His secondment, if he accepts the invitation, is freely undertaken, in circumstances where he would otherwise be employed elsewhere in accordance with his employer's contractual entitlement.

[108] Fifth, since the precise scope and application of the exception to the principle of automatic transfer of employment relationships on the transfer of an undertaking was never in issue or argued before the European Court, I do not consider that the European Court's formulation of its 'sole reservation' can or should be read as providing any axiomatic or definitive answer to it. Nothing in the underlying authorities, the effect of which the European Court said that it was simply restating, supports so rigid or formulaic an interpretation. Indeed, in Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v A/S Danmols Inventar Case 105/84 [1985] ECR 2639, there was no suggestion that the question whether Mr Mikkelsen ceased to have continuity as an employee depended on whether or not he was offered employment with the transferee company. Advocate General Slynn said (at 2641–2642) that there would be no transfer of employment—

> 'if an employee of one employer whose business is transferred genuinely and willingly agrees with that employer or the transferee of the business, that he will not be engaged under a contract of employment, or in an employment relationship with the transferee'

—or, put another way, that the question was whether he had 'genuinely agree[d] to accept a status with the transferee which is not that of an employee' under an agreement which was 'genuine and not tainted by duress' (see 2642). These formulations would both embrace secondment by a transferor to a transferee. The European Court spoke (at 2651 (para 16)) of a case—

> 'where the employee in question terminates the employment contract or employment relationship of his own free will with effect from the date of the transfer, or where that contract or relationship is terminated with effect from the date of the transfer by virtue of an agreement voluntarily concluded between the worker and the transferor or the transferee of the undertaking . . .'

[109] If it is open to an employee who is not offered a contract of employment with the transferee to conclude a voluntary agreement for some different relationship with the transferor or transferee, no reason is apparent why it should be impossible for an employee, who is not offered such a contract and whose employment relationship with the transferor allows the transferor to deploy him or her otherwise than in the undertaking transferred, to conclude a voluntary agreement with the transferor that he will be seconded to the transferee. Civil servants were given the choice in September 1990 whether or not to be deployed elsewhere in the department rather than to volunteer for secondment to a TEC. A civil servant who, without any offer of a contract of employment from a TEC, chose deployment elsewhere in the department would not have his or her contract of employment transferred to the TEC. The European Court's citation ([2005] IRLR 647 at 658, [2005] ICR 1409 at 1434 (para 37)) of Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v A/S Danmols Inventar shows that its reservation there regarding 'a decision freely taken . . . not to continue the employment' covers those continuing to work in or be assigned to an undertaking, but in a different capacity to that of employee of the transferee. It is common ground that, were a contract of employment with a TEC to have been offered and refused by a civil servant, the reservation would cover the civil servant's continuing employment by the department on secondment to the TEC. In these cases, European law pursues its aims of protecting freedom of contract and the interests of employees at the same time. Yet it is said that there is no freely taken decision within the European Court's reservation, in the situation where a civil servant volunteers to be seconded to a TEC, when the department had the right and would otherwise have transferred the civil servant elsewhere within the department, unless the civil servant has also formally been offered a new contract with the TEC which he or she almost certainly did not want and would have refused so as to retain civil service status. The enforced transfer of a contract of employment in this situation is inconsistent with both employee protection and ordinary contractual freedom.

[110] Mr Bowers further submits, correctly in my view, that none of the other previous European Court decisions touches on a situation comparable with the present. In d'Urso v Ercole Marelli Elettromeccanica Generale SpA Case C-362/89 [1992] IRLR 136, [1991] ECR I-4105, the 518 employees who were ostensibly not transferred to the transferee (but whose employment relationship the European Court held was in law nevertheless automatically transferred) had been laid off (see [1991] ECR I-4105 at 4108), their employment relationship had been 'suspended' and a third party, the Cassa Integrazione Guadagni Straordinaria (CIGS), had assumed 'responsibility for their pay' instead of the transferor (see also [1992] IRLR 136 at 136). Quite clearly there was nothing welcome or voluntary about any of that, as far as those employees were concerned. (One might add that their employment relationship with the transferor would also appear, effectively, to have been determined.)

[111] In Foreningen af Arbejdsledere i Danmark v Daddy's Dance Hall A/S Case 324/86 [1988] IRLR 315, [1988] ECR 739 the European Court explained the rationale of the directive as follows ([1988] IRLR 315 at 317, [1988] ECR 739 at 754 (para 14)):

> '. . . the purpose of Directive 77/187/EEC is to ensure that the rights resulting from a contract of employment or employment relationship of > employees affected by the transfer of an undertaking are safeguarded. Since this protection is a matter of public policy, and therefore independent of the will of the parties to the contract of employment, the rules of the directive, in particular those concerning the protection of workers against dismissal by reason of the transfer, must be considered to be mandatory, so that it is not possible to derogate from them in a manner unfavourable to employees.' (My emphasis.)

The directive aims therefore to protect against dismissal by reason of the transfer of an undertaking. In the present case, the offer made to employees had the same purpose and effect of safeguarding the civil servants' rights arising from their employment relationship with the department, and of protecting against dismissal by reason of the transfer. Employees were to be deployed elsewhere in the department (as Celtec maintains was the department's right) or, if they wished, they could choose to continue to work in training and be seconded to Celtec. On neither basis was there any question of cessation of their continuous employment or of dismissal. The European Court also held that, although 'employees are not entitled to waive the rights conferred on them by the directive' (see para 15), nevertheless 'the directive can be relied on only to ensure that the employee is protected in his relations with the transferee to the same extent as he was in his relations with the transferor under the legal rules of the Member State concerned' (see para 16). So, the court concluded (at 755 (para 18)), 'the directive does not preclude an agreement with the new employer to alter the employment relationship, in so far as such an alteration is permitted by the applicable national law in situations other than the transfer of an undertaking'. Nothing in the directive was therefore aimed at removing or varying any right which the department had under the terms of the relevant employment relationships to deploy civil servants in different situations outside the training and enterprise activities transferred to the TECs. That being so, it is again difficult to see why employees should not instead volunteer for secondment to a transferee of the undertaking constituted by such activities, without thereby forfeiting their civil service status—contrary almost certainly to what would have been their will at the time.

[112] In Berg v Besselsen Joined cases 144/87 and 145/87 [1989] IRLR 447, [1990] ICR 396, the European Court spoke ([1990] ICR 396 at 405 (para 12)) of the directive as—

> 'intended to safeguard the rights of workers in the event of a change of employer by making it possible for them to continue to work for the transferee under the same conditions as those agreed with the transferor. Its purpose is not, however, to ensure that the contract of employment or the employment relationship with the transferor is continued where the undertaking's employees do not wish to remain in the transferee's employ.' (See also [1989] IRLR 447 at 450.)

In para 13 it spoke also of the rules as 'intended to safeguard, in the interests of the employees, the existing employment relationships which are part of the economic entity transferred'. Neither of these statements was addressing a situation where the transferor was both entitled and willing to offer continuing employment elsewhere in its organisation, and would have done so but for the employee's voluntary offer to continue to serve on secondment in the same area as the undertaking transferred.

[113] Katsikas v Konstantinidis Joined cases C-132/91, C-138/91 and C-139/91 [1993] IRLR 179, [1992] ECR I-6577 concerned employees who had objected to becoming employees of the transferee, an attitude which the transferor (who then dismissed them) argued was not open to them in the light of the directive. Not surprisingly, the European Court held that the directive did not have the purpose or effect of compulsorily transferring an employee's employment contract or relationship against his or her will, but that, in such a case, it was for the law of the relevant member state to determine whether the contract or relationship was to be regarded as terminated by the transferor or transferee or to be maintained with the transferor. The case may explain references evidently made before the European Court in the present case to situations of 'refusal' to be employed by a transferee, but its facts were far removed from the present.

[114] In summary, I consider that the respondents should have leave to argue their new point, but that it raises potentially both factual matters which it would require further investigation to resolve and legal issues which would merit further argument, at least before there could be any question of dismissing this appeal. The situation is not, of course, at all a happy one in a case which is already old. But the problem about its resolution now arises from the respondents' own admitted failure to argue the case at any previous stage on the new basis which they now belatedly seek leave to raise. One option open to the House would be to refer the matter yet again to the European Court for determination of the question of law whether—on the hypothesis that the facts are as the department, in answer to the respondents' new point, maintain—the employment relationship of civil servants who volunteered for secondment in September 1990 was, contrary to their evident intention and belief, transferred willy-nilly to the relevant TEC to which they thought they were being seconded. But even that would not necessarily resolve the case, in view of the first point made at [104], above; and anyway it is in my opinion preferable that the law should be reviewed and decided on a solid basis of findings regarding the actual facts.

[115] In my opinion, therefore, the appeal should be allowed and the Court of Appeal's decision set aside and the case should be remitted to the employment tribunal for the facts to be investigated and for appropriate findings to be made, on the basis of which the legal position should then be further considered. The parties should have 21 days in which to make submissions as to the appropriate costs order.

Appeal dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Gover and others v Propertycare Ltd

[2006] EWCA Civ 286

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
BUXTON, LLOYD AND RICHARDS LJJ
8 , 28 MARCH 2006

Court of Appeal – Jurisdiction – Appeal from Employment Appeal Tribunal – Approach to appeal – Employment Tribunals Act 1996, s 37(1).

In the context of appeals from the Employment Appeal Tribunal, the concern of the Court of Appeal is not simply with whether the decision of the employment tribunal was right. The court's jurisdiction is to be found only in s 37(1)[a] of the Employment Tribunals Act 1996, which provides that an appeal on any question of law lies from any decision or order of the Employment Appeal Tribunal. There is no realistic sense in which the Court of Appeal can be hearing an appeal from the Employment Appeal Tribunal if it is only concerned with whether the employment tribunal was right. An assumption that the Court of Appeal in effect repeats the exercise already performed by the expert Employment Appeal Tribunal of reviewing the decision of the employment tribunal tends in practice to impose on the Court of Appeal an exercise that is inappropriate both in its nature and in its extent (see [8], [25], [26], below).

Dicta of Sir John Donaldson MR in Hennessy v Craigmyle & Co Ltd [1986] IRLR 300 at 305 doubted.

Notes

For appeal from decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal, see 16(1B) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 950.

For the Employments Tribunals Act 1996, s 37(1), see 16 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edition) (2005 reissue) 689.

Cases referred to in judgments

Hennessy v Craigmyle & Co Ltd [1986] IRLR 300, [1986] ICR 461, CA.
King v Eaton Ltd (No 2) [1998] IRLR 686, Ct of Sess.
Lambe v 186K Ltd [2004] EWCA Civ 1045, [2005] ICR 307.
O'Donoghue v Redcar & Cleveland BC [2001] EWCA Civ 701, [2001] IRLR 615.
Polkey v AE Dayton Services Ltd [1987] 3 All ER 974, [1988] AC 344, [1987] 3 WLR 1153, HL.
Sillifant v Powell Duffryn Timber Ltd [1983] IRLR 91, EAT.

Appeal

T Gover, Victor Haimes and eight others appealed from the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Judge McMullen QC, Ms K Bilgan and Mr T Motture) on 22 November 2005 dismissing their appeal from the decision of an Employment Tribunal (chairman: D N Milton) sitting at London South, a Section 37, so far as material, provides: '(1) ... an appeal on any question of law lies from any decision or order of the Appeal Tribunal to the relevant appeal court ... (2) In subsection (1) the "relevant appeal court" means—(a) in the case of proceedings in England and Wales, the Court of Appeal ...'

registered on 8 June 2005, that compensation for their unfair dismissal by their employer, Propertycare Ltd, was limited to an amount relevant to the period when consultation should have taken place together with a period of notice. The facts are set out in the judgment of Buxton LJ.

John Cavanagh QC and Martin Budworth (instructed by Horwich Farrelly, Manchester) for the employees.

John Bowers QC and Mark Trafford (instructed by Victoria Cushion) for the employer.

Cur adv vult

28 March 2006. The following judgments were delivered.

BUXTON LJ.

BACKGROUND

[1] The Employment Tribunal (ET) from which an appeal in these proceedings was brought to the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) ([2006] All ER (D) 137 (Jan)) held that all of the claimants had been unfairly directly dismissed with effect from 1 November 2001. The employer, as for broad convenience I will call the respondent, sold lettings insurance and related products to landlords. The claimants were sales agents, and appear to have considered themselves as self-employed. Changes in their terms, in particular in relation to commission rates, were sought to be unilaterally imposed by the employer in a period leading up to October 2001. The ET expressed its reasons for finding that the process was repudiatory of the claimants' contracts in a number of ways, which I can fairly represent by extracts from paras 63, 67, 106 and 129 of the ET's determination:

> 'Simply as a boldly stated issue about whether the halving of the commission rates was justified we have no hesitation in finding that they [sic] were not ... We repeat that the most unimpressive feature of the respondent's case on all these issues was the one-sided nature of all the business dealings between the parties in those final months ... the kind of swingeing reduction in the April–September scheme would have been a fundamental breach of a contract of employment ... In the overall picture of the repudiatory behaviour by the respondents culminating we find in an unreasonably arbitrary employment package administered in a totally unreasonable fashion without even lip service to any established concept or consultation we found particularly unimpressive and reprehensible the very tight timetable administered to the claimants to consider their positions ... the whole process of termination of employment was unfair, confrontational, based on erroneous employment law principles and lacking in sympathy and understanding at [sic] any semblance of good industrial practice and procedure ...'

[2] The claimants repaired with reasonable promptitude to the ET, but there then arose a dispute as to whether they were indeed employees and, if so, of whom. That issue was considered by the ET over a period of three days in December 2002, it holding that they were employees, and of the present respondent. A successful appeal was taken to the EAT, which in November 2003 remitted the issue to a different ET. The second ET reconsidered the issue promptly, over four days at the end of 2003. Its determination was not, however, issued until 9 May 2004, when it confirmed the decision of its predecessor that the claimants were employees of the respondent. That cleared the way for a merits hearing, which occupied 12 days in February to May 2005, by then three and half years after the events complained of.

[3] The ET concluded as to dismissal in the terms already indicated. But it went on to find that even if the employers had as the result of proper consultation and advice proposed terms that would have been reasonable in the sense of not being in fundamental breach of the employment relationship, the employees would still not have accepted those terms. Accordingly, all that the employees had lost as a result of the employer's fault was employment during the period when consultation should have taken place, which the ET found to have been four months, with an added period of two weeks' notice. Compensation for the unfair dismissal was accordingly limited to an amount relevant to that period. The appeal to the EAT, and the further appeal to this court, complain of that limitation.

[4] The appeal in this court took a most unsatisfactory course, which raised questions as to the court's jurisdiction. In order to explain that procedural issue it is necessary first to summarise in brief terms the case that was sought to be put on appeal. A fuller account of and commentary on the case will be found later in the judgment, when I address the substance rather than the admissibility of the arguments.

THE APPELLANTS' CASE SUMMARISED

[5] In making the deduction that it did, the ET saw itself as applying a doctrine to be found in Polkey v AE Dayton Services Ltd [1987] 3 All ER 974, [1988] AC 344. Put shortly for the moment, the House of Lords held in that case that after a finding of unfair dismissal compensation for that dismissal can be reduced to account for a chance that the employee would have been dismissed in any event. In order to address the possibility of such a reduction, the ET has to consider what would have happened if the unfair dismissal had not occurred. The appellants contended that such an approach, leading to the reduction in compensation that we have seen, was not open to the ET in this case, for two separate reasons.

[6] First, as a matter of law, the Polkey principle did not apply when the dismissal would have been unfair in any event, such that whatever fair procedure and consultation had been adopted no employer could dismiss for the reason that this employer adopted. Therefore, and possibly as a sub-set of the main contention, it was not open to the ET to consider whether the employer could have subsequently dismissed fairly for a reason different from that of the actual dismissal. Although Mr Cavanagh QC did not put it like this, the first dismissal irretrievably poisoned the well against any reduction of compensation. This was said to be such a case. The ET had found, not merely that the offer of the original package was procedurally flawed, but also that an offer of that package by any means at all could never be fair. The employer could therefore not save himself by claiming that he could have fairly offered a different package, and fairly dismissed the claimants when they did not accept it.

[7] Second, the ET's findings as to what would have happened after proper consultation and advice were not open to it. The complaint was put in a variety of ways, but included lack of evidence on which the findings could be based; and that the exercise launched the ET on a sea of unreliable speculation, that indeed contradicted findings made at the stage of considering the fairness of the dismissal.

THE JURISDICTION OF THIS COURT AND ITS APPLICATION IN THIS CASE

[8] Both sides told us that we were constrained by the observation of an extremely strong constitution of this court in Hennessy v Craigmyle & Co Ltd [1986] IRLR 300 at 305, [1986] ICR 461 at 470:

> 'It is too often forgotten that, in the context of appeals from the Employment Appeal Tribunal, this Court is a second-tier appellate court. It may, and usually does, obtain considerable assistance from the judgment of the Employment Appeal Tribunal, but its concern is with whether the decision of the Industrial Tribunal was right, not with whether the Employment Appeal Tribunal was right.'

I would be less than frank if I did not express some reserve about that guidance, both from the point of view of jurisdiction and from the point of view of the management of the business of this court. As to authority, this court's jurisdiction to hear this appeal, coming as it does from a statutory tribunal, is only to be found in s 37(1) of the Employment Tribunals Act 1996, which provides for an appeal from the EAT on a question of law only. I do not see how we can in any realistic sense be hearing an appeal from the EAT if we are only concerned with whether the ET was right. As to the business of this court, the assumption that we in effect repeat the exercise already performed by the expert EAT of reviewing the decision of the ET tends in practice to impose on this court an exercise that is inappropriate both in its nature and in its extent. It was no doubt with this jurisprudence in mind that the parties, if left to themselves, would have required two days of this court's time, and have read to us no fewer than 27 authorities.

[9] In the present case these are not merely formal concerns, because the first of the appellants' complaints, para [6], above, only appeared in the case on the morning on which the appeal opened. It was clearly not taken before the EAT, proceedings in which the appellants were represented by leading counsel, though not by Mr Cavanagh. It only came to the court's attention when a document setting out some but by no means all of the considerations attaching to it was handed to us literally as we walked into court. Mr Bowers QC told us that he had received the document the previous evening. It was as much of a surprise to him as it was to us. It was suggested that failure to take the point before the EAT was irrelevant because our task was to review the ET. That contention further reinforces my concern about the guidance given in Hennessy's case, and is a contention to which, if it should arise before me as a matter of decision, I shall wish to give the most careful scrutiny.

[10] That however is not this case, because the appellants have a preliminary difficulty, that whether or not we in principle simply ignore what happened in the EAT the jurisdiction of the court is constrained by what is in the grounds of appeal and in the grant of permission. Mr Cavanagh said that the point was to be found in the third sentence of ground 4:

> 'The effect of the application of Polkey in this case is to construct the world as it plainly never would have been and to imagine employers as behaving in a way in which it was manifest they never would behave.'

That was a hopeless submission. The terms of that sentence assume what the argument put to us denies, that the Polkey jurisprudence was potentially applicable, but complain that that jurisprudence was wrongly applied. That is the second issue, [7], above, and not the first issue with which we are now concerned. And, in any event, it has been the practice for all of my time in the law, and no doubt for many years before that, that even if only as a courtesy to the court a departure from the case as put in the court below is clearly identified and permission sought for it.

[11] That this point was not in issue was also the understanding of Keene LJ when granting permission for this appeal. He said:

> '... properly arguable that the employment tribunal indulged in speculation about what would have happened and went beyond the limits indicated in King v Eaton (No 2) ([1998] IRLR 686) and other authorities.'

Those observations are unmistakably directed at and only at the second of the appellants' points. They demonstrate not merely that the first point was never taken in the grounds, but also that the appellants do not have permission to pursue it in this court.

[12] I am not minded to grant the appellants indulgence on this point. The judges of this court now spend many hours pre-reading material before the appeal opens. The purpose of that is, amongst other things, to save the parties cost by reducing the time that has to be spent in court by their (on the evidence of the appellants' bill of costs in this case, expensive) lawyers. It makes a mockery of that process if appellants continue to consider that they are free to arrive at the door of the court with a completely new case, and take up the time of the court in an attempt to elucidate the nature and details of the case viva voce.

[13] I would not grant the permission that was never asked for to amend the grounds of appeal. I would not grant the permission that was never asked for to extend the ambit of the permission to appeal to this court. The first of the appellants' issues therefore falls in limine. However, because I, wrongly, allowed the court to be drawn into an examination of the substance of the issue I will say something about it, however obiter those observations will be.

POLKEY

[14] As Richards LJ pointed out in the course of argument, all rules on this aspect of compensation for unfair dismissal spring from s 123(1) of the Employment Rights Act 1996:

> '... the amount of the compensatory award shall be such amount as the tribunal considers just and equitable in all the circumstances having regard to the loss sustained by the complainant in consequence of the dismissal in so far as that loss is attributable to action taken by the employer.'

To that observation Mr Bowers added a plea that we should not add to the already excessive number of technical rules in this area. I respectfully and strongly agree with both of those observations. My first and overriding difficulty about the appellants' first point is that, at least as explained to us, it would introduce some very technical and verbally sophisticated rules into a decision-making process that should be a matter for the commonsense, practical experience and sense of justice of the ET sitting as an industrial jury.

[15] The so-called 'Polkey principle' is most conveniently to be found in the speech of Lord Bridge of Harwich ([1987] 3 All ER 974 at 984, [1988] AC 344 at 365) approving observations of Browne-Wilkinson J in Sillifant v Powell Duffryn Timber Ltd [1983] IRLR 91 at 96. If the likely effect of taking appropriate procedural steps is considered at the stage of assessing compensation—

> 'There is no need for an "all or nothing" decision. If the Industrial Tribunal thinks there is a doubt whether or not the employee would have been dismissed, this element can be reflected by reducing the normal amount of compensation by a percentage representing the chance that the employee would still have lost his employment.'

It was that principle that the ET saw itself as applying in this case. It is necessary to set out their approach in their own words:

> '139. We had to hypothesise about the period during which it would have been reasonable to consult about a totally new contract of employment and what would have been a reasonable period and what would have been the consequences at the end of such a period. This exercise was we found particularly difficult in view of our findings on a whole number of issues about the conduct and behaviour of the respondents and trying to visualise them theoretically as "reasonable employers".
>
> 140. We took into account our own industrial experience of other industries where fundamental job changes are introduced over a period of time which are not necessarily popular with the workforce. Thus for example the tribunal panel has had experience of cases where a large workforce in the "care" world has sought to introduce shift working. That kind of exercise in our judgment would usually require particularly in special cases involving no doubt wide ranging changes to family arrangements and issues of that kind a period, say, of at least six months.
>
> 142. We supposed that if the respondents had taken the question seriously and had taken proper legal advice they could have in due course put together a package which did not amount to a fundamental breach of contract but which would nevertheless have been sufficiently unattractive to the majority of the claimants.
>
> 143. We suspect that the final package would still have been unattractive to the majority of the claimants particularly the older members of staff who still hoped to have found (as it appears they had in fact done) a business opportunity for their long-term retirement years.
>
> 144. We are satisfied that we had sufficient material before us to reach a conclusion that even the high earning claimants would have been faced after a period of consultation with a salary plus commission sort of arrangement or indeed even a commission only arrangement on a PAYE basis which would not have been particularly attractive but which would have been justifiable after proper consultation and inquiry.
>
> 145. As we have already referred to above the claimants always saw themselves as a group and we have no doubt that during such a period of consultation even more so they would have acted as a group and sought to protect the interests of the high earning claimants and the lower earning claimants and that consultation would certainly have been justifiably protracted. Equally the respondents could have justified what the claimants would have seen as an unattractive final much more fixed rate of income albeit of course with the benefits of employment right protection on the one hand and the obligations of employers duties on the other.

146. We have come to the conclusion that the correct period for consultation, a radical overhaul of the whole employment contract terms and details would have been a period of four months terminating on 1 February 2002. At that time we are persuaded that the respondents would have been able to put together a proper contract of employment with proper terms and conditions continuity of service absence of probation period and fair industry standard wages on an employed insurance sales basis.

147. Equally we are satisfied that it is extremely probable that the higher earning and/or more elderly claimants would have found that package unacceptable because of their age and their desire to build up a business of their own and that they would not have found that acceptable. The younger/lower paid claimants we find would have maintained solidarity and also rejected the package. At that point the respondents we find would have been fairly entitled to dismiss the claimants for some other substantial reason ie non acceptance at that point of a finally worked out and properly consulted package. That dismissal would have been on noticed and therefore our overall conclusion therefore is quite simply that the claimants are entitled to a basic award calculated quite simply on two years' service at the relevant statutory maximum and loss of earnings (subject to any earnings during that period) up to 15 February 2002 ie the statutory two weeks' notice.'

[16] Quite apart from the complaint about lack of evidence, see [7], above, the appellants said that that approach was not in any event open to the ET. The argument proceeded as follows. First, there will be cases in which the court has to take into account its knowledge, by the time of trial, that the employee's employment would have terminated in any event at or shortly after the date of dismissal. Examples were the closure of the business; or, as in O'Donoghue v Redcar & Cleveland BC [2001] EWCA Civ 701, [2001] IRLR 615, where the applicant's behaviour was such that she could and would have been fairly dismissed. Those were not 'Polkey' cases. That latter distinction was, as I understand it, based on the contention that in the cases just mentioned the alternative world was not hypothesised, but had actually occurred or was almost certain to occur. By contrast, in a Polkey case the court had to hypothesise at a more uncertain level or, as Mr Cavanagh put it, speculate. That was why it was sometimes called a 'what if' exercise. Polkey came into play and permitted that exercise, and only came into play, where the employer had a valid reason for dismissal, but had acted unfairly in his mode of reliance on that reason. The most obvious example was a redundancy situation, where the employee had been unfairly selected. Then, the ET had to and was permitted to ask itself the 'what if' question, as indicated in para 139 set out above. That step was, however, only open to it if the reason for the dismissal had been open to the employer in the first place, and the hypothesised future and fair dismissal would have been for that same reason. Those conditions were not fulfilled in this case. The ET's ruling on dismissal, extracted in [1], above, was that the original 'package' had been so unreasonable that it would not have been possible to dismiss the claimants for refusing to accept it whatever procedure had been adopted. And the hypothesised eventual fair dismissal would not have been for the same reason as the actual dismissal, failure to accept the original package, but for a different reason, failure to accept a different package.

[17] I cannot accept either that the law is as thus set out; or that, if it is so limited, this case does not fall within it.

[18] As to the law, first, there is no authority for the propositions advanced. True it is that in Polkey's case the House spoke of the establishment of the reason for dismissal as a preliminary to consideration of how things might have happened otherwise. But the passages to which we were referred contain no limitation as to the nature of the reason for dismissal such as was contended for before us. And the argument is inconsistent with the decision of this court in O'Donoghue's case. There the reason for dismissal was animus on the part of the employer, a reason that could never be legitimate. This court, specifically applying Polkey's case, upheld a reduction of compensation on the ground that the employee would eventually have been dismissed for a different reason, inappropriate behaviour. It is not open to the appellants to exclude this authority because it was not a 'Polkey case', because it plainly was seen by this court to be such. And the distinction on which the contention rests between the degree of certainty with which the alternative worlds could be stated in O'Donoghue's case on the one hand and in Polkey cases on the other is at best a difference of degree and not of legal kind. Unless O'Donoghue's case was decided per incuriam (and that was never nor could it be suggested, because Mr Cavanagh said that the case was rightly decided) the case is fatal to the appellants' argument.

[19] Second, and more generally, the principle recognised in Polkey's case is not narrowly limited to the facts of that case, as the appellants sought to suggest, but is merely an example of the general application of the requirements of s 123(1). The rigid rule sought to be drawn from that case does not follow from the observations in the case and is quite inconsistent with the statutory obligation that underpinned it. By contrast, a broad principle of the type recognised in Polkey's case, of which the application in that case is only an example, does respect the statutory guidance.

[20] As to the present case, the fragility of the constructions sought to be put on its facts underlines the artificiality of the rule contended for by the appellants. First, it was said that the case is taken outside Polkey because the ET had found that the original dismissal could never have been fair: unlike, for instance, a genuine redundancy situation that was however unfairly managed. It is true that some parts of the ET's exposition give credence to that view. But the more realistic analysis of what they said is that the whole process was unfair because the nature of the terms originally proposed demanded extensive consultation. That is quite different from a discrete finding of an unacceptable reason for dismissal divorced from any question of procedural fairness, such as was made for instance in O'Donoghue's case. Second, it was said that the hypothesised dismissal would have been for a different reason from the actual dismissal. But both cases envisaged refusal to accept terms during a legitimate reorganisation. It is hard to see that there was a difference between them at a level of generality sufficient to found the appellants' argument.

[21] For those reasons, I would in any event reject the appellants' first ground even if it were open in this appeal.

THE ET'S ERROR ON THE FACTS

[22] This complaint, summarised in [7], above, has always been part of the case. How the ET should proceed was set out in a passage of the judgment of Lord Prosser in King v Eaton Ltd (No 2) [1998] IRLR 686 at 691 (para 19), cited with approval by this court in Lambe v 186K Ltd [2005] ICR 307 at [58]:

> '. . . the matter will be one of impression and judgment, so that a tribunal will have to decide whether the unfair departure from what should have happened was of a kind which makes it possible to say, with more or less confidence, that the failure made no difference, or whether the failure was such that one cannot sensibly reconstruct the world as it might have been.'

That, when applied to an ET, indicates very strongly that an appellate court should tread very warily when it is being asked to substitute its own impression and judgment for that of the tribunal. I have set out how the ET approached the issue in this case, and despite the lengthy criticisms addressed to that treatment I am not persuaded that they went outside the very wide ambit permitted to them by Lambe's case.

[23] I am fortified by the fact that I am not alone in that view. It will be recalled that in Hennessy's case [1986] IRLR 300, [1986] ICR 461 it was accepted that this court would often obtain considerable assistance from the view of the EAT. This is such a case. Judge McMullen QC and his expert colleagues set out paras 139–140 of the ET's determination, quoted in [15], above, and then continued:

> '26. In that passage the tribunal is doing what it is engaged to do: to draw upon its own industrial experience of circumstances such as this and to construct, from evidence not from speculation, a framework which is a working hypothesis about what would have occurred had the respondent behaved differently and fairly. The tribunal acknowledged that there would have been a radical overhaul of all employment terms. In the passage at para 144, it has made a finding that that would have occurred and if the claimants had failed to adopt them, as they appeared particularly unattractive, their dismissals would have occurred in any event.
>
> 27. The criticism advanced by [counsel] is that in seeking to construct the hypothesis this tribunal had so many pieces of the jigsaw missing that the only correct approach was to disallow any kind of Polkey reduction. We do not accept that proposition because the findings based upon a careful analysis of the material which it had before it, and drawing upon its experience, do indicate that it was satisfied that there was material sufficient to make its judgment. It is true that in one place a more tentative approach, using the word "could" rather than "would" appears, but it is overwhelmed by the numerous occasions when the positive "would" is used. Similarly the use of the words "we supposed" and "we suspect" in building the blocks towards the hypothesis shows the way in which the tribunal was approaching its task correctly.

28. The tribunal was engaged in what it described as the "what if?" exercise. The tribunal made strong criticisms of the respondent but it is not necessary to describe this process as a procedural flaw or a substantive flaw; all that is necessary, adopting the highlighted extract from Lord Prosser's judgment is that the tribunal can sensibly reconstruct what would have happened. Here it made its own findings and we see no error in its approach to it.' a b

[24] I respectfully agree. The ET correctly directed itself; and brought its experience to bear on the 12 days of evidence that it had heard. It was well aware, as its analysis shows, of the difficulty and unusual nature of the task, but it did not err in law in embarking on that task. I would dismiss this appeal.

LLOYD LJ.

[25] I agree.

RICHARDS LJ.

[26] I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

James Wilson Barrister (NZ).

Kershaw Mechanical Services Ltd v Kendrick Construction Ltd

[2006] EWHC 727 (TCC)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (TECHNOLOGY AND CONSTRUCTION COURT)
JACKSON J
27, 28 FEBRUARY, 2 MARCH 2006

Arbitration – Award – Appeal – Appeal from decision of arbitrator – Approach to be adopted by court where appeal with agreement of parties to the proceedings on a question of law – Arbitration Act 1996, s 69(2)(a).

The claimant subcontractor entered into an agreement with the defendant main contractor to supply and install mechanical services in relation to the construction of new hospital buildings. The original tender supplied by the claimant was partly based on sketches and schematics produced by a particular engineering contractor. After the defendant had successfully obtained the contract to construct the new buildings, it changed its engineering contractor and provided the claimant with a memo dated 19 April 2001 which inter alia, listed additions to and omissions from mechanical services which had been agreed since the claimant had submitted its tender. The effect of this was that the claimant's original tender figure was reduced. The defendant sent a draft order to the claimant based on this figure with amended 'DOM\2' articles of agreement and the memo of 19 April attached. The claimant introduced a qualification to the effect that where the final design information, supplied by the contractor or his consultant differed from the information previously supplied then the sub-contract sum would be adjusted. The formal sub-contract concluded in July 2001 was therefore a modified version of the DOM\2 sub-contract supplemented by correspondence between the parties. It included a term providing for an appeal under s 69(2)(a)[a] of the Arbitration Act 1996 on questions of law arising out of an award made in arbitral proceedings. Upon conclusion of the works a final account was submitted by the claimant and a dispute arose between the parties as to certain items included in the account. The dispute was referred to arbitration and the arbitrator awarded the claimant an amount which was less than it believed it was entitled to. It therefore brought an appeal under s 69(2)(a) of the 1996 Act. Inter alia, the judge considered what the correct approach of the court to an appeal under s 69(2)(a) should be. The following issues were explored: (i) what evidence the court could receive in an appeal under s 69; (ii) whether there was a philosophy of non-intervention which should influence the court hearing an appeal under s 69(2)(a); (iii) what degree of deference was to be shown to the arbitrator's decisions on questions of law; and (iv) how the court should identify any questions of law arising out of the award.

Held – (1) The principal document which should be considered in any appeal under s 69 of the 1996 Act was the arbitral award itself. In addition to that the court should also receive any document referred to in the award, which the court needed to read in order to determine a question of law arising out of the award.

a Section 69, so far as material, is set out at [8], below

In the instant case that meant that the court would refer not only to the arbitrator's award but also to the correspondence and documents referred to in the award as comprising the sub-contract in order to consider the true construction of the qualification which formed the basis of the claimant's appeal (see [44]–[46], below); Foleys Ltd v East London Family and Community Services [1997] ADRLJ 401 and HOK Sport Ltd (formerly Lobb Partnership Ltd) v Aintree Racecourse Co Ltd (2002) 86 Con LR 165 considered.

(2) There was no philosophy or ethos of the 1996 Act which should deter the court from answering any questions of law raised by the appeal correctly in the event that the arbitrator had erred. Amongst other reasons that was because party autonomy was one of the three general principles upon which Pt I of the 1996 Act was founded and, in the instant case, the parties had agreed in the exercise of their autonomy that an appeal should lie to the courts on any question of law (see [48]–[50], below); Lesotho Highlands Development Authority v Impregilo SpA [2005] 3 All ER 789 distinguished.

(3) The principles to be applied by the court to an abitrator's award were as follows. First, the court should read an arbitral award as a whole in a fair and reasonable way. It should not engage in minute textual analysis. Second, where the arbitrator's experience assisted him in determining a question of law, such as the interpretation of contractual documents or correspondence passing between members of his own trade or industry, the court would accord some deference to the arbitrator's decision on that question. The court would only reverse that decision if it were satisfied that the arbitrator, despite the benefit of his relevant experience, had come to the wrong answer (see [51]–[57], below); Finelvet AG v Vinava Shipping Co Ltd, The Chrysalis [1983] 2 All ER 658, Zermalt Holdings SA v Nu-Life Upholstery Repairs Ltd [1985] 2 EGLR 14, Gill & Duffus SA v Société pour l'Exportation des Sucres SA [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep 322 and Fidelity Management SA v Myriad International Holdings BV [2005] 2 All ER (Comm) 312 considered.

(4) Questions of law arising out of an award were to be identified in line with existing authority by examining the way in which an arbitrator had stated the law in his reasons and by examining whether the correct application of law to the facts would have led to a different decision. In the instant case only one of the questions raised by the claimant was a question of law and it needed to be modified in order to be relevant to the appeal. The arbitrator had come to the right conclusion on the modified question and accordingly the appeal would be dismissed (see [58]–[63], [69], [91], [92] below); Finelvet AG v Vinava Shipping Co Ltd, The Chrysalis [1983] 2 All ER 658 and Geogas SA v Trammo Gas Ltd, The Baleares [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep 215 applied.

Notes

For the law relating to appeals from an arbitration award on a question of law see 2(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 75.

For the Arbitration Act 1996, s 69, see 2 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2003 reissue) 702.

Cases referred to in judgment

André et Cie v Cook Industries Inc [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep 200; rvsd [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep 463, CA.

Bank Mellat v GAA Development and Construction Co [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep 44.

Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA (in liq) v Ali [2001] UKHL 8, [2001] 1 All ER 961, [2002] 1 AC 251, [2001] 2 WLR 735.

Covington Marine Corp v Xiamen Shipbuilding Industry Co Ltd [2005] EWHC 2912 (Comm), [2005] All ER (D) 245 (Dec).

Fidelity Management SA v Myriad International Holdings BV [2005] EWHC 1193 (Comm), [2005] 2 All ER (Comm) 312.

Finelvet AG v Vinava Shipping Co Ltd, The Chrysalis [1983] 2 All ER 658, [1983] 1 WLR 1469.

Foleys Ltd v East London Family and Community Services [1997] ADRLJ 401.

Geogas SA v Trammo Gas Ltd, The Baleares [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep 215, CA.

Gill & Duffus SA v Société pour l'Exportation des Sucres SA [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep 322, CA.

Hallamshire Construction plc v South Holland DC [2003] EWHC 8 (TCC), (2004) 93 Con LR 103.

HOK Sport Ltd (formerly Lobb Partnership Ltd) v Aintree Racecourse Co Ltd [2002] EWHC 3094 (TCC), (2002) 86 Con LR 165.

Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v West Bromwich Building Society, Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v Hopkin & Sons (a firm), Alford v West Bromwich Building Society, Armitage v West Bromwich Building Society [1998] 1 All ER 98, [1998] 1 WLR 896, HL.

K/S A/S Bill Biakh v Hyundai Corp [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep 187.

Lesotho Highlands Development Authority v Impregilo SpA [2005] UKHL 43, [2005] 3 All ER 789, [2005] 3 WLR 129.

Moran v Lloyd's [1983] 2 All ER 200, [1983] QB 542, [1983] 2 WLR 672, CA.

Pioneer Shipping Ltd v BTP Tioxide Ltd, The Nema [1981] 2 All ER 1030, [1982] AC 724, [1981] 3 WLR 292, HL.

Scheldebouw BV v St James Homes (Grosvenor Dock) Ltd [2006] EWHC 89 (TCC), [2006] BLR 113.

Vascroft (Contractors) Ltd v Seeboard plc (1996) 78 BLR 132.

Zermalt Holdings SA v Nu-Life Upholstery Repairs Ltd [1985] 2 EGLR 14.

Appeal

Kershaw Mechanical Services Ltd (Kershaw) brought arbitration proceedings against Kendrick Construction Ltd (Kendrick) in relation to sums due under a building contract. The arbitrator, Mr Don Smith, revised the sums due under the final account. By a claim form issued in the Technology and Construction Court on 21 December 2005 Kershaw appealed against the abitrator's award pursuant to s 69 of the Arbitration Act 1996. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Robert Clay (instructed by Hannah & Mould) for Kershaw.

Simon Henderson (instructed by Bell Lax Litigation, Sutton Coldfield) for Kendrick.

Cur adv vult

2 March 2006. The following judgment was delivered.

JACKSON J.

[1] This judgment is in seven parts, namely Part 1—Introduction; Part 2—The facts; Part 3—The Present Proceedings; Part 4—What is the correct approach of the court to an appeal under s 69(2)(a) of the 1996 Act? Part 5—Which, if any, of the four questions formulated by Kershaw are questions of law arising out of the award? Part 6—What are the answers to those questions which have survived scrutiny? Part 7—Conclusion.

PART 1—INTRODUCTION

[2] This is an appeal under s 69 of the Arbitration Act 1996 against an arbitrator's partial award determining what sums are due to a sub-contractor on its final account.

[3] Kershaw Mechanical Services Ltd is the sub-contractor. I shall refer to this company as 'Kershaw'. Kershaw was claimant in the arbitration; Kershaw is also claimant in these proceedings.

[4] Kendrick Construction Ltd is the main contractor. I shall refer to this company as 'Kendrick'. Kendrick was respondent in the arbitration and is defendant in these proceedings.

[5] The employer, under the main contract, is Birmingham Heartlands and Solihull National Health Service Trust. I shall refer to this body as 'the trust'. Two firms of engineers will feature in the story. They are White, Young and Green, to whom I shall refer as 'WYG', and RW Gregory, to whom I shall refer as 'RWG'.

[6] The sub-contract in this case incorporated, with modifications, the standard form of sub-contract published by the JCT, known as 'DOM\2', 1981 edition.

[7] In this judgment I shall refer to the Arbitration Act 1996 as 'the 1996 Act'. Section 1 of the 1996 Act provides:

> 'General principles.—The provisions of this Part are founded on the following principles, and shall be construed accordingly—(a) the object of arbitration is to obtain the fair resolution of disputes by an impartial tribunal without unnecessary delay or expense; (b) the parties should be free to agree how their disputes are resolved, subject only to such safeguards as are necessary in the public interest; (c) in matters governed by this Part the court should not intervene except as provided by this Part.'

[8] Section 69 of the 1996 Act provides:

> '(1) Unless otherwise agreed by the parties, a party to arbitral proceedings may (upon notice to the other parties and to the tribunal) appeal to the court on a question of law arising out of an award made in the proceedings. An agreement to dispense with reasons for the tribunal's award shall be considered an agreement to exclude the court's jurisdiction under this section.
>
> (2) An appeal shall not be brought under this section except—(a) with the agreement of all the other parties to the proceedings, or (b) with the leave of the court . . .
>
> (7) On an appeal under this section the court may by order—(a) confirm the award, (b) vary the award, (c) remit the award to the tribunal, in whole or in part, for reconsideration in the light of the court's determination, or (d) set aside the award in whole or in part.
>
> The court shall not exercise its power to set aside an award, in whole or in part, unless it is satisfied that it would be inappropriate to remit the matters in question to the tribunal for reconsideration.'

[9] Having dealt with these preliminary matters, I must now turn to the facts.

PART 2—THE FACTS

[10] In the late 1990s the trust decided to extend the Heartlands Hospital in Birmingham by constructing two new blocks of wards. The trust's requirements for the new buildings were set out in a series of specifications, appendices, drawings and related documents. This amalgam of documents is referred to compendiously as 'the employer's requirements'.

[11] In late 1999 and early 2000, Kendrick was preparing a tender for the design and construction of the new hospital buildings. Kendrick assembled a team of consultants and sub-contractors whom Kendrick intended to engage for the project in the event that the trust accepted Kendrick's tender. Kendrick appointed WYG to design the mechanical and electrical services. Kendrick chose Kershaw as the prospective sub-contractor to supply and install the mechanical services and a different firm as prospective sub-contractor to supply and install the electrical services.

[12] On 8 March 2000 Kershaw submitted its tender for the supply and installation of mechanical services in the sum of £1,838,697. This figure comprised 13 components, one of which was the sum of £59,503 attributed to above ground drainage.

[13] Kershaw's tender letter included the following passage:

> '8. The following items are not included within our tender. A. Full conceptual design responsibility . . . 3. At this stage we have made no allowance for design works. However, we have allowed to work alongside White, Young and Green, to develop the design. 14. We have allowed, within our tender, to develop sketches and schematics produced by White, Young and Green into fully co-ordinated and working drawings.'

[14] Following the receipt of tenders from Kershaw and other prospective sub-contractors, Kendrick submitted its own tender to the trust for the overall design and construction of the two new hospital buildings. Happily Kendrick's tender was accepted and work commenced on the project.

[15] In October 2000 Kendrick sent a letter of intent to Kershaw on the basis of which Kershaw commenced work in relation to mechanical services. In February 2001 Kendrick dispensed with the services of WYG and, instead, appointed RWG to design the mechanical and electrical services.

[16] On 19 April 2001 Kendrick sent a memo to Kershaw listing (a) the documents which comprised the employer's requirements in relation to mechanical services and (b) other documents upon which Kershaw's tender had been based. These other documents included 'all pre-tender correspondence from White, Young and Green'. This somewhat elliptical phrase was understood by all parties to cover not only letters but also drawings, sizing schedules and similar documents provided by WYG. Kendrick's memo of 19 April also recorded certain additions to and omissions from the mechanical services, which had been agreed since the date of Kershaw's tender. The overall agreed effect of these additions and omissions was to reduce Kershaw's tender figure to £1,785,444·39.

[17] On 30 April 2001 Kendrick sent a draft order to Kershaw, requesting Kershaw to carry out the supply and installation of all mechanical works for the sum of £1,785,444·39 in accordance with the documents which were attached. These attachments included Kendrick's memo dated 19 April and the DOM\2 articles of agreement with certain manuscript amendments. Those manuscript amendments included deletion of the design requirement set out in the first recital. In the DOM\2 appendix, under the heading 'Part 15' Kendrick wrote: 'As covered by all items referred to in our facsimile transmission dated 19th April 2001 (four pages).'

[18] On 9 May 2001 Kershaw responded as follows:

'Thank you for your faxed draft of the order and DOM\2 agreement. Comments as follows . . . 8. Part 15. Since your fax is a numbered document I do not see the need to incorporate what you say here. However, I am still unhappy that the document properly reports the basis of our pricing. I understood what you are saying as an objection to us incorporating our schedule of information we received from White, Young Green for tender purposes in that you currently do not have access to their files to check it is comprehensive. Although I can assure you that we are not deliberately concealing anything. Accordingly, for the avoidance of doubt I would like this statement incorporated here. "Certain information was provided on behalf of the contractor to the sub-contractor by White, Young Green as noted in the contractor's facts of 19/04/01. It is agreed that where and to the extent that the final design information, supplied by the contractor or his consultant, differs from that information previously supplied, as noted above, then the sub-contract sum will be adjusted" . . . Regards Jack Kirk.'

[19] The statement comprising two sentences, which Kershaw required to be incorporated, has been referred to by all parties as 'the qualification' and I shall adopt that term.

[20] In July 2001 a formal sub-contract was concluded between Kendrick and Kershaw. The documents comprising the sub-contract included Kershaw's tender dated 8 March 2000, Kendrick's draft order dated 30 April 2001 plus attachments and Kershaw's letter to Kendrick dated 9 May 2001. It can thus be seen that the sub-contract in this case was a modified version of the DOM\2 sub-contract supplemented by correspondence between the parties. This correspondence included the qualification.

[21] Clause 1.3 of the standard conditions of the DOM\2 sub-contract provides:

'Variation: Where clause 15.1 applies the term "Variation" means any of the following changes which are required by a direction of the contractor issued under the Sub-Contract:

1. the alteration or modification of the design, quality or quantity of the Sub-Contract Works including:

1. the addition, omission or substitution of any work,

2. the alteration of the kind or standard of any of the materials or goods to be used in the Sub-Contract work.

3. The removal from the site of any work, materials or goods executed or brought thereon by the Sub-Contractor for the purposes of the Sub-Contract Works other than work, materials or goods which are not in accordance with the Sub-Contract.

2. the imposition in an instruction of the Employer issued under the Main Contract of any obligations or restrictions in regard to the matters set out in paragraphs 2.1 to 2.4 or the addition to or alteration or omission of any such obligations or restrictions set out or referred to in the Appendix Part 1 Section E, insofar as such addition, alteration or omission is contained in such an instruction of the Employer effecting a Change in the Employer's Requirements, in regard to:

1. access to the site or use of any specific parts of the site,

2. limitations of working space,

3. limitations of working hours.

4. the execution or completion of the work in any specific order.

Where clause 15.2 applies the term "Variation" has the same meaning but in paragraph 1 of this definition delete "design, quality or quantity" and insert "design or quality".'

[22] Clause 16 of the standard conditions sets out rules for valuing variations. Both art 4 and cl 38B of the standard conditions provide for disputes between the parties to be referred to arbitration. Clause 38B.5 provides:

'The parties hereby agree and consent, pursuant to Sections 45(2)(a) and 69(2)(a) of the Arbitration Act 1996, that either party may (upon notice to the other party and to the Arbitrator):

1. apply to the courts to determine any question of law arising in the course of the reference; and

2. apply to the courts on any question of law arising out of an award made in an arbitration under this Arbitration Agreement.'

[23] After concluding the sub-contract, Kershaw proceeded with the execution of their works. Kershaw achieved practical completion on 2 October 2002. Thereafter Kershaw submitted its final account to Kendrick. Unfortunately, the parties were unable to agree about numerous items in the final account. These disagreements were referred to arbitration in accordance with art 4 and cl 38B of the sub-contract. The parties reached agreement upon the choice of arbitrator, namely Mr Don Smith, who is an experienced quantity surveyor practising in the West Midlands.

[24] The hearing of the arbitration took place at a hotel in Coventry, over a period of three weeks in June and July 2005. The arbitrator sat for ten days during that period. The arbitrator received factual and expert evidence called on behalf of both parties. The hearing bundle comprised extensive correspondence and contemporaneous records relating to the matters in dispute. Mr Robert Clay of counsel represented Kershaw and Mr Simon Henderson of counsel represented Kendrick. Both counsel made detailed oral and written submissions for which the arbitrator expressed his appreciation.

[25] After the end of the hearing the arbitrator considered matters for some four months. On 24 November 2005 the arbitrator delivered his partial award, dealing with all matters in issue, save costs. For convenience, I shall refer to this partial award as 'the award'.

[26] The arbitrator's award is lengthy and thorough. In the early pages the arbitrator sets out the factual background and the parties' rival contentions as to the effect of the qualification. The arbitrator then summarises pertinent parts of the expert and factual evidence. After that the arbitrator turns to the issues of principle. The arbitrator considers the question of priority as between sub-contract documents; he concludes that all the documents listed in Kershaw's memo of 19 April 2001 carried equal weight. The arbitrator notes that under the sub-contract Kershaw did not have design responsibility.

[27] The arbitrator then describes the process whereby Kershaw prepared its tender as follows:

'62.1 The evidence of Kendrick is that there was no partnering agreement but that Kershaw and Kendrick worked hand in hand as a team, to prepare the tender. This is borne out by the evidence of Mr O'Connor, who attended several meetings with the design team, made requests for information and eventually arrived at a situation where Kershaw had sufficient information to submit a compliant tender. Had the parties not been working as a team Kershaw's only obligation would have been to price the information which was provided, specifically exclude all other information and submit a non-compliant tender, with appropriate exclusions.

62.2 I am therefore of the view that in the preparation of the tender, Kendrick and Kershaw worked as a team, together with WYG, the designer.

63. I set out below my findings in relation to the arrangements between the parties pre-tender.

63.1 The design was done by WYG. In order to prepare a design WYG took the ER's, the specification, the room data sheets, the architect's drawings, the mechanical drawings, extrapolated the necessary information and produced schematic drawings, sketches and component lists to enable the works to be priced by Kershaw. The above facts are not disputed by the parties.

63.2 Kershaw used such information to prepare its tender sum. Prior to submission of the tender, Kershaw attended meetings with the design team at which it requested further information to enable it to provide a compliant tender. At the date of the tender, Kershaw was satisfied that it had been provided with sufficient information to provide a compliant tender. The above facts are supported by the evidence of Mr O'Connor.

63.3 The information provided by WYG did not contain details of every pipe run, valve, union, volume control damper or access door. Indeed, not every floor of the building was designed. Where such information was not shown on a drawing or in a schedule, Kershaw used its initiative as an experienced mechanical installations sub-contractor to include for such ancillary equipment, which was not shown on the schematic drawings, sketches or schedules, but which was an essential part of a complete system, without which the system would not operate. The above facts are substantiated by the factual evidence of Mr Kirk and Mr O'Connor and the expert evidence of Mr Standley. While the evidence of Mr King does not support the above facts, I prefer the factual evidence of Mr Kirk and Mr O'Connor in this regard.

63.4 In addition to the drawn and scheduled information, Kershaw was to have regard to the ER's, the specification and the room data sheets in order to provide a compliant installation. For example the above ground drainage was not drawn but it was described and due allowance was made in Kershaw's tender. Another example was a requirement for the diversion of existing services which was not shown on a WYG drawing, but was shown on a CPW drawing, which formed part of the ER's and due allowance was made for this in Kershaw's tender. The above facts are supported by the factual evidence of Mr Kirk and Mr O'Connor and the expert evidence of Mr Stanley.

63.5 Kershaw submitted a compliant tender.'

[28] It should be noted that Mr Kirk and Mr O'Connor, who are referred to in that passage, are both employees of Kershaw. Mr King, who is also referred to in that passage, is or at least was Kershaw's expert witness.

[29] In paras 66 to 70 of his award, the arbitrator sets out what his approach will be to the disputed variation items. He states:

'66. The above however, must be considered in the context that while not all the detail was shown on the information provided by WYG, Kershaw had an obligation to include the components which were an essential part of the drawn or described installation in order to make it compliant. Therefore in the event that RWG in the final design drew or described a component which was an essential part of the WYG design, but which had not been drawn or described by WYG, this clearly cannot be a variation under the qualification which warrants an adjustment to the sub-contract sum, as allowance should have been made in Kershaw's compliant tender, for such components or equipment.

67. In my view there is no hard and fast rule which can be applied across the board in order to ascertain whether or not a variation is under the terms of the qualification. Each variation must be considered on its merits based upon my paras 65 and 66 of this decision.

68. I will therefore, when deciding Kershaw's entitlement to additional payment under the qualification, carry out an analysis in order to firstly ascertain whether or not the information necessary to include the item in the tender was available from the information provided by WYG at the time of tender. In the event that I find that the claimed item was not contained within the information provided by WYG, I will then ascertain whether the information was available from any other source at the time of tender and whether Kershaw as an experienced mechanical services sub-contractor should have included the claimed item on the grounds that although it was not drawn or described, it was an essential component which was necessary to provide a compliant installation.

69. In the event I find that the claimed item was not shown on the WYG information, or was not shown on other information, or could not reasonably have been implied as necessary to provide a compliant system, or has increased in size or capacity from that shown on or implied from the WYG information, I will find that the claimed item is a variation under the qualification and arrive at a fair and reasonable adjustment to the sub-contract sum.

70. On the other hand in the event I find that the claimed item was not shown on the WYG information but could have been obtained from other available information or was necessary to provide a compliant installation, I will find that the claimed item is not a variation under the qualification and make no adjustment to the sub-contract sum.'

[30] Having dealt with these general questions of principle and approach, the arbitrator then turns to the specific and detailed items, which he is required to decide. The arbitrator deals individually with 44 disputed items in Kershaw's final account and five disputed contra-charges put forward by Kendrick. The arbitrator also records the financial effect of 70 further items in Kershaw's final account, which were agreed either before or during the hearing. Finally there is a summary, at the end of the award, which shows (after correction of certain clerical errors) that £1,993,238·17 is due to Kershaw on its final account.

[31] Kershaw was aggrieved by the arbitrator's decision. Kershaw took the view that, on a proper application of the qualification to the variation claims, the sum due on the final account was well in excess of £2m. Accordingly, in order to challenge the arbitrator's decision, Kershaw commenced the present proceedings.

PART 3—THE PRESENT PROCEEDINGS

[32] By a claim form issued in the Technology and Construction Court on 21 December 2005, Kershaw appealed against the arbitrator's award, pursuant to s 69 of the 1996 Act. By reason of cl 38B.5 of the standard conditions of sub-contract and s 69(2)(a) of the 1996 Act, this is an appeal which the claimant is entitled to pursue without any need for the leave of the court.

[33] The essential argument advanced in the claim form is that the arbitrator has erred in his interpretation of the qualification. As a result the arbitrator has erroneously rejected the following eight variation items: (1) 1.13 street heating. (2) 1.44\1.44A fire and smoke dampers. (3) 1.51 (also known as VO1.10) plant room extract fans. (4) 1.57 (VO1.09) above ground drainage. (5) MO2 diversion of underground services. (6) MO27 food challenge kitchen extract canopy and ducts. (7) MO46 wiring to plant in medical gas plant room. (8) MO91 provide drains from medical gases plant room.

[34] Further, it is alleged that the arbitrator has erroneously awarded too small a sum in respect of the following eight variation items: (1) 1.09 (also known as VO1-01) heating pipework; (2) 1.10 (VO1.1.02) heating insulation; (3) 1.23 (VO1-04) domestic pipework; (4) 1.26 (VO1-05) domestic insulation; (5) 1.29 steam and condensate pipework; (6) 1.30 steam and condensate insulation; (7) 1.53 (also known as VO1-07) ductwork; (8) 1.55 (also known as VO1-08) ductwork insulation.

[35] The questions of law upon which the appeal is based, as set out in the claim form (after amendment during the course of the present hearing) read as follows:

> '1. On the true construction of the Qualification is the Qualification intended to permit an adjustment where the final design information differs from the information supplied by White Young Green?
>
> 2. Does the Qualification permit adjustments for items which would have been allowed for in the tender if Kershaw had been tendering on a design and build basis?
>
> 3. Does the fact that Kershaw did not expressly qualify its tender or raise areas of uncertainty in March 2000 preclude Kershaw from recovering an adjustment under the Qualification for items omitted by WYG?
>
> 4. Is the Qualification in fact more restrictive than the ordinary variation clause or less restrictive?'

[36] Although a number of remedies are claimed in the claim form, the principal relief sought is that the award be remitted to the arbitrator for reconsideration in the light of the court's decision on the four questions of law posed.

[37] The evidence, which has been lodged in respect of this appeal, comprises the following: (1) the arbitrator's award; (2) a witness statement made by the defendant's solicitor exhibiting the contractual documents and also Kendrick's closing written submissions in the arbitration; (3) a witness statement made by the claimant's solicitor exhibiting certain further pre-contract correspondence and also extracts from Kershaw's opening and closing written submissions in the arbitration.

[38] The hearing of this appeal commenced on Monday of this week (27 February). Mr Robert Clay represents Kershaw, as he did before the arbitrator, and Mr Simon Henderson represents Kendrick, as he did before the arbitrator. Counsel's submissions occupied the whole of Monday and Tuesday.

All issues relevant to the appeal have been explored and counsel have kindly carried out further research, at my request, in order to ensure that all authorities bearing upon the correct approach to an appeal under s 69(2)(a) of the 1996 Act are before the court. I am grateful to both counsel for their industry in this regard.

[39] The issues debated at the hearing may be grouped under the following three headings: (1) What is the correct approach of the court to an appeal under s 69(2)(a) of the 1996 Act? (2) Which, if any, of the four questions formulated by Kershaw are questions of law arising out of the award? (3) What are the answers to those questions which have survived scrutiny? I shall now deal with matters in that order.

PART 4—WHAT IS THE CORRECT APPROACH OF THE COURT TO AN APPEAL UNDER S 69(2)(A) OF THE 1996 ACT?

[40] Four topics have been debated at the hearing under this rubric. They are: (1) What evidence can the court receive in an appeal under s 69(2)? (2) Is there a philosophy of non-intervention, which should influence the court hearing an appeal under s 69(2)(a)? (3) What degree of deference should be shown to the arbitrator's decisions on questions of law? (4) How should the court identify any questions of law arising out of the award?

[41] The first and third of these topics are of general application to appeals under s 69. The second and fourth of these topics are limited to appeals under s 69(2)(a). I shall deal with the four topics in that order.

(1) What evidence can the court receive in an appeal under s 69?

[42] Two authorities have been cited on this question. In Foleys Ltd v East London Family and Community Services [1997] ADRLJ 401, Colman J refused an application for leave to appeal under s 1 of the Arbitration Act 1979. He viewed with displeasure a bundle of pleadings, evidence and submissions from the arbitration, which had been placed before the court. Colman J said that such evidence may be admissible on an application to remit the award under s 22 of the Arbitration Act 1950 or to set the award aside for misconduct. However, such evidence was inadmissible on an application for leave to appeal on a point of law. On such an application only the arbitrator's award should be put before the court, supplemented possibly by brief evidence in respect of the Nema guidelines (see Pioneer Shipping Ltd v BTP Tioxide Ltd, The Nema [1981] 2 All ER 1030, [1982] AC 724).

[43] In HOK Sport Ltd (formerly Lobb Partnership Ltd) v Aintree Racecourse Co Ltd [2002] EWHC 3094 (TCC), (2002) 86 Con LR 165, Judge Thornton QC stated that the practice of the Technology and Construction Court was the same as the practice of the Commercial Court in this regard. Judge Thornton said this (at [18]):

> 'Whatever may have been the misconception of practitioners as to the applicable practice in the Official Referees' Court before Foley's case was decided in March 1997, it should now be clear to experienced practitioners in the TCC that extraneous materials are not to be referred to in arbitration appeal leave applications. It is also important to stress that such materials are not admissible in the hearing of appeals on questions of law arising out of awards, particularly since many construction arbitration appeals are brought without the applicant first having had to obtain the leave of the court. This is because many construction contracts contain an arbitration clause that provides the parties' joint consent to an appeal being brought without the need to first obtain the leave of the court.'

Paragraph 10.4.1. of the second edition of the TCC Guide faithfully reflects the guidance given in the Foleys case and the HOK Sport case.

[44] The present case, however, reveals that this approach may be too restrictive. Kershaw's appeal turns upon the true construction of the qualification. The qualification is set out verbatim by the arbitrator in para 19 of his award. The qualification forms part of a series of correspondence, which became incorporated into the sub-contract. The arbitrator helpfully identifies the relevant correspondence and documents in his award although, for obvious reasons, he does not recite them from beginning to end. Nevertheless, for the purposes of this appeal, the court needs to look at the contractual correspondence and documents, which the arbitrator has identified. The court cannot construe the qualification in isolation; the court must read the qualification in the context of the series of documents of which it forms part. See, for example, Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v West Bromwich Building Society, Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v Hopkin & Sons (a firm), Alford v West Bromwich Building Society, Armitage v West Bromwich Building Society [1998] 1 All ER 98 at 114–115, [1998] 1 WLR 896 at 912–913 and Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA (in liq) v Ali [2001] UKHL 8 at [39], [2001] 1 All ER 961 at [39], [2002] 1 AC 251. See also Scheldebouw BV v St James Homes (Grosvenor Dock) Ltd [2006] EWHC 89 (TCC) at [39], [2006] BLR 113 at [39]. Sheldebouw is a case where the principles stated by the House of Lords in the Investors Compensation Scheme case and the BCCI case were applied to the interpretation of a construction contract.

[45] In my view the guidance given in the HOK Sport case should be modified to this extent. The principal document which should be considered in any appeal under s 69 of the 1996 Act is the arbitral award itself. In addition to that, however, the court should also receive any document referred to in the award, which the court needs to read in order to determine a question of law arising out of the award.

[46] It is for these reasons that during the present appeal I have looked not only at the arbitrator's award but also at the correspondence and documents referred to in the award as comprising the sub-contract. I have not found it either necessary or helpful to examine the other documents put in evidence, such as written submissions made to the arbitrator.

[47] The summary of the facts set out in Part 2 of this judgment is drawn exclusively from (a) the arbitrator's award and (b) the correspondence and documents identified by the arbitrator as comprising the sub-contract.

(2) Is there a philosophy of non-intervention which should influence the court hearing an appeal under s 69(2)(a)?

[48] In his skeleton argument Mr Henderson contends that the general philosophy of non-intervention by judges (which pervades the 1996 Act) should discourage the court from allowing an appeal brought under s 69(2)(a). He cites Lesotho Highlands Development Authority v Impregilo SpA [2005] UKHL 43, [2005] 3 All ER 789, [2005] 3 WLR 129. Mr Henderson relies in particular upon that section of Lord Steyn's speech in the Lesotho Highlands case which is headed 'The ethos of the 1996 Act'.

[49] Mr Clay, on the other hand, submits that the Lesotho Highlands case is irrelevant. That case was concerned with a challenge under s 68 of the 1996 Act, since an appeal under s 69 was barred by the International Chamber of Commerce rules. Mr Clay further points out that in the present case the parties have expressly agreed that there should be an appeal on questions of law to the court. Therefore the court should simply decide the questions of law, which have been posed. The court should not be deterred by any philosophy or ethos of the 1996 Act.

[50] On this issue, I accept the submissions of Mr Clay. The court must decide any questions of law raised by the appeal, however difficult or finely balanced they may be. There is no philosophy or ethos of the 1996 Act which should deter the court from answering those questions correctly, in the event that the arbitrator has erred. I reach this conclusion for five reasons:

(1) Party autonomy is one of the three general principles upon which Pt I of the 1996 Act is founded (see s 1(b) of the 1996 Act).

(2) The parties in the present case, in the exercise of their autonomy, have agreed that an appeal shall lie to the courts on any questions of law.

(3) The principle of non-intervention stated in s 1(c) of the 1996 Act is qualified by the important words, 'except as provided by this Part'. Section 69(2)(a) of the 1996 Act is a provision falling within that exception. It expressly permits an appeal on questions of law to be brought by agreement between the parties.

(4) The Lesotho Highlands case should be distinguished because it concerned proceedings under s 68 of the 1996 Act. In the Lesotho Highlands case the general principles set out in s 1(b) and (c) of the 1996 Act pointed strongly in favour of non-intervention. The consequence in the Lesotho Highlands case was that the House of Lords refused to set aside or remit an arbitral decision, which was wrong in law. The present case, which is brought under s 69(2)(a), is at the other end of the spectrum.

(5) The above conclusions are consistent with the observations of Judge Humphrey Lloyd QC in Vascroft (Contractors) Ltd v Seeboard plc (1996) 78 BLR 132 at 163–164.

(3) What degree of deference should be shown to the arbitrator's decisions on questions of law?

[51] The next issue which arises concerns the degree of deference which this court should show to an arbitrator's decision when determining what are the correct answers to any questions of law arising out of the award. This issue has nothing to do with any philosophy or ethos of the 1996 Act. It involves reviewing a line of authority, which stretches back over 25 years.

[52] In Finelvet AG v Vinava Shipping Co Ltd, The Chrysalis [1983] 2 All ER 658, [1983] 1 WLR 1469 Mustill J dismissed an appeal against an arbitrator's decision concerning the contractual consequences of a conflict between Iran and Iraq, whereby vessels were trapped at Basrah. The appeal was brought pursuant to s 1(3)(a) of the Arbitration Act 1979, by reason of an agreement between the parties that each should have the right of appeal on any question of law. Mustill J said ([1983] 2 All ER 658 at 670, [1983] 1 WLR 1469 at 1483):

> 'First, it is pointed out by the charterers that the arbitrator is not a commercial man, but is instead a lawyer of long experience. Hence, so it is said, the court should be more ready than in many cases to substitute its own view of the correct solution, than if he had, for example, been a shipbroker. I recognise that in the context of some types of dispute there might be force in such a submission. For example, if the issue concerned a matter of judgment in a field where long practical experience was of the essence, a judge might feel that he was just as well or ill equipped to establish the correct "bracket" as would be a legally trained arbitrator, whereas he would be much more cautious if the arbitrator himself possessed the necessary experience.' a [53] Zermalt Holdings SA v Nu-Life Upholstery Repairs Ltd [1985] 2 EGLR 14 was a case concerning an application by a landlord to set aside the award made by an arbitrator in a rent review arbitration. At the start of his judgment Bingham J said this: b

'as a matter of general approach, the courts strive to uphold arbitration awards. They do not approach them with a meticulous legal eye endeavouring to pick holes, inconsistencies and faults in awards and with the objective of upsetting or frustrating the process of arbitration. Far from it. The approach is to read an arbitration award in a reasonable and commercial way, expecting, as is usually the case, that there will be no substantial fault that can be found with it.' c

[54] In Gill & Duffus SA v Société pour l'Exportation des Sucres SA [1986] 1 Lloyd's Rep 322 both Leggatt J, in the Commercial Court, and the Court of Appeal allowed an appeal against an arbitral decision of the Council of the Refined Sugar Association. Sir John Donaldson MR, giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal, said this (at 325): d

'For my part, like the learned Judge, I am most reluctant to reverse or differ from a trade tribunal. Nevertheless, the issue is one of construction and thus of law. The arbitrators' finding of fact is part of the contractual matrix and a very important part, but it is no more than that. There is no suggestion that the process of shipment under an f.o.b. contract for sugar or indeed contracts for the sale of sugar generally are in any relevant respect different from contracts for the sale of some other soft commodity. All that is said is that those engaged in the sugar trade find strict punctuality difficult, which may well be true of other trades not to mention other individuals, and that in practice they adopt a more relaxed attitude. This seems to me to be quite insufficient to displace the construction which would usually be placed upon a term involving interdependent obligations in relation to the time for loading, reinforced, as it is in the present case, by the use of the imperative words "at latest".' e f g

[55] In André et Cie v Cook Industries Inc [1986] 2 Lloyd's Rep 200 Bingham J was dealing with an award of the Board of Appeal of the Grain and Feed Trade Association stated in the form of a special case. One of the issues which arose concerned the interpretation of some exchanges by telex. Bingham J said this (at 204): h

'I should be very slow to differ from a trade tribunal on the meaning reasonably to be given to telex exchanges of the sort in issue here. Ultimately, of course, the construction of any written instrument is a question of law on which the Court is entitled and bound to rule, but the significance of a meaning attributed by the reasonable non-lawyer varies widely from instrument to instrument and according to the circumstances of the case. Here one is dealing with communications by trader to trader, in the context of an unexpected and fast-moving situation. A trade tribunal brings to the task of interpretation certain insights denied (to a greater or lesser extent) to the Court: an informed appreciation of the commercial situation as it unfolded, seen through the eyes of a trader; an understanding of the j > hopes and fears and pressures which moved traders at the time; an awareness of the extent to which, at the time, the future course of events appeared obscure and unpredictable; a knowledge of the language which one trader habitually uses to another. So, in a case such as this the Court's task is not one of pure construction and I should be reluctant to differ from the board unless it appeared that the board's construction was fairly [and] plainly untenable.'

[56] In Fidelity Management SA v Myriad International Holdings BV [2005] EWHC 1193 (Comm), [2005] 2 All ER (Comm) 312 Morison J cited and followed the dictum of Bingham J in the Zermalt Holdings case, which has been quoted above. The Fidelity Management case concerned a challenge under s 68 of the 1996 Act and so the details of Morison J's reasoning are not directly in point for present purposes.

[57] From this line of authority I derive two principles, which I shall apply in this appeal. (1) The court should read an arbitral award as a whole in a fair and reasonable way. The court should not engage in minute textual analysis. (2) Where the arbitrator's experience assists him in determining a question of law, such as the interpretation of contractual documents or correspondence passing between members of his own trade or industry, the court will accord some deference to the arbitrator's decision on that question. The court will only reverse that decision if it is satisfied that the arbitrator, despite the benefit of his relevant experience, has come to the wrong answer.

(4) How should the court identify any questions of law arising out of the award?

[58] The final matter to consider is how the court should identify any questions of law arising out of the award. In appeals brought under s 1(3)(a) of the Arbitration Act 1979 or s 69(2)(a) of the 1996 Act, there is no opportunity for the proposed questions of law to be refined or limited at the leave stage. See Hallamshire Construction plc v South Holland DC [2003] EWHC 8 (TCC) at [11], (2004) 93 Con LR 103 at [11].

[59] In relation to this matter, Mustill J gave helpful guidance in The Chrysalis [1983] 2 All ER 658 at 663, [1983] 1 WLR 1469 at 1475. He said:

> 'Starting therefore with the proposition that the court is concerned to decide, on the hearing of the appeal, whether the award can be shown to be wrong in law, how is this question to be tackled? In a case such as the present, the answer is to be found by dividing the arbitrator's process of reasoning into three stages. (1) The arbitrator ascertains the facts. This process includes the making of findings on any facts which are in dispute. (2) The arbitrator ascertains the law. This process comprises not only the identification of all material rules of statute and common law, but also the identification and interpretation of the relevant parts of the contract, and the identification of those facts which must be taken into account when the decision is reached. (3) In the light of the facts and the law so ascertained, the arbitrator reaches his decision.
>
> In some cases the third stage will be purely mechanical. Once the law is correctly ascertained, the decision follows inevitably from the application of it to the facts found. In other instances, however, the third stage involves an element of judgment on the part of the arbitrator. There is no uniquely "right" answer to be derived from marrying the facts and the law, merely a choice of answers, none of which can be described as wrong.

The second stage of the process is the proper subject matter of an appeal under the 1979 Act. In some cases an error of law can be demonstrated by studying the way in which the arbitrator has stated the law in his reasons. It is, however, also possible to infer an error of law in those cases where a correct application of the law to the facts found would lead inevitably to one answer, whereas the arbitrator has arrived at another; and this can be so even if the arbitrator has stated the law in his reasons in a manner which appears to be correct: for the court is then driven to assume that he did not properly understand the principles which he had stated.

Whether the third stage can ever be the proper subject of an appeal, in those cases where the making of the decision does not follow automatically from the ascertainment of the facts and the law, is not a matter on which it is necessary to express a view in the present case.'

[60] These observations were made in relation to an appeal under s (1)(3)(a) of the 1979 Act. They are, however, equally applicable to an appeal under s 69(2)(a) of the 1996 Act. It should be noted that the passage, which I have just quoted, was cited by Langley J in Covington Marine Corp v Xiamen Shipbuilding Industry Co Ltd [2005] EWHC 2912 (Comm), [2005] All ER (D) 245 (Dec).

[61] In Geogas SA v Trammo Gas Ltd, The Baleares [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep 215 the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the Commercial Court and restored the decision of three arbitrators concerning issues arising under a charterparty. Steyn LJ said this (at 227–228):

'This is an appeal under s. 1 of the Arbitration Act, 1979 on "a question of law arising from an arbitration award". For those concerned in this case that is a statement of the obvious. But it matters. It defines the limits of the jurisdiction of the Court hearing an appeal under the 1979 Act. The arbitrators are the masters of the facts. On an appeal the Court must decide any question of law arising from an award on the basis of a full and unqualified acceptance of the findings of fact of the arbitrators. It is irrelevant whether the Court considers those findings of fact to be right or wrong. It also does not matter how obvious a mistake by the arbitrators on issues of fact might be, or what the scale of the financial consequences of the mistake of fact might be. That is, of course, an unsurprising position. After all, the very reason why parties conclude an arbitration agreement is because they do not wish to litigate in the Courts. Parties who submit their disputes to arbitration bind themselves by agreement, to honour the arbitrators' award on the facts. The principle of party autonomy decrees that a Court ought never to question the arbitrators' findings of fact.

From time to time attempts are made to circumvent the rule that the arbitrators' findings of fact are conclusive. Such attempts did not cease with the enactment of the Arbitration Act 1979. Subsequently, attempts were made to argue that an obvious mistake of fact by arbitrators may constitute misconduct. It is clear that such a challenge is misconceived. See [Moran v Lloyd's [1983] 2 All ER 200, [1983] QB 542, K/S A/S Bill Biakh v Hyundai Corp [1988] 1 Lloyd's Rep 187]. Then an attempt was made to argue that an obvious mistake of fact may amount to an excess of jurisdiction which would enable the Court to intervene. Again, the manoeuvre to outflank the cardinal rule that the arbitrators are the masters of the fact failed. See [Bank Mellat v GAA Development and Construction Co [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep 44 at 52, Mustill and Boyd Commercial Arbitration (2nd edn, 1989) p 558]. Since 1979 a number of unsuccessful attempts have been made to invoke the rule that the question whether there is evidence to support the arbitrators' findings of fact is itself a question of law. The historical origin of the rule was the need to control the decisions of illiterate juries in the 19th century. It never made great sense in the field of consensual arbitration. It is now a redundant piece of baggage from an era when the statutory regime governing arbitration, and the judicial philosophy towards arbitration, was far more interventionist [than] it is today. Another transparent tactic is a submission that there is an inconsistency in the arbitrators' findings of fact. That is not a valid ground for an attack on an award. See [Moran's case [1983] 2 All ER 200 at 204, [1983] QB 542 at 549]. Parties sometimes resort to a more oblique way of challenging arbitrators' findings of fact: the Court is asked to draw reasonable inferences from the arbitrators' findings of fact. The purpose is often to put forward a new legal argument which was never advanced before the arbitrators. But it is contrary to well established principle for the Court to draw inferences from findings of fact in an award on the basis that it would be reasonable to do so. The only inferences which a Court might arguably be able to draw from arbitrators' findings of fact are those which are truly beyond rational argument. It is, however, by no means clear that it is permissible even in such a seemingly clear case for a Court to draw inferences of fact from the facts set out in the award. See [Mustill and Boyd, p 600]. This catalogue of challenges to arbitrators' findings of fact points to the need for the Court to be constantly vigilant to ensure that attempts to question or qualify the arbitrators' findings of fact, or to dress up questions of fact as questions of law, are carefully identified and firmly discouraged.'

[62] In my view, the comments made by Steyn LJ in that passage are now applicable to appeals brought under s 69 of the 1996 Act.

[63] I shall not attempt either to paraphrase or to synthesise the guidance given in The Chrysalis and The Baleares. I regard that guidance as both relevant and helpful when the court is confronted with an arbitration appeal, which has not passed through the filter of an application for leave. I shall follow that guidance in the present case.

PART 5—WHICH, IF ANY, OF THE FOUR QUESTIONS FORMULATED BY KERSHAW ARE QUESTIONS OF LAW ARISING OUT OF THE AWARD?

[64] I shall address Kershaw's four questions in the order set out in the claim form.

[65] Question 1 concerns the true construction of the qualification. It is undoubtedly a question of law arising out of the award. The problem with question 1 is that it is academic. In his opening speech Mr Clay asserted that the correct answer to question 1 is Yes. He then went on to concede that the arbitrator's answer to that question was Yes.

[66] This court readily pays tribute to the excellent service which arbitrators provide to the construction industry. But there is really no point in the court hearing argument or delivering judgment on matters where everybody agrees that the arbitrator was right.

[67] On the second day of the hearing Mr Clay revised his submissions on question 1. He submitted that the arbitrator's answer to question 1 was 'Generally yes, but no in respect of the seven matters listed in paragraph seven of the Particulars of Claim'. The seven matters listed in para 7 of the particulars of claim are:

'Differences which:

(1) would have been allowed for in the tender if Kershaw had been tendering on a design and build basis, or

(2) would have been allowed for in a tender if Kershaw was responsible for identifying all components necessary to achieve a compliant installation, or

(3) could have been identified as an essential component from other information not supplied by White, Young Green, or

(4) could have been the subject of an express specific qualification of Kershaw's March 2000 tender, or

(5) were the subject of an express specific qualification between March 2000 and the conclusion of the Sub-Contract in July 2001, but not one prior to March 2000, or

(6) were introduced because the final design information implemented a requirement of the Employer's Requirements which WYG had omitted from its drawings, or

(7) would have been included by Kershaw if Kershaw had ignored the WYG drawings and simply carried out its own design appraisal exactly as if Kershaw stood in the shoes of Kendrick and was employing WYG to tender for the main contract.'

[68] With all due respect to counsel I do not agree. Mr Clay's concession on day one was correct. His revised submission on day two involves attributing to the arbitrator an extremely convoluted answer, which cannot be gleaned from the award. Question 1 is a perfectly simple question. It admits of a Yes or No answer. It can be seen from the award that there are many occasions when the arbitrator has adjusted the contract sum pursuant to the qualification and in favour of Kershaw, precisely because the final design information differed from the information supplied by WYG.

[69] Nevertheless, I am loath to jettison question 1, merely because of the way it has been formulated. There is a serious issue of law between the parties, which has been debated during the appeal, but currently is not captured by question 1. The issue is whether the arbitrator's interpretation of the qualification is correct. It seems to me that question 1 could be converted into a question, which is relevant to this appeal if the word 'where' is changed to 'whenever'. Question 1 will then read as follows:

'On the true construction of the Qualification, is the Qualification intended to permit an adjustment whenever the final design information differs from the information supplied by White, Young Green?'

[70] Mr Clay may or may not be content with my revised version of question 1. However, I shall address that revised version in Part 6 of the judgment because it will at least enable me to decide the issues which have been fully argued by counsel on both sides.

[71] I turn now to question 2. The present sub-contract was not a design and build sub-contract. The arbitrator acknowledges this in paras 33, 34 and 61 of his award. At no point in the award does the arbitrator discuss the hypothetical question whether the qualification permits adjustments, which would have been allowed for in the tender, if Kershaw had been tendering on a design and build basis. What the arbitrator discusses, in great detail and on an item by item basis, is what adjustments are permitted or required by the qualification. Whether or not those same adjustments would have been allowed if Kershaw had tendered on a design and build basis is not addressed in the award and there is no reason why it should be.

[72] Mr Clay submits that the correct answer to question 2 is Yes but the arbitrator's answer is No. This incorrect answer of the arbitrator is to be inferred, says Mr Clay, from paras 65 to 70 of the award, in particular the latter part of para 68. The arbitrator's incorrect answer is also to be inferred from the manner in which he deals with item VO1.09 (above ground drainage), item MO1.13 (street heating) and item MO1.44 (fire and smoke dampers).

[73] I do not agree with this analysis. The arbitrator does not address question 2, either expressly or implicitly in those passages of his award. Mr Clay's criticisms of the arbitrator's reasoning at paras 65 to 70 can all be addressed under the revised version of question 1. The hypothetical question 2 is not necessary for this purpose. Furthermore, question 2 certainly does not arise out of the arbitrator's decisions on the three specific items cited by Mr Clay. The use of question 2 as an attack upon those three individual decisions may be an attempt to present an appeal on the facts as though it were an appeal on the law. Any such attempt must be firmly discouraged (see The Baleares [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep 215 at 228).

[74] For all these reasons, I conclude that question 2 is not a question of law arising out of the award and I decline to consider it.

[75] I turn now to question 3. Mr Clay contends that this question arises from the arbitrator's decision in respect of street heating. I do not agree. On a fair and reasonable reading of the award (which is the correct approach as set out in Part 4 above) the arbitrator's reasoning in respect of street heating is perfectly clear. It may be summarised as follows. (1) Street heating is not shown on the WYG drawings. However, it was included in the employer's requirements and this should have been apparent to Kershaw at tender stage. (2) Kershaw failed either to revise its tender or to qualify its tender in respect of street heating when the omission was noted. (3) The qualification, as interpreted by the arbitrator in paras 65 to 70 of his award, does not permit the contract sum to be adjusted in respect of street heating.

[76] Mr Clay, in his submissions, latches onto paras 102.5.4 and 102.5.5 of the award. These paragraphs read as follows:

> '102.5.4. While the information was not drawn by WYG, there is a clear reference to the heating in the ER's and Kershaw, as an experienced mechanical installation sub-contractor should have realised, even if it did not see the relevant part of the ER's, that heating would be required, and ask the question, prior to submitting its bid.
>
> 102.5.5. Having found that Kershaw had an obligation to have regard to the requirements of the ER's as well as the drawn information, I must find that the relevant information was available at tender stage and therefore, an allowance should have been included.'

[77] It is plainly the case that Kershaw could have qualified its tender, in respect of street heating, at any time between March 2000 and July 2001, although in fact it failed to do so. The arbitrator is not saying otherwise in paras 102.5.4 and 102.5.5. Those paragraphs must be read in a fair and reasonable way in the context of the award as a whole. They must not be taken in isolation and subjected to minute textual analysis. See Part 4 above.

[78] I have come to the conclusion that question 3 is not a question of law, which arises out of the arbitrator's decision on street heating, or out of any other part of the award. Accordingly, I decline to answer question 3.

[79] I come next to question 4. The phrase, 'the ordinary variation clause' is vague and would cover a wide range of contractual provisions. However, Mr Clay has explained that 'the ordinary variation clause' is intended to be a reference to cl 1.3 of the standard conditions in this case. I shall therefore proceed on the basis that question 4 invites a comparison between the qualification on the one hand and cl 1.3 on the other hand. The examinee is required to state which clause is more restrictive.

[80] This question is, I suppose, a question of law in that it requires two contractual provisions to be interpreted. However, it most certainly does not arise out of the award. The arbitrator never posed this question or attempted to answer it. Furthermore, the exercise serves no useful purpose. The sub-contractor in this case had the benefit of both the qualification and cl 1.3. It can be seen from the award that Kershaw recovered substantial sums under both heads. In a number of instances, Kershaw succeeded in a claim under the qualification where it did not and could not succeed under cl 1.3. See, for example, the arbitrator's decision in respect of radiant panels, discussed on pp 94 to 95 of the award.

[81] The real purpose of this appeal is to ascertain the meaning and effect of the qualification, not to carry out an arid comparison between that provision and another contractual term, the meaning of which is not in doubt. I therefore hold that question 4 is not a question of law arising out of the award.

[82] In the result therefore, of the four questions posed by Kershaw, only question 1 has survived scrutiny. Even that question requires amendment if it is to serve any useful purpose. I must now endeavour to answer that question.

PART 6—WHAT ARE THE ANSWERS TO THOSE QUESTIONS WHICH HAVE SURVIVED SCRUTINY?

[83] The correct answer to question 1, as formulated, is Yes. It is clear that the arbitrator's answer is Yes. This can be seen both from paras 65 to 70 of his award, which state general principles, and from the later paragraphs, where he applies those principles and awards substantial sums pursuant to the qualification. Mr Clay, for Kershaw, submits that the correct answer to question 1 is Yes. Mr Henderson, for Kendrick, agrees that the answer is Yes. Whilst I am pleased to record this state of unanimity, it is clearly not a ground for allowing the appeal.

[84] Let me now turn to the modified version of question 1. This reads as follows:

> 'On the true construction of the Qualification, is the Qualification intended to permit an adjustment whenever the final design information differs from the information supplied by White, Young Green?'

The arbitrator's answer to this question is No. In paras 65 to 70 of the award the arbitrator interprets the qualification in a manner which restricts its effect to some situations (but not all situations) where the final design information differs from the information supplied by WYG.

[85] Mr Clay has no serious quarrel with para 66 of the award. His strongest criticisms are focused upon paras 68 to 70. I would summarise Mr Clay's principal arguments as follows. (1) The arbitrator's restrictive interpretation of the qualification (especially the last part of para 68 of the award) places the pricing risk on Kershaw, whereas the design responsibility lies on others. (2) Kershaw is thereby treated as having priced a risk, even though Kershaw could not control either the magnitude or the outcome of that risk. (3) The arbitrator's interpretation of the qualification places upon Kershaw the financial consequences of WYG's errors and omissions. (4) The risk of design changes after tender was increased by the change of engineering consultants during that period. The qualification, as interpreted by the arbitrator, provides insufficient protection against that increased risk. (5) The arbitrator's interpretation means that where there is an item, which everybody overlooked at tender stage, it is Kershaw, which bears the cost. (6) It is quite wrong that Kershaw should be held to allowances, which it made at tender stage on the basis of inadequate information. (7) The arbitrator was wrong to treat all the documents listed in Kendrick's memo of 19 April 2001 as having equal importance. The drawings and information provided by WYG carried greater weight than the employer's requirements. (8) The arbitrator's interpretation is not in accordance with the words of the qualification. The arbitrator does not analyse the wording of the qualification so as to support his interpretation. (9) If and in so far as the arbitrator's errors are not clear from paras 65 to 70, they are made plain by his reasoning and decisions in respect of item VO1.09 (above ground drainage), item MO1.13 (street heating) and item MO1.44 (fire and smoke dampers).

[86] I should make it plain that Mr Clay's written submissions span many pages and his oral submissions, of which I took a careful note, occupied several hours. I bear in mind the full amplitude of those submissions. The nine propositions set out above represent my attempt to distil, from counsel's written and oral submissions, what appear to be the most important points and to set them out in a convenient order.

[87] In addressing these arguments, I must apply the general principles set out in Part 4 above. In particular, this is a case in which the arbitrator's specialist experience of the construction industry assists him in interpreting a series of exchanges between the main contractor and the sub-contractor between March 2000 and May 2001. Accordingly, I must accord a measure of deference to the arbitrator's interpretation of the qualification. I will only reverse his decision if I am satisfied that the arbitrator, despite the benefit of his relevant experience, has come to the wrong answer.

[88] I am not so satisfied. On the contrary, I consider that the arbitrator came to the right conclusion and I agree with his interpretation of the qualification. I reach this conclusion for five principal reasons:

(1) It is not suggested that Kershaw priced its tender exclusively upon the basis of the WYG drawings and information. On the contrary, Kershaw accepts that when pricing the tender, it had to and did pay regard to the employer's requirements. By way of example, the drawings and information provided by WYG revealed nothing about above ground drainage. Nevertheless, Kershaw could see from the employer's requirements that above ground drainage was required and included an allowance of £59,503 in respect of this item.

(2) When submitting its fixed price tender in March 2000, and when standing by that tender in 2001 (subject to the revisions agreed on 19 April 2001), Kershaw was self-evidently accepting a pricing risk in respect of those matters where the tender was based upon inadequate information. The acceptance of such a risk was a commercial decision made by Kershaw. It was not an unusual decision.

(3) The unusual feature of the present case was Kendrick's decision to change mechanical and electrical consultants at a critical time. This created the risk that whereas WYG had resolved to meet the employer's requirements in one way, the new engineers, RWG, might decide to meet the employer's requirements in a different way. The qualification, as interpreted by the arbitrator, gave Kershaw proper protection against this area of risk. It enabled Kershaw to recover payment for changes of this nature, even though they did not fall within cl 1.3 of the sub-contract conditions.

(4) The arbitrator's finding that all the documents listed in Kendrick's memo of 19 April 2001 carried equal weight, seems to me to be correct. This finding was not challenged in the notice of appeal, but has been the subject of criticism in oral argument. The principal documents listed in Kendrick's memo are (a) the employer's requirements relating to mechanical services and (b) the drawings and information supplied by WYG. It should be remembered that the WYG drawings and information were by no means fully developed. Kershaw based its tender on all information, both written and oral. This included information gained at meetings. See the arbitrator's findings of fact in paras 62 and 63 of his award.

(5) The arbitrator's conclusions, at paras 68, 69 and 70 seem to me to attribute a fair and reasonable meaning to the actual words of the qualification. This qualification was not clearly expressed. It was a short form of words used by busy men in the course of their commercial dealings. The qualification has to be construed in the light of the circumstances at the time. In particular those words must be given a sensible meaning in a situation where everybody knew that Kershaw's tender was based, not only upon WYG's drawings and information, but also upon extensive further material.

[89] Now let me turn to the three items, which Mr Clay contends reveal more starkly and more clearly the arbitrator's legal error in interpreting the qualification. I have read and re-read the arbitrator's reasoning and decisions in respect of above ground drainage, street heating and the dampers. It seems to me that in those passages, the arbitrator is faithfully applying his interpretation of the qualification (as set out in paras 65 to 70) to the facts, which he finds in respect of those three items. At this point, the analysis of Mustill J in The Chrysalis becomes pertinent. The arbitrator has made findings of fact about those three items. These findings of fact constitute stage one in Mustill J's analysis. The arbitrator has reached conclusions about the meaning and effect of the qualification at paras 65 to 70 of his award. This constitutes stage two. Finally, the arbitrator has applied his interpretation of the qualification to the particular facts surrounding above ground drainage, street heating and the dampers. This constitutes stage three in Mustill J's analysis. The process of application does not reveal any further conclusions of law. The specific decisions in respect of above ground drainage, street heating and the dampers cannot be made the subject of an appeal to this court.

[90] Accordingly, it would not be right for me to delve into the arbitrator's detailed decisions on those three items and I decline to do so.

[91] Let me now draw the threads together. Question 1, as formulated in the particulars of claim, has correctly been answered Yes by the arbitrator. Question 1, as reformulated by me, has correctly been answered No by the arbitrator. I am conscious that either party, or possibly both parties, may dislike my reformulation of question 1. I therefore turn from the semantics of the question to the real issue between the parties. The real issue between the parties is whether the arbitrator has construed the qualification correctly or whether he ought to have interpreted it more widely. On this issue, I am satisfied that the arbitrator construed the qualification correctly and that the arbitrator made no error of law.

PART 7—CONCLUSION

[92] I am grateful to the solicitors and counsel on both sides for the considerable assistance, which they have given to the court. For the reasons set out in parts 4, 5 and 6 above, this appeal is dismissed. Pursuant to s 69(7)(a) of the 1996 Act, I make an order confirming the arbitrator's partial award.

Appeal dismissed.

Martyn Gurr Barrister.

Irvine and another v Irvine and another

[2006] EWHC 583 (Ch)

CHANCERY DIVISION

BLACKBURNE J

16, 23 MARCH 2006

Company – Unfair prejudice to members – Relief – Purchase of shares of prejudiced members – Valuation of shares – Company not a quasi-partnership – Whether valuation should be on pro rata basis or at a discount – Companies Act 1985, s 459.

The petitioners held a 49·96% shareholding in the second respondent company. The remaining shares were held by the first respondent. The petitioners applied to the court under s 459[a] of the Companies Act 1985 for an order that the first respondent purchase their shares. The court held that unfair prejudice had been caused to the petitioners as a result of the first respondent's management of the second respondent and made the order. The first respondent considered that the minority shareholding should be valued on a discounted basis. The petitioners considered that their minority shareholding should be valued on a pro rata basis. They contended that fairness required a non-discounted valuation for the minority shares in that, although the second respondent had not been a quasi-partnership since the death of the family member whose disposition of his shares had resulted in the current shareholdings, the company had remained a family company; the difference between the two shareholdings was 50% less one share and 50% plus one share; and it had been the behaviour of the first respondent which had driven the petitioners to seek an exit from the company by means of a buy-out order. The first respondent submitted that the fact that the court had found that the manner in which he had conducted the second respondent's affairs had been unfairly prejudicial to the interests of the petitioners so as to establish their entitlement to a buy out order could not, of itself, determine the basis of valuation of the petitioners' shares.

Held – A minority shareholding was to be valued as such unless some good reason existed to attribute to it a pro rata share of the overall value of the company. Short of a quasi-partnership or some other exceptional circumstance, there was no reason to accord to it a quality which it lacked. In the instant case there were no circumstances which could be described as exceptional. Accordingly, the minority shareholding should be valued on a discounted basis (see [10], [11], below).

Re Bird Precision Bellows Ltd [1984] 3 All ER 444 and Strahan v Wilcock [2006] All ER (D) 106 (Jan) applied.

Notes

For orders for protection of members against unfair prejudice; purchase of shares, see 7(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2004 reissue) para 933.

a Section 459, so far as material provides: '(1) A member of a company may apply to the court by petition for an order . . . on the ground that the company's affairs are being or have been conducted in a manner which is unfairly prejudicial to the interests of . . . some part of its members . . .'

a For the Companies Act 1985, s 459, see 8 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1999 reissue) 508.

Cases referred to in judgment

Bird Precision Bellows Ltd, Re [1984] 3 All ER 444, [1984] Ch 419, [1984] 2 WLR 869; affd [1985] 3 All ER 523, [1986] Ch 658, [1986] 2 WLR 158, CA.

b CVC/Opportunity Equity Partners Ltd v Almeida [2002] UKPC 16, [2002] 2 BCLC 108.

Strahan v Wilcock [2006] EWCA Civ 13, [2006] 06 LS Gaz R 30, [2006] All ER (D) 106 (Jan).

Syers v Syers (1876) 1 App Cas 174, HL.

c Petition

The petitioners, (1) Patricia Mary Irvine and (2) Michael Cleobury Thatcher and Patricia Mary Irvine as trustees of an accumulation and maintenance settlement dated 6 August 1993, acting in their capacities as shareholders in the second respondent Campbell Irvine (Holdings) Ltd brought a petition under s 459 of the d Companies Act 1985 for an order pursuant to s 461 of the 1985 Act that their shares be purchased by the first respondent, Ian Charles Irvine. Blackburne J made the order sought on 10 March 2006 ([2006] EWHC 406 (Ch), [2006] All ER (D) 153 (Mar)). The petitioners and the respondents made further submissions as to the basis of valuation of the shareholding. The facts are set out in the judgment.

e

Catherine Roberts (instructed by Stevens & Bolton LLP, Guildford) for the petitioners.

Nigel Dougherty (instructed by Charles Russell LLP) for the respondents.

Cur adv vult

f

23 March 2006. The following judgment was delivered.

BLACKBURNE J.

[1] On 10 March 2006 I handed down judgment on this s 459 petition. I found

g that unfair prejudice had been established and ordered the first respondent (Ian) to buy or procure the purchase of the petitioners' shares in the second respondent (CIHL). I expressed the view that in valuing the shares there should not be any minority discount but stressed that I had not heard argument on the point. The matter has since been argued.

[2] The petitioners' shares together represent 49·96% of the issued shares in

h CIHL. Of that 49·96% just under half are held by the first petitioner (Patricia) and the balance by the second petitioner (the trust). The shares were acquired from the 50% holding in CIHL formerly owned by Malcolm Irvine (Malcolm), Patricia's late husband and Ian's younger brother. Malcolm died on 1 March 1996. In August 1994 Malcolm had given half of his shareholding to the j trust. By his will, Malcolm had given one share to Ian and the remainder to Patricia. Patricia is one of the two trustees of the trust. The other trustee, Michael Thatcher, has 'delegated' his powers as a trustee to Patricia in relation to the trust. The trust is for the benefit of Patricia's three sons who are all now adults. For all practical purposes Patricia and the trust speak as one voice.

[3] The question which I have to decide is whether in the working out of the buy-out order the 49·96% shareholding (as effectively it is) is to be valued on a pro rata, non-discounted basis to reflect the fact that it is a minority holding. Miss Catherine Roberts, appearing on behalf of the petitioners, submitted that it should; Mr Nigel Dougherty, appearing on behalf of Ian, submitted that it should be valued on a discounted basis.

[4] Most, if not all, of the authorities in which the question has been raised whether the shares in a company which is the subject of a s 459 petition should be valued on a pro rata or on a discounted basis have been cases where the company is or is alleged to be a quasi-partnership. Certainly, Miss Roberts was unable to draw my attention to any in which a non-discounted basis of valuation has been applied to a minority holding in a company which is not a quasi-partnership.

[5] The legislation does not stipulate how the matter is to be approached. On the other hand, the courts have repeatedly emphasised that the overriding requirement in quasi-partnership cases is that the price to be paid, where a buy-out order is made, should be fair. In Re Bird Precision Bellows Ltd [1984] 3 All ER 444 at 450–451, [1984] Ch 419 at 431 (a case under s 75 of the Companies Act 1980, the predecessor to s 459) Nourse J said:

> 'In the case of the shareholder who acquires shares from another at a price which is discounted because they represent a minority it is to my mind self-evident that there cannot be any universal or even a general rule that he should be bought out under s 75 on a more favourable basis, even in a case where his predecessor has been a quasi partner in a quasi partnership. He might himself have acquired the shares purely for investment and played no part in the affairs of the company. In that event it might well be fair, I do not know, that he should be bought out on the same basis as he himself had bought, even though his interests had been unfairly prejudiced in the mean time. A fortiori, there could be no universal or even a general rule in a case where the company had never been a quasi partnership in the first place.
>
> In summary, there is in my judgment no rule of universal application. On the other hand, there is a general rule in a case where the company is at the material time a quasi partnership and the purchase order is made in respect of the shares of a quasi partner ... It seems clear to me that ... that is [namely, a valuation on a non-discounted basis] in general the fair basis of valuation in a quasi partnership case, and that it should be applied in this case unless the respondents have established that the petitioners acted in such a way as to deserve their exclusion from the company.'

[6] In Strahan v Wilcock [2006] EWCA Civ 13, [2006] 06 LS Gaz R 30, [2006] All ER (D) 106 (Jan) Arden LJ stated (at [17]) that:

> 'Shares are generally ordered to be purchased on the basis of their valuation on a non-discounted basis where the party against whom the order is made has acted in breach of the obligation of good faith applicable to the parties' relationship by analogy with partnership law, that is to say where a "quasi-partnership" relationship has been found to exist. It is difficult to conceive of circumstances in which a non-discounted basis of valuation would be appropriate where there was unfair prejudice for the purposes of the 1985 Act but such a relationship did not exist. However, on this appeal I need not express a final view on what those circumstances might be.'

[7] The reason for so treating the valuation of shares on a buy-out order in a quasi-partnership case was offered by Lord Millett in CVC/Opportunity Equity Partners Ltd v Almeida [2002] UKPC 16 at [41], [42], [2002] 2 BCLC 108 at [41], [42]:

> '[41] The rationale for denying a discount to reflect the fact that the holding in question is a minority holding lies in the analogy between a quasi-partnership company and a true partnership. On the dissolution of a partnership, the ordinary course is for the court to direct a sale of the partnership business as a going concern with liberty for any of the former partners who wish to bid for the business to do so. But the court has power to ascertain the value of a former partner's interests without a sale if it can be done by valuation, and frequently does so where his interest is relatively small: see Syers v Syers (1876) 1 App Cas 174. But the valuation is not based on a notional sale of the outgoing partner's share to the continuing partners who, being the only possible purchasers, would offer relatively little. It is based on a notional sale of the business as a whole to an outside purchaser.
>
> [42] In the case of a company possessing the relevant characteristics, the majority can exclude the minority only if they offer to pay them a fair price for their shares. In order to be free to manage the company's business without regard to the relationship of trust and confidence which formerly existed between them, they must buy the whole, part from themselves and part from the minority, thereby achieving the same freedom to manage the business as an outside purchaser would enjoy.'

[8] Is there any reason in the present case for concluding that, although it is a minority holding and although CIHL is not a quasi-partnership, fairness requires the petitioners' shares to be valued on a non-discounted basis? Or, taking up the comment of Arden LJ, are there present in this case circumstances (which she considered difficult to conceive of) that would make it appropriate for the petitioners to receive a non-discounted valuation for their shares?

[9] Miss Roberts advanced the following considerations for submitting that such circumstances do exist. Although, since Malcolm's death, CIHL had not been a quasi-partnership, the company remained nevertheless a 'family company' in that all the shares were held by or for the benefit of members of the Irvine family. The articles contained restrictions on the transfer of shares and there is no open market for their disposal. Treating the shareholdings of Patricia and the trust as a combined holding the difference between that holding and Ian's is only one share (in that the petitioners' holding is 50% less one share and Ian's is 50% plus one share). If only proper dividends had been paid and Ian had been less greedy in the remuneration which he drew for himself the petitioners would have been content to remain shareholders of the company. It is only because over several years Ian has behaved in the way that he has that the petitioners have been driven to seek an exit from the company by means of a buy-out order. If this was not a case where a pro rata basis of valuation should apply, it would be difficult to think that any such case would ever arise, and there would be a risk therefore that the court's discretion in fixing the basis of valuation for a minority holding in a company which was not a quasi-partnership would be atrophied.

[10] Mr Dougherty submitted that the matter was one of principle. CIHL was not a quasi-partnership. As a result of the gift by Malcolm to Ian of the single share, control of CIHL passed to Ian. No conditions were attached to the gift of that share. Ian was not subject to any restrictions, over and above those contained in CIHL's articles, against disposing of his majority holding to an external purchaser. The petitioners' shareholdings constituted a minority holding even though the difference between them and Ian's is so small. There were no circumstances which could be described as exceptional so as to justify a departure from the ordinary assumption that a minority shareholding is valued as such. The fact that the court has found that the manner in which Ian has conducted CIHL's affairs was unfairly prejudicial to the interests of the petitioners so as to establish their entitlement to a buy-out order cannot, of itself, determine the basis of valuation of the petitioners' shares.

[11] I accept Mr Dougherty's submissions. A minority shareholding, even one where the extent of the minority is as slight as in this case, is to be valued for what it is, a minority shareholding, unless there is some good reason to attribute to it a pro rata share of the overall value of the company. Short of a quasi-partnership or some other exceptional circumstance, there is no reason to accord to it a quality which it lacks. CIHL is not a quasi-partnership. There are no exceptional circumstances. The shareholdings must therefore be valued for what they are: less than 50% of CIHL's issued share capital. The extent of the discount to be applied will be a matter for the valuers.

Order accordingly.

Victoria Ellis Barrister.

Sanderson and another v Exel Management Services Ltd

EMPLOYMENT APPEAL TRIBUNAL

SILBER J, MS K BILGAN AND MR G LEWIS

12 MAY, 15 JUNE 2006

Employment – Remuneration – Holidays with pay – Week's pay – Normal working hours – Employee having normal working hours if entitled to overtime pay when employed for more than fixed number of hours – Whether 'fixed number of hours' including 'hours' calculated by way of genuine pre-estimate – Employment Rights Act 1996, s 234(1).

The employees worked as drivers. They were employed under a standard hours contract with a basic 40-hour week and different rates of pay for overtime, shift work, and other types of work. The hours for which they were paid did not depend on the actual hours worked but were based on 'production' hours, which were a form of notional hours calculated on the basis of set formulae by which certain tasks were deemed to take certain periods of time, irrespective of how long they actually took. The employees challenged the manner in which their holiday pay should have been calculated by their employer. The issue turned on whether they had 'normal working hours' within the meaning of the Employment Rights Act 1996. Section 234(1)[a] of the 1996 Act provided that where an employee was entitled to overtime pay when employed for more than a fixed number of hours in a week or other period, there were for the purposes of the 1996 Act normal working hours. The employment tribunal concluded that the employees did have normal working hours and they appealed. It was agreed before the employment appeal tribunal that the issue depended solely upon the construction of s 234(1) of the 1996 Act as there were no relevant contractual provisions and no findings of the tribunal or evidence adduced concerning the actual number of hours worked by the employees. The employer contended that a 'fixed number of hours' in s 234(1) could include a genuine pre-estimate of the actual number of hours worked.

Held – On the true construction of s 234(1) of the 1996 Act 'fixed number of hours' meant the fixed actual number of hours for which the employee was employed not a notional number of hours even where that notional number was a genuine pre-estimate. The dictionary definition of 'fixed' included 'definite'. An employee had to be employed for a definite number of hours if he were to have 'normal working hours'. If the draftsman of s 234(1) had wanted to ensure that the provision only related to actual hours worked and not any form of notional or pre-estimated hours, he was likely to have considered that the words 'fixed hours' would be appropriate bearing in mind the dictionary definition. To include genuine pre-estimated hours it would be necessary to redraft the section to add the words 'or for any other period which is a genuine pre-estimate of the number of hours he actually works'. There was no cogent reason why such new wording should be adopted. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [21]–[28], below).

a Section 234, so far as material, is set out at [8], below

Notes

For normal working hours and a week's pay, see 16(1A) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 115–120.

For the Employment Rights Act 1996, s 234, see 16 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2005 reissue) 1011.

Case referred to in judgment

Bamsey v Albon Engineering & Manufacturing plc [2004] EWCA Civ 359, [2004] IRLR 457.

Appeal

Michael Sanderson and Charles Griffin, employees of the respondents Exel Management Services Ltd, appealed from the decision dated 14 December 2005 of an employment tribunal sitting in Sheffield that they had normal working hours within the meaning of ss 221–224 of the Employment Rights Act 1996. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Peter Edwards (instructed by Rowley Ashworth, Leeds) for the appellants.
Fergus McCombie (instructed by Exel plc Legal Dept) for the respondents.

Cur adv vult

15 June 2006. The following judgment of the appeal tribunal was delivered.

SILBER J.

I INTRODUCTION

[1] This appeal by Michael Sanderson and Charles Griffin (the appellants) relates to the manner in which their holiday pay should have been calculated by their employers Exel Management Services Ltd (the respondents). The particular issue on which the outcome of this appeal depends is whether the appellants had 'normal working hours' within the meaning of ss 221–224 of the Employment Rights Act 1996. By a decision sent to the parties on 14 December 2005, an employment tribunal sitting in Sheffield held that the two appellants did have 'normal working hours'. The appellants appeal on the basis that they did not work 'normal working hours'. This appeal is apparently a test case for some 6,000 workers, who are or were employed under similar provisions by the respondents.

II THE STATUTORY BACKGROUND

[2] Under reg 30(1) of the Working Time Regulations 1998, SI 1998/1833, a worker may present a complaint to an employment tribunal that his employer has failed to pay him the whole or any part of any amount due to him under reg 16(1).

[3] By reg 16(1) of the 1998 regulations, it is provided (with our emphasis added) that: 'A worker is entitled to be paid in respect of any period of annual leave to which he is entitled under regulation 13, at the rate of a week's pay in respect of each week of leave.'

[4] Regulation 16(2) states (with our emphasis added) that: 'Sections 221 to 224 of the [Employment Rights Act 1996] shall apply for the purpose of determining the amount of a week's pay for the purposes of this regulation [subject to modifications which do not apply in this case].'

[5] In order to determine what constitutes 'a week's pay', it is important to ascertain if there were any 'normal working hours' for the particular employee because the formula in the 1996 Act for determining 'a week's pay' depends on the answer to that question. In summary, if an employee has 'normal working hours', then the calculation of 'a week's pay' for him is determined by the application of ss 221–223 of the 1996 Act while if the employee does not have 'normal working hours', the calculation of 'a week's pay' for him is calculated in accordance with s 224 of the 1996 Act.

[6] In Bamsey v Albon Engineering & Manufacturing plc [2004] EWCA Civ 359, [2004] IRLR 457, it was held by the Court of Appeal that reg 16(1) of the 1998 regulations which, as I explained at [3], above, is the basis of the appellants' claims, 'clearly incorporates, for the purpose of determining a week's pay . . . also the interpretation of "normal working hours" in [s 234]' (see [32] per Auld LJ with whom May and Jacob LJJ agreed).

[7] It is common ground that the 'normal working hours' of an employee can be ascertained in some cases first from a relevant contractual term or second from the number of hours actually worked by employees or third by applying s 234 of the 1996 Act. Both Mr Peter Edwards, counsel for the appellants, and Mr Fergus McCombie, counsel for the respondents, agree, correctly in our view, that in this case the question of whether there were 'normal working hours' depends solely on the construction of s 234 of the 1996 Act because first there were no relevant contractual provisions in this case and second there were no findings of the employment tribunal or evidence adduced concerning the actual number of hours worked by the appellants. In other words, if s 234 of the 1996 Act does not show that the appellants had 'normal working hours', then it is common ground that he [sic] must be regarded as not having 'normal working hours'. Indeed in Bamsey v Albon Engineering & Manufacturing plc, Auld LJ explained (at [9]) that:

> '. . . although s.234 is expressed as if overtime were its focus, its effect is to equate "normal working hours" with those done and which are "fixed" by the contract of employment, whether or not including over-time . . .'

[8] Thus, the issue on this appeal depends on the application of s 234(1) of the 1996 Act, which provides, with our emphasis added that: 'Where an employee is entitled to overtime pay when employed for more than a fixed number of hours in a week or other period, there are for the purposes of this Act normal working hours . . .'

[9] So the answer to the question of whether the appellants had 'normal working hours' depends on whether they were employed for 'a fixed number of hours in a week'. In other words the appellants would only have had 'normal working hours' if they were employed for 'a fixed number of hours in a week'. Indeed, it is common ground that the issue on this appeal can be refined to determining whether the appellants were employed for 'a fixed number of hours in a week' because if they did, then the employment tribunal was correct but if they were not, the appellants did not have 'normal working hours' and the employment tribunal's decision was wrong. As we will explain shortly in greater detail, the case for the appellants is that the words 'normal working hours' mean fixed actual hours while the respondents contend that those words can also mean genuine pre-estimates of the actual hours worked. The precise nature of this dispute will become clearer after we have set out the relevant facts which we will now do.

III THE FACTS

[10] The employment tribunal found in its reasons that:

> '19.2. Both [appellants] were subject to the terms and conditions of employment [which] ... were agreed following negotiations with the employees' trade unions.
>
> 19.3. These terms provide a standard hours contract which gave the [appellants] a basic 40-hour week and which set out rates of pay for overtime, shift pay and for different types of work.
>
> 19.4. Whilst the terms and conditions set out overtime rates there was no obligation on the [appellants'] part to undertake overtime nor was there any obligation on the part of the [respondents] to provide it.
>
> 19.5. The terms and conditions also set out the basis on which drivers would receive enhanced pay after working 40 hours. These hours, it was agreed, were "production hours".
>
> 19.6. Drivers were paid at different rates dependent on the task they were obliged to undertake. Accordingly their remuneration, depending as it did upon the tasks allocated to them and over which the [appellants] had no direct control, varied from week to week.
>
> 19.7. The [appellants] were required under their terms and conditions of employment to make themselves available for early attendance at work. For this they would be paid at the rates specified within those terms and conditions.
>
> 19.8. The terms and conditions of employment set out a fixed rate of payment in respect of holiday pay.'

[11] It is important to stress that the hours for which the appellants were paid did not depend on the actual hours worked but were based on what were described as 'production' hours, which were a form of notional or deemed hours calculated on the basis of set formulae by which certain tasks were deemed to take certain periods of time, irrespective of how long they actually took. There was according to the appellants, one exception, which was that the early shift premium was based on the actual number of hours worked.

[12] According to the evidence of Anne Moorby of the respondents, the pay of the appellant drivers was made up of two elements of which the first was a productivity calculation under which for each 50 kilometres covered by a driver a payment was made equating to one hour's pay irrespective of how long that driving took. Anne Moorby also explained that the second element of the appellant drivers' pay was described as 'terminal loading times' by which each product transported had a pre-determined loading and unloading period allocated to it and that this period had been calculated on the estimated length that it would take for that task to be completed irrespective of how long it actually took.

[13] The evidence of Mr Sanderson, which was accepted by the employment tribunal, was that he had estimated that he received pay for between 90 and 110 production or notional hours a week on average whereas of course he actually worked far fewer hours. Mr Sanderson would have received pay at the standard rate for the first eight hours deemed to have been worked and he would then be paid time-and-half for the remaining production hours or notional hours.

The contractual terms of the appellants stated that 'Basic hourly rates per week are 40' but Ms Moorby explained in evidence, as recorded by the employment tribunal (with its underlining) that 'in situations where drivers return to their depot having completed more productivity hours worked than actual hours they are expected to assist with any other work required to be done'. Her evidence was that the work of the drivers, such as the appellants, was assigned on a daily basis by the traffic planner.

[14] All this material shows first that the pay of the appellants was based on 'productivity' or notional hours worked and not on actual hours worked and second that the actual working hours of the employees were not definitely specified because the basic 40 hours were 'productivity' or notional hours but subject to the exceptions specified in the last paragraph. Indeed, the employment tribunal did not make any findings about the precise number of actual hours the appellants were obliged to work or actually did work each week.

[15] On the issue of whether the 'productivity' or the notional hours were still a correct estimate of the time taken for various jobs, Anne Moorby explained in para 11 of her witness statement that:

> 'Since the pay structure was devised by the client, technology had advanced so that the actual time required to complete each task has reduced significantly. Using the examples stated above, Sulphuric Acid is paid at 1·5 hours to load but now only takes a maximum of 30 minutes to complete. Therefore the hours booked are not necessarily a true representation of the hours worked.'

[16] Thus the position is that now some 10 years or so after those productivity or notional hours were calculated, they are no longer a genuine pre-estimate of the tasks for which they are selected. Moreover the position in respect of driving times is that the pay is not linked to the time spent completing the journey but to the length of the journey, as I explained at [12], above. That means that pay for this work is not based on the number of hours worked but on the notional 'productivity' hours calculated in the way Ms Moorby explained.

[17] The employment tribunal's conclusion (at para 34) was that: 'From our findings of fact we have concluded these [appellants] had normal working hours.'

[18] The approach of the employment tribunal supported by the respondents on this appeal is that the appellants were employed for 'a fixed number of hours in a week or other period' as specified in s 234(1) of the 1996 Act.

[19] Mr Edwards for the appellants disagrees and he contends that the words 'fixed number of hours' mean the fixed actual number of hours for which the employee was employed and not the notional hours or to use the terminology adopted in this case of 'production' hours. Thus he says that the appellants were not employed for 'a fixed number of hours'.

[20] In his submissions to us Mr McCombie initially contends that those words 'fixed hours' could include not only 'fixed number of hours', but that they could also cover 'notional hours'. He later accepted correctly in our view that this interpretation could not be right. Instead he submitted that the phrase 'a fixed number of hours' could include a genuine pre-estimate of the actual number of hours worked.

[21] In our view, four factors individually and cumulatively lead us to the conclusion that the words 'fixed number of hours' means actual fixed hours as contended by Mr Edwards and not a notional number of hours even if it was a genuine pre-estimate.

[22] First, the word 'fixed' is defined in the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary (1993 edn) vol 1, p 962 as meaning among other things 'definite', which supports the appellants' submission. So the employee has to be employed for a definite number of hours if he is to have 'normal working hours'. The respondents contend for a meaning of 'fixed' which is not 'definite' and which is not in accordance with any definition of the word 'fixed' in the dictionary.

[23] Second, if the draftsman of s 234(1) of the 1996 Act wanted to ensure that the provision only related to actual hours worked and not any form of notional or pre-estimated hours, he is likely to have considered that the words 'fixed hours' would be the appropriate wording bearing in mind the dictionary meaning of the word 'fixed' as including 'definite'.

[24] Third, if Mr McCombie is right it would be necessary to redraft s 234(1) so that it would read with the new words in italics:

> 'Where an employee is entitled to overtime pay and employed for more than a fixed number of hours or for any other period which is a genuine pre-estimate of the number of hours he actually works in a week or other period, there are for the purposes of this Act normal working hours in this case.'

[25] Fourth, there is no cogent reason put forward as to why this new wording should be adopted or should reflect the intention of Parliament. For the purpose of completeness, even if the respondents' approach was to be adopted, it would not assist the respondents because as we have explained the number of 'production' hours is no longer a genuine pre-estimate of the length of time a particular task takes. Even on the respondents' case they would not be assisted by this construction.

[26] For the purpose of completeness if the case for the respondents was that the words 'fixed hours' included a genuine pre-estimate of the work which the employee had in the past worked at any particular time, this construction would have to be rejected for the reasons set out at [22]–[25], above.

[27] Thus the appellants' contentions are accepted and the appellants were not employed for 'a fixed number of hours'. We should explain that both counsel agree correctly in our view that we should not attach any importance to the correspondence with the chairman of the employment tribunal, which took place after the decision was given because the views that were expressed in that correspondence were those of the chairman himself rather than the views of the employment tribunal.

[28] Finally, it has been agreed that if this appeal were to be allowed, the only order that we should make would be to allow the appeal on the basis that the two claimants did not work 'normal working hours'. We so order.

Appeal allowed.

James Wilson Barrister (NZ).

Jones v Whalley

[2006] UKHL 41

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY, LORD CARSWELL, LORD BROWN OF EATON-UNDER-HEYWOOD AND LORD MANCE

29 JUNE, 26 JULY 2006

Criminal law – Trial – Stay of proceedings – Abuse of process – Caution in lieu of prosecution – Appellant assaulting respondent – Appellant agreeing to police caution on basis that no prosecution would be brought – Respondent subsequently bringing prosecution against appellant – Justices staying proceedings on grounds of abuse of process – Whether justices correct on the facts.

W assaulted and injured J. The matter was reported to the police, and an officer interviewed W concerning an offence of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. W admitted the offence. The officer decided that W should not be prosecuted, but should instead be cautioned. W was notified of the decision in a standard form. The form stated, inter alia: 'This means that you will not have to go before a criminal court in connection with this matter but that a RECORD will be kept of this warning.' It was not in dispute that W had been informed of the effects of the caution and had agreed to be cautioned. Eight months later, J, acting as a private prosecutor, laid an information against W, charging him with assault occasioning actually bodily harm. When the matter came before a magistrates' court, W submitted that a private prosecution was precluded by his acceptance of a police caution on the indication that, if he accepted it, he would not face any further criminal proceedings. The justices were satisfied that to allow the prosecution to proceed would be an abuse of the process of the magistrates' court, and stayed the proceedings. On J's appeal to the Divisional Court by way of case stated, the court held that the administration and acceptance of a caution were not sufficient to render the exercise of the right of private prosecution an abuse of process. W appealed to the House of Lords, contending, inter alia, that the conclusion of the justices had been correct on the facts.

Held – The conclusion of the justices had been correct. The abuse complained of was not abuse impairing the fairness of the trial, since evidence of the admission and caution could be excluded. Rather, it went to the fairness of trying W at all in the circumstances. If J had legal grounds for attacking the police decision to caution W, he could apply for judicial review to quash that decision. If successful, the slate would be clean. There would be no citable caution on W's record, and J would be free to prosecute. But so long as that formal caution stood, induced by a representation that W would not be prosecuted, the private prosecution of W did amount to an abuse, as the justices had held. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [13], [17], [24], [30], [31], [33], [37], below).

Notes

For abuse of process in relation to bringing a prosecution, see 44(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1345.

Cases referred to in opinions

Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court [1993] 3 All ER 138 sub nom R v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, ex p Bennett [1994] 1 AC 42, [1993] 3 WLR 90, HL.

Gouriet v Union of Post Office Workers [1977] 3 All ER 70, [1978] AC 435, [1977] 3 WLR 300, HL.

Hayter v L [1998] 1 WLR 854.

R v Croydon Justices, ex p Dean [1993] 3 All ER 129, [1993] QB 769, [1993] 3 WLR 198, DC.

R v West London Justices, ex p Klahn [1979] 2 All ER 221 sub nom R v West London Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Klahn [1979] 1 WLR 933, DC.

R (on the application of R) v Durham Constabulary [2005] UKHL 21, [2005] 2 All ER 369, [2005] 1 WLR 1184.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

A-G's Ref (No 1 of 1990) [1992] 3 All ER 169, [1992] QB 630, [1992] 3 WLR 9, CA.

R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p South Coast Shipping Co Ltd [1993] 1 All ER 219, [1993] QB 645, [1993] 2 WLR 621, DC.

R v Chief Constable of the Kent County Constabulary, ex p L (a minor), R v DPP, ex p B (a minor) [1993] 1 All ER 756, DC.

R v Clerk to the Bradford Justices, ex p Sykes (1999) 163 JP 224.

R v Latif, R v Shahzad [1996] 1 All ER 353, [1996] 1 WLR 104, HL.

R v Metropolitan Police Comr, ex p P (1995) 160 JP 367.

R v Tower Bridge Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Chaudhry [1994] 1 All ER 44, [1994] QB 340, [1993] 3 WLR 1154, DC.

R (on the application of Mayor and Burgess of London Borough of Newham) v Stratford Magistrates' Court (2004) 168 JP 658.

Appeal

Stephan Joseph Whalley appealed with leave of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 15 November 2005 from the order of the Divisional Court (Sedley LJ and Beatson J) on 10 May 2005 ([2005] EWHC 931 (Admin), [2005] All ER (D) 114 (May)) allowing an appeal by way of case stated by the respondent, Lawrence John Jones, from the decision of the Justices for the County of Merseyside, sitting at St Helens on 25 October 2005, that it would be an abuse of the process of the court to allow to proceed a private prosecution brought by Mr Jones against Mr Whalley for assault occasioning actual bodily harm. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

Timothy King QC and Stuart Mills (instructed by KSB Law as agents for Iain MacDonald, St Helens) for Mr Whalley.

Malcolm Swift QC and Simon Reevell (instructed by Northern Rail Ltd, Bradford) for Mr Jones.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

26 July 2006. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, on 17 May 2003 the appellant, Mr Whalley, who is an adult, assaulted and injured the respondent, Mr Jones, at Newton-le-Willows. The matter was reported to the Greater Manchester Police, and an officer of that force interviewed Mr Whalley concerning an offence of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. Mr Whalley admitted commission of that offence. The officer decided that Mr Whalley should not be prosecuted but should instead be cautioned. He was notified of this decision in a standard form bearing the imprint of the Greater Manchester Police. This form explained the effect of the caution: 'This means that you will not have to go before a criminal court in connection with this matter but that a RECORD will be kept of this warning.' In a section directed to adults, the form stated: 'WHAT A CAUTION MEANS TO YOU—The record of caution is a criminal conviction which is citable in a court should you re-offend. Should you re-offend you will almost certainly be charged and placed before a Criminal court.' The form repeated that if Mr Whalley appeared before a court and was found guilty of another offence then details of this caution might be given to the court. It is not found as a fact, but it seems safe to infer, that the effect of the form was explained orally to Mr Whalley by the officer, and that Mr Whalley agreed to be cautioned on these terms.

[2] On 22 December 2003 Mr Jones, acting as a private prosecutor, laid an information against Mr Whalley, charging him with assault occasioning actually bodily harm contrary to s 47 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861. The matter came before justices sitting at St Helens, and Mr Whalley submitted that his acceptance of a police caution on the indication that, if he accepted it, he would not face any further criminal proceedings, should preclude a private prosecution. The justices heard argument on this issue on 25 October 2004, when authority was cited. The justices were satisfied that to allow the prosecution to proceed would be an abuse of the process of the magistrates' court, and stayed the proceedings. On Mr Jones's appeal to the Queen's Bench Divisional Court by case stated, the court (Sedley LJ and Beatson J) held that the administration and acceptance of a caution were not sufficient to render the exercise of the right of private prosecution an abuse of process (see [2005] EWHC 931 (Admin), [2005] All ER (D) 114 (May)).

[3] Mr Whalley now challenges the conclusion of the Divisional Court, contending that the justices were right, on the facts of this case, to reach the conclusion they did. But he also raises a broader question, not deployed in argument below, whether the right of private prosecution can, or should, survive the implementation of a formal cautioning procedure which has not been quashed and set aside on an application for judicial review.

CAUTIONS

[4] In R (on the application of R) v Durham Constabulary [2005] UKHL 21, [2005] 2 All ER 369, [2005] 1 WLR 1184, the House had occasion to consider the practice of formal reprimands and warnings established by the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 to replace the practice of cautioning young offenders committing less serious offences. The practice had become discredited, first, because cautions had in some areas been given so repeatedly and predictably that they lacked the desirable effect of deterring young offenders, and, secondly, because they did nothing constructively to address the roots of offending behaviour. Under the new regime, young offenders were no longer to be cautioned, but the new reprimands and warnings were intended to have teeth, and those warned were to be referred to youth offending teams. By s 65(1) of the 1998 Act, a constable may reprimand or warn a young offender only if he has evidence of the commission of an offence such as to give a realistic prospect of conviction; if the offender admits the offence; if the offender has not previously been convicted of an offence; and if the constable is satisfied that it would not be in the public interest for the offender to be prosecuted. In the Home Office/Youth Justice Board Final Warning Scheme: Guidance for the Police and Youth Offending Teams (November 2002) it is made clear (see p 5 (paras 1.2, 1.3)) that the object of the new scheme is to prevent offending by young people and divert them from their offending behaviour before they enter the court system. Prominence is given to the requirement that prosecution must be judged to be not in the public interest (see pp 8, 10 (paras 4.7(e), 4.26)), and by s 56 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000 the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 was amended to grant power to bail a young offender pending possible reprimand or warning, thus enabling the public interest to be more fully considered and the views of victims ascertained (see pp 10, 14, 14–16 (paras 4.28, 6.15, Chs 7, 8)). But the views of victims, although an important factor in determining the seriousness of an offence, are not conclusive, and victims should not be involved in decisions on disposals for young offenders, which are the responsibility of the police alone (see para 8.11).

[5] Sections 22 and 23 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 introduced a new regime, applicable only to adult offenders. It provided for the giving of cautions subject to conditions. Non-compliance with the conditions exposes the offender to prosecution for the original offence. The conditions imposed (s 22(3)) must be directed to one or both of two objects, facilitating the rehabilitation of the offender and ensuring that he makes reparation for the offence. A conditional caution may only be given by an authorised person and where each of five requirements is satisfied. An authorised person is defined (s 22(4)) to mean a constable, an investigating officer or a person authorised by a relevant prosecutor (defined in s 27) for purposes of s 22. The first requirement is that the authorised person has evidence that the offender has committed the offence. The second is that a relevant prosecutor decides (a) that there is sufficient evidence to charge the offender with the offence, and (b) that a conditional caution should be given to the offender in respect of the offence. The third requirement is that the offender admit guilt to the authorised person. The fourth requirement is that the authorised person explains the effect of the conditional caution, warning him that failure to comply with the conditions may result in prosecution for the offence. The last requirement is that the offender signs a document admitting the detailed offence and consenting to the caution on the specified conditions. By s 24, failure to comply with the conditions without reasonable excuse may lead to the institution of criminal proceedings against the offender for the offence in question. Pursuant to his duty under s 25 of the 2003 Act, the Secretary of State has issued a Code of Practice on 'Conditional Cautioning: Criminal Justice Act 2003, Sections 22–27' (October 2004). This points out (in para 2.2) that 'The simple caution will remain available as a disposal, and may be appropriate in cases where no suitable conditions readily suggest themselves, or where prosecution would not be in the public interest'. Provision is made for involving victims, but 'it is vital not to give the impression that the victim's views (if any) will be conclusive as to the outcome, which (it should be explained) is at the discretion of the [Crown Prosecution Service]' (see para 7.1).

[6] Neither the reprimand and warning regime established by the 1998 Act nor the conditional cautioning regime introduced by the 2003 Act applies to this case. Mr Whalley is an adult. His caution contained no conditions, and the 2003 Act was not in force when he was cautioned. The procedure adopted when cautioning him was not governed by statute, but was the subject of a series of Home Office circulars, most recently circular 18/1994 (Cautioning of Offenders). This set out revised National Standards for Cautioning Offenders. In these the purposes of a formal caution were defined (in para 1): to deal quickly and simply with less serious offenders; to divert them from unnecessary appearance in the criminal courts; and to reduce the chances of their re-offending. It is made clear (in para 2) that before a caution may be given there must be sufficient evidence, an admission of guilt and informed consent by the offender to the giving of a caution. A note to para 2 provides:

> 'In practice consent to the caution should not be sought until it has been decided that cautioning is the correct course. The significance of the caution must be explained: that is, that a record will be kept of the caution, that the fact of a previous caution may influence the decision whether or not to prosecute if the person should offend again, and that it may be cited if the person should subsequently be found guilty of an offence by a court.' (See Note 2D.)

Paragraph 3 provides that where the requirements are met, consideration should be given to whether a caution is in the public interest. The police should take into account the public interest principles described in the Code for Crown Prosecutors. These provide that a potential defendant should not be prosecuted, despite the existence of evidence providing a realistic prospect of conviction, where it is judged that prosecution would not be in the public interest.

THE NARROWER ISSUE

[7] On behalf of Mr Whalley, Mr Timothy King QC relied on his client's agreement to be cautioned on an express assurance by the police officer that he would not have to go before a criminal court in connection with the matter. He relied by analogy on R v Croydon Justices, ex p Dean [1993] 3 All ER 129, [1993] QB 769. In that case the applicant assisted the police in a murder investigation on the understanding, induced by the police, that he would not himself be prosecuted. Some weeks later, at the instance of the Crown Prosecution Service (the CPS), the applicant was charged with a lesser offence connected with the same crime. In committal proceedings before justices it was submitted that the prosecution was an abuse of the process of the court. This contention was rejected by the justices, but accepted by the Divisional Court (Staughton LJ and Buckley J). Mr King pointed out that in that case the police had no authority to bind the CPS just as, in this, the police had no authority to bind Mr Jones. But the court did not regard that point as decisive. Staughton LJ said ([1993] 3 All ER 129 at 135, [1993] QB 769 at 776–777), with the agreement of Buckley J:

> 'It is submitted on behalf of the Crown Prosecution Service that they alone are entitled, and bound, to decide who shall be prosecuted, at any rate in this category of case; and that the police had no authority and no right to tell Dean that he would not be prosecuted for any offence in connection with the murder: see the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985, s 3(2). I can readily accept that. I also accept that the point is one of constitutional importance. But I cannot accept the submission of [counsel for the prosecution] that, in consequence, no such conduct by the police can ever give rise to an abuse of process. The effect on George Dean, or for that matter on his father, of an undertaking or promise or representation by the police was likely to have been the same in this case whether it was or was not authorised by the > Crown Prosecution Service. It is true that they might have asked their solicitor whether an undertaking, promise or representation by the police was binding; and he might have asked the Crown Prosecution Service whether it was made with their authority. But it seems unreasonable to expect that in this case. If the Crown Prosecution Service find that their powers are being usurped by the police, the remedy must surely be a greater degree of liaison at an early stage.'

He concluded ([1993] 3 All ER 129 at 137, [1993] QB 769 at 778):

> 'In my judgment the prosecution of a person who had received a promise, undertaking or representation from the police that he will not be prosecuted is capable of being an abuse of process. [Prosecuting counsel] was eventually disposed to concede as much, provided (i) that the promisor had power to decide, and (ii) that the case was one of bad faith or something akin to that. I do not accept either of those requirements as essential.'

Here, Mr King argued, it was necessary to consider the effect on Mr Whalley of the categorical statement the officer made. Mr King distinguished Hayter v L [1998] 1 WLR 854, where two defendants who had been cautioned were thereafter privately prosecuted, and the prosecution was held by a Divisional Court (Schiemann LJ and Poole J) not to be an abuse. The point of distinction in that case was that the forms signed by the defendants indicated in terms that such cautions did not preclude the bringing of proceedings by an aggrieved party.

[8] To this argument, Mr Malcolm Swift QC (who, like Mr King, did not appear below) advanced a series of answers on behalf of Mr Jones. First, he submitted, the right of private prosecution is expressly preserved by s 6 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985. That section provides:

> '(1) Subject to subsection (2) below, nothing in this Part shall preclude any person from instituting any criminal proceedings or conducting any criminal proceedings to which the Director's duty to take over the conduct of proceedings does not apply.
>
> (2) Where criminal proceedings are instituted in circumstances in which the Director is not under a duty to take over their conduct, he may nevertheless do so at any stage.'

This provision means exactly what it says. Save where the Director of Public Prosecutions is under a duty to take over the conduct of proceedings or, not being under a duty, chooses to do so, Pt I of the 1985 Act, establishing the CPS, does not preclude the bringing of a private prosecution. To that extent the right of private prosecution survives. But Mr Whalley does not rely on any provision of Pt I as defeating the private prosecution brought by Mr Jones.

[9] Secondly, Mr Swift relied on Lord Wilberforce's recognition of the right to bring a private prosecution as 'a valuable constitutional safeguard against inertia or partiality on the part of authority' in Gouriet v Union of Post Office Workers [1977] 3 All ER 70 at 79, [1978] AC 435 at 477. In the same case ([1977] 3 All ER 70 at 97, [1978] AC 435 at 498) Lord Diplock described private prosecutions as 'a useful constitutional safeguard against capricious, corrupt or biased failure or refusal of those authorities to prosecute offenders against the criminal law'. Strong statements to the same effect have been made extra-judicially by, among others, Lord Simon of Glaisdale (see the Law Commission's Report on Consents to Prosecution (Law Com no 255) (20 October 1998) pp 27–28 (para 4.4)). There are, however, respected commentators who are of opinion that with the establishment of an independent, professional prosecuting service, with consent required to prosecute in some more serious classes of case, with the prosecution of some cases reserved to the Director, and with power in the Director to take over and discontinue private prosecutions, the surviving right is one of little, or even no, value (see pp 28, 36–37, 37–41 (paras 4.5–4.8, 5.7, 5.10–5.24)). The Law Commission concluded (para 5.24)—

> 'that the harm which might result from an unfettered right of prosecution would be either or both of the following . . . (2) the harm (whether to the individual involved in the criminal process or to the public interest in the strict sense) that results from any prosecution successful or not which is not in the public interest.'

Mr Swift is entitled to insist that the right of private prosecution continues to exist in England and Wales, and may have a continuing role. But it is hard to regard it as an important constitutional safeguard when, as I understand, private prosecutions are all but unknown in Scotland.

[10] Thirdly, Mr Swift distinguished R v Croydon Justices, ex p Dean [1993] 3 All ER 129, [1993] QB 769 by pointing out that the two bodies involved in that case, the police and the CPS, were both arms of the executive, whereas, in the present case, one (the police) is an arm of the executive and the other is a private individual. This is certainly a distinction, and I would agree that Ex p Dean is a stronger case, and concerned a young person. But what the court relied on in the passage quoted at [7], above, was the effect of the representation on the applicant, and the state has an interest in the integrity of court proceedings. In the present case Mr Whalley was led to believe that if he agreed to be cautioned he would not be prosecuted for this offence. He was probably misled into believing, wrongly, that the caution was a criminal conviction, because that is what the form said, an error into which the justices also were misled, as the Divisional Court pointed out ((2005) 169 JP 466 at [8]) (although the Divisional Court was wrong to suggest that a warning or reprimand given to a young offender under s 65 of the 1998 Act has the status of a conviction: the warning or reprimand may, like a caution, be cited in later proceedings but is not, again like a caution, a conviction). It is not known whether, in the present case, Mr Whalley was alive to the risk of a civil claim against him by Mr Jones, but he doubtless believed that his acceptance of a caution rendered him immune from the risk of prosecution.

[11] Mr Swift submitted, fourthly, that the forms considered in Hayter v L [1998] 1 WLR 854 stated the true legal position accurately and the form in the present case did not. But Mr Jones was not to be deprived of his rights by a misstatement in a police form. If the police chose to caution Mr Whalley and not to instigate a prosecution, that was their decision and could not deny to Mr Jones the exercise of a right he enjoyed at law. This is in my opinion correct. But it does not answer the question whether the proceedings brought by Mr Jones were fairly to be regarded by the justices, in the circumstances, as an abuse of the court's process.

[12] Mr Swift relied, fifthly, on the safeguards which exist to prevent or curb misuse of the right of private prosecution. These safeguards, listed in Hayter v L (at 858), include the power of justices to refuse to issue a summons and the Director's power to take over private prosecutions and bring them to an end. The House should not, it was argued, invent any further safeguard. I would accept the value of these safeguards in some cases. Authority shows that the issue of a summons is a judicial act (see R v West London Justices, ex p Klahn [1979] 2 All ER 221 sub nom R v West London Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Klahn [1979] 1 WLR 933), but in practice summonses are routinely issued without detailed scrutiny, and there is nothing to suggest that the police caution of Mr Whalley was disclosed when application was made for the summons in the present case. The CPS was, as the justices record, offered the opportunity to take over Mr Jones's prosecution, but declined to do so for reasons which are not in evidence: the CPS may have disagreed with the police action and favoured prosecution, or it may have agreed with the police decision but preferred to leave the matter to the justices. It is not clear that either of these safeguards operated effectively in the present case.

[13] The narrower issue is whether a private prosecution may or should be regarded as an abuse of the process of the magistrates' court where the defendant has agreed to be formally cautioned by the police on the assurance that, if he agrees, he will not have to go before a criminal court. The abuse complained of is not abuse impairing the fairness of the trial, since evidence of the admission and caution could be excluded. The abuse complained of goes, as in Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court [1993] 3 All ER 138 sub nom R v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, ex p Bennett [1994] 1 AC 42, to the fairness of trying Mr Whalley at all in the circumstances. The justices recognised, on the authority of that case, that the power to stay must be used sparingly. But they thought it would be an abuse, and not only, as I infer, because they were misled into regarding the caution as a conviction, which, if true, would have given Mr Whalley a complete defence. I agree with the justices' conclusion. If Mr Jones had legal grounds for attacking the police decision to caution Mr Whalley, he could apply for judicial review to quash that decision. If successful, the slate would be clean. There would be no citable caution on Mr Whalley's record and Mr Jones would be free to prosecute. But so long as that formal caution stood, induced by a representation that he would not be prosecuted, the private prosecution of Mr Whalley did in my opinion amount to an abuse, as the justices held.

THE BROADER ISSUE

[14] In his oral submissions to the House Mr King questioned whether, irrespective of what may be said to, or stated in a form given to, a person who is cautioned, conditionally cautioned, reprimanded or warned, it can ever be other than an abuse of process for a court thereafter to entertain a private prosecution against him. To the extent that this contention was inconsistent with Hayter v L, counsel challenged the correctness of that decision.

[15] The broad lines of the argument may be summarised in this way. The practice of cautioning, originally developed by the police as a pragmatic response to a certain class of case, has grown into something much more sophisticated and specific, as evidenced by the statutory regimes established by the 1998 and 2003 Acts and a series of Home Office circulars. While there are obvious differences between the young offender, conditional cautioning and simple cautioning regimes, they have shared objectives of seeking to keep people out of the criminal courts and preventing further offending. Underlying a decision to reprimand, warn, caution conditionally or caution simpliciter, and fundamental to each, is a judgment made by a responsible official that prosecution would not be in the public interest, or at least that the public interest would be better served by not prosecuting. Such a judgment, like a decision not to prosecute, is not immune from challenge. If shown to be unlawful on any of the familiar grounds relied on to seek judicial review, it may be quashed and set aside. But so long as the decision stands the judgment should be respected, and it would be wrong in principle to allow it to be circumvented at the behest of a private prosecutor whose motives may have little or nothing to do with the public interest. The right to prosecute privately is a factor of little weight in the balance, since it is a somewhat anomalous historical survival; it cannot outweigh an extant decision of a responsible official on what will best serve the public interest. On this argument, paradoxically, the statement made in the form given to Mr Whalley, in its reference to going before a criminal court, was accurate, and the statement in the Hayter v L forms was inaccurate.

[16] I see very considerable force in this argument. A crime is an offence against the good order of the state. It is for the state by its appropriate agencies to investigate alleged crimes and decide whether offenders should be prosecuted. In times past, with no public prosecution service and ill-organised means of enforcing the law, the prosecution of offenders necessarily depended on the involvement of private individuals, but that is no longer so. The surviving right of private prosecution is of questionable value, and can be exercised in a way damaging to the public interest. I would not, therefore, reject this argument. But nor do I think the House should in this appeal accept it, for reasons which I find, cumulatively, to be compelling. It was not advanced in the Divisional Court, so we lack the benefit of its judgment on it. It was scarcely foreshadowed in Mr Whalley's written case, and there was no hint that the correctness of Hayter v L was to be challenged. Thus Mr Swift had little opportunity to prepare an argument in reply. The question is one of some importance, and should not be resolved in the absence of representation of the Crown or any police force, both of whom might be expected to have views on how the issue should be decided. The question is one which might well benefit from legislative attention. It is not necessary to resolve this question to decide the present appeal.

[17] For these reasons and those given by my noble and learned friend Lord Rodger of Earlsferry with which I agree, I would therefore allow the appeal on the narrower ground, set aside the decision of the Divisional Court, uphold the decision of the justices and dismiss the proceedings. I would invite written submissions on costs within 14 days.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[18] My Lords, in May 2003 the appellant, Mr Whalley, assaulted and injured the respondent, Mr Jones. When interviewed by the Greater Manchester Police, he admitted the offence. The officer concerned decided that Mr Whalley should not be prosecuted, but should be cautioned. In the case of the Greater Manchester Police the effects of a caution are set out on a standard form. It is not in dispute that Mr Whalley was informed of those effects and agreed to be cautioned.

[19] Mr Whalley's standard form told him that a decision had been made that he was to receive a caution for the offence of assault occasioning actual bodily harm for which he had been interviewed. The notice continued: 'This means you will not have to go before a criminal court in connection with this matter but that a RECORD will be kept of this warning.' The form went on to spell out the other consequences of the caution.

[20] Having been told this, Mr Whalley would have been entitled to assume that, since he had accepted the caution with its attendant effects, he would not now be prosecuted for the assault on Mr Jones. The form warned him, however, that details of his caution would be disclosed to the victim in accordance with the victims' charter. And, presumably, having been made aware that there was to be no public prosecution, the victim, Mr Jones, initiated a private prosecution against him. Some months later, the Chief Crown Prosecutor for Merseyside declined to take over the prosecution. The House knows nothing about the reasons for that decision. In October 2004, the justices held that it would be an abuse of the process of the court to allow the prosecution to proceed and so they stayed the proceedings. Mr Jones appealed and the Divisional Court reversed the justices, holding that in the circumstances the prosecution was not an abuse of process (see [2005] EWHC 931 (Admin), [2005] All ER (D) 114 (May)).

[21] When the police officer cautioned Mr Whalley, he was not acting under a statutory scheme. But nor was he off on a frolic of his own, or on a frolic of the Greater Manchester Police. On the contrary, he was acting in accordance with an officially recognised policy which was intended to be followed by police forces throughout the country in accordance with guidance issued by the Home Office. The current guidance was to be found in Home Office circular 18/1994, to which was annexed a revised version of the National Standards for Cautioning. Paragraph 1 of the standards describes the purposes of a formal caution as being to deal quickly and simply with less serious offenders, 'to divert them from unnecessary appearance in the criminal courts', and to reduce the chances of their re-offending. All worthwhile policy objectives. Before the police can contemplate administering a caution, there must be sufficient evidence of the offender's guilt and he must admit the offence. Provided these requirements are met, 'consideration should be given to whether a caution is in the public interest' (see para 3). The police are told that they should take into account the public interest principles described in the Code for Crown Prosecutors. In their turn, Crown Prosecutors are told in para 8.3 of the current Code for Crown Prosecutors (2004) p 15 that a simple caution should only be given if the public interest justifies it and in accordance with Home Office guidelines.

[22] What is clear from the National Standards for Cautioning is that a police officer should not decide to administer a caution, rather than to prosecute, unless he is satisfied that cautioning rather than prosecution is in the public interest. Presumably, the officer in this case was so satisfied. If that view was untenable, his decision to caution rather than to prosecute could be set aside on judicial review. But Mr Jones has not challenged the officer's decision. The assumption must be that the police officer was entitled to decide that it was in the public interest for Mr Whalley to be given a caution and so avoid an 'unnecessary appearance in the criminal courts'. On that basis the officer represented to Mr Whalley that he would not have to go before a criminal court for the offence.

[23] In these circumstances, where such an assurance had been given to Mr Whalley, any subsequent decision by the Crown Prosecutor to prosecute him would have been capable of being regarded as an abuse of process (see R v Croydon Justices, ex p Dean [1993] 3 All ER 129 at 137, [1993] QB 769 at 778 per Staughton LJ). What happened in this case, however, was that Mr Jones, a private individual, unconnected with the police or prosecuting authorities, initiated the prosecution, despite the assurance given to Mr Whalley. Whether or not Mr Jones was consulted before the police officer took the decision to caution rather than to prosecute and to give that assurance, he was certainly not a party to it. So there is no question of Mr Jones being estopped from initiating the prosecution. Nor did he do anything to give Mr Whalley any legitimate expectation that he would not be prosecuted. The question is, rather, whether the magistrates were entitled to stay the proceedings because it offended their sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in these circumstances (see Bennett v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court [1993] 3 All ER 138 at 161 sub nom R v Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, ex p Bennett [1994] 1 AC 42 at 74 per Lord Lowry).

[24] Nowadays public prosecutions are the rule. So, usually, the court will be concerned to prevent its process being misused by a public prosecutor. But, in times gone by, when private prosecutions were the rule, the court must have had the power to guard against the corresponding danger of its process being misused by a private prosecutor. So, in this case the justices had the same power to stay for abuse of process as they would have had in the case of a public prosecution. Having duly considered the matter, the justices came to the view that it would be an abuse of their process to allow Mr Jones to continue with the prosecution of Mr Whalley, after the police had given him an assurance that he would not have to go to court in respect of the offence. Clearly, they considered that it offended their sense of justice and propriety to be asked to try the accused in the face of that assurance, irrespective of the fact that the prosecution was initiated by a private individual rather than by a public official. Not only was that a view which was open to the justices, but it is one which I share.

[25] Looking at the matter from a slightly different angle, it seems to me that allowing private prosecutions to proceed, despite an assurance that the offender would not have to go to court, would tend to undermine not only the non-statutory system of cautions, but also the schemes for cautioning young offenders and adult offenders which Parliament has indorsed in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 and the Criminal Justice Act 2003. A court is entitled to ensure that its process is not misused in this way.

[26] In the course of the hearing, the House was referred to the decision of the Divisional Court in Hayter v L [1998] 1 WLR 854. In that case the defendants had assaulted and injured a young man. The police cautioned them, but the terms of the caution indicated that it did not preclude the bringing of proceedings by an aggrieved party. The victim's father then initiated a prosecution of the defendants. They contended that the proceedings should be stayed as an abuse of process. The justices dismissed the informations, but the Divisional Court allowed the prosecutor's appeal.

[27] The qualification in a caution of that type means that the decision in Hayter v L is distinguishable from the present case and, for that reason, the House did not hear full submissions on it. I accordingly agree with my noble and learned friend, Lord Bingham of Cornhill, that it would not be appropriate to express a concluded view about the broader argument relating to it. Accordingly, I make only one tentative observation.

[28] Plainly, the Hayter v L type of qualification to the caution would alert the offender to the lingering possibility of a private prosecution. So the reaction of a court to being asked to try the case in such circumstances might well be different from its reaction in a case where the caution was not qualified in that way—although, in Hayter v L, the qualification does not actually seem to have weighed with the justices. The point which concerns me, however, is not the effect of such a qualified caution on the court's sense of propriety and justice, but, rather, whether it is proper for a police officer to insert the qualification in the caution and, if so, in what circumstances.

[29] The National Standards for Cautioning indicate that a police officer should not administer a caution unless he concludes that it is in the public interest to divert the offender from an unnecessary appearance in the criminal courts. Prima facie, this would seem to suggest that the officer should have concluded that it is unnecessary for the offender to appear in the criminal courts, whether at the instance of a public or a private prosecutor. Some support for that view might perhaps be found in para 7 of the Home Office circular 18/1994 which contemplates the police giving the victim details of the offender in order to institute civil, but not criminal, proceedings. On that assumption, however, it would be difficult to see how the officer could administer a caution but simultaneously contemplate—by including the Hayter v L qualification—that it could be in the public interest for the offender to be prosecuted by the victim. The inclusion of the qualification suggests, however, that the officer has concluded that, while it would not be in the public interest for a public prosecution to be mounted, it would none the less be legitimate, and not contrary to the public interest, for the victim to prosecute, if so advised. Your Lordships heard no submissions on whether it is appropriate for a police officer to issue a caution, with the various consequences for the offender, on that basis. Nor was counsel in a position to explain whether there is an established practice of issuing such qualified cautions in certain kinds of cases. So I simply draw attention to the point but express no view on it.

[30] For these reasons, as well as for those given by Lord Bingham, I would allow the appeal and make the order which he proposes.

LORD CARSWELL.

[31] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinion prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill. I am in agreement with his reasons and conclusions on the narrower ground, and for those reasons I would allow the appeal and make the order which he proposes.

[32] On the broader ground, I would also be reluctant to express a firm opinion. I agree with your Lordships that the right to bring a private prosecution retains a residual value, although in modern circumstances I would not wish to overstate its importance. I am conscious of the possibility that it is capable of being abused, the safeguard against which is the right of the public prosecutor to take over the prosecution, an area in which it behoves public prosecutors to be both vigilant and sensitive. I am rather more concerned about the utility of routinely inserting a caveat into cautions that the administration and acceptance of the caution do not preclude the possibility of private prosecution. I fear that the effect could be to deter offenders from accepting cautions in proper cases. Correctly used, and not over-used, cautions play a useful part in criminal justice and I would not like to see that usefulness impaired. I should therefore wish to have fuller argument on the correctness of Hayter v L [1998] 1 WLR 854 and its implications before expressing a final view on the broader issue.

LORD BROWN OF EATON-UNDER-HEYWOOD.

[33] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Bingham of Cornhill and for the reasons he gives I too would allow the appeal and make the order indicated.

[34] Like Lord Bingham—and, I apprehend, in common also with my noble and learned friend Lord Rodger of Earlsferry, whose opinion in draft I have also had the advantage of reading—I too see considerable force in the wider argument advanced by the appellant, namely that once an offender has been formally cautioned (unless that caution is quashed in judicial review proceedings), he cannot be prosecuted, whether publicly or privately, for the same offence. Plainly, however, such a rule, were it to be established, would substantially diminish what many understand to be the present scope for private prosecutions and, as Lord Bingham observes, the question needs to be subject to altogether fuller argument than was addressed to the House on this occasion.

[35] I too, therefore, would allow this appeal on the narrow ground that it is an abuse of process to prosecute someone who has accepted a formal caution on the express assurance that he 'will not have to go before a criminal court in connection with this matter'. The respondent submits that the victim cannot properly be deprived of his right to bring a private prosecution by a police mis-statement (Mr Swift's fourth argument set out by Lord Bingham at [11], above). (This submission, of course, necessarily supposes that the wider argument is wrong.) I see the force of this but the answer to it lies to my mind in the victim's right to apply to have the caution quashed on the ground that it was induced by misrepresentation. (Any such application in future would inevitably now attract full argument on the wider issue too.)

[36] The difficulty, of course, in deciding the present appeal on the narrow ground is that, until the wider issue is resolved by further litigation or, preferably perhaps, by legislation, it remains unclear whether, when administering a caution, the police should warn the offenders, as in Hayter v L [1998] 1 WLR 854 at 855, that the caution 'did not preclude an aggrieved party from bringing criminal proceedings or a civil action' or, as here, should assure them of immunity from criminal process. To say nothing about the consequences would obviously be unhelpful. Perhaps the best and safest course would be to give the Hayter v L warning but in modified terms, stating that a caution may not preclude a private prosecution and will not preclude a civil action.

LORD MANCE.

[37] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinions of my noble and learned friends, Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Lord Rodger of Earlsferry and Lord Brown of Eaton-under-Heywood. On the narrower issue, and subject to some comments below regarding the right to institute a private prosecution, I agree with Lord Bingham's and Lord Rodger's reasoning and do not wish to add anything. I too would therefore allow the appeal and make the order indicated.

[38] The broader issue is one of some importance. It requires some consideration of the general value of any right of private prosecution in modern conditions. It was not raised below or touched on in the appellant's case, and its implications have not been properly explored. They may be more substantial than might appear. Prosecutions brought without police or Crown Prosecution Service involvement are not uncommon. They may be initiated by private bodies such as high street stores, by charities such as the NSPCC and RSPCA, or by private individuals as in the present case. To treat a police decision to accept a caution as by itself fatal to the maintenance of any private prosecution, even where the terms of the caution expressly reserve that possibility, would be a step which would, at the least, require very careful thought, and might very well, even if it were thought appropriate, require legislation.

[39] The Law Commission's approach in their Report on Consents to Prosecution (Law Com no 255) (20 October 1998) is of interest. The Commission addressed the right to bring a private prosecution in paras 5.3 and 5.4 under the heading of 'The Fundamental Principle' (see pp 35–36). It pointed out that it had in its prior consultation paper considered the significance of private prosecutions, and had (in agreement with the statements of Lord Simon of Glaisdale and Lord Diplock and Lord Wilberforce quoted in Lord Bingham's opinion (at [9], above)) concluded that 'the right to private prosecution was "an important one which should not be lightly set aside"' and 'should be unrestricted unless some very good reason to the contrary exists'. The Commission was (like your Lordships' House in the present case) only concerned with social and legal conditions in England and Wales. In Scotland, private prosecutions are apparently very rare, but without knowing more about the different Scottish environment leading to this being so, I cannot regard it as undermining the traditional English view that the right to institute a private prosecution is an important right and safeguard possessed by any aggrieved citizen.

[40] The Commission went on (pp 36–37, 37–38 (paras 5.7, 5.10–5.12)) to recite criticisms of the right which it had received in the light of its consultation paper, and concluded (in para 5.13):

> 'We see the force of these points but do not believe that it is appropriate to consider abolishing the right of private prosecution without specific consideration which has neither been sought nor given in this project. The issues raised on the question of retention of the right of private prosecution are complex and they are not capable of being resolved within the scope of this report.'

[41] At para 5.19 (p 39) the Commission identified two types of harm as likely to result if private prosecutions were instituted in cases failing the tests applied by the Crown Prosecution Service when deciding whether to prosecute, viz the harm resulting (1) from an unsuccessful prosecution of an innocent defendant and (2) from any prosecution, successful or not, which is not in the public interest. But in para 5.22 (pp 40–41) they recited three factors which, as they concluded in their consultation paper, demonstrated that these potential harms did not undermine the fundamental principle of the right to institute a private prosecution. The factors were:

> '(1) There is always a risk that an individual Crown Prosecutor will either misapply the Code or—more likely, given the width of the Code tests—apply a personal interpretation to the tests which, although not wrong, might differ from that of other prosecutors.
>
> (2) The Code itself may, in the eyes of some, fail to achieve a proper balance between the rights of the defendant and the interests of the community.
>
> (3) It should not be assumed that if it is wrong to bring a public prosecution then it is also wrong to bring a private prosecution. If, for example, a case is turned down by the [Crown Prosecution Service] because it fails the evidential sufficiency test, but only just; if the private prosecutor knows that the defendant is guilty (because, say, he or she was the victim and can identify the offender); and if the case is a serious one, then a private prosecution might be thought desirable.'

[42] In the circumstances, the Commission made no suggestion that the right of private prosecution be abolished, but proposed a reformed regime for requiring consent of the Attorney General or Director of Public Prosecutions in the case of certain offences.

[43] The right of private prosecution operates and has been explained at the highest level as a safeguard against wrongful refusal or failure by public prosecuting authorities to institute proceedings: see the statements by Lord Simon, Lord Diplock and Lord Wilberforce to which I have already referred and para 5.3 of the Law Commission's report. That justification is relevant not just where police fail to take any action at all, but also where their only response is to obtain a caution. Further, as the Law Commission pointed out in their third factor (cf para 5.22), it cannot always be assumed that, if it is wrong to bring a public prosecution, then it is also wrong to bring a private prosecution. While it is a matter of speculation, it is not impossible that such a thought played its part in the decision of the Chief Crown Prosecutor for Merseyside in the present case, declining to take over the prosecution with a view to bringing it to an end.

[44] As matters stand, I do not consider that police, when cautioning an admitted offender, should give any unqualified assurance that the person being cautioned will not thereafter 'have to go before a criminal court in connection with this matter'. Rather, I agree with Lord Brown that they should give a warning along the lines given in Hayter v L [1998] 1 WLR 854, but that it would be preferable to give it in slightly modified terms, stating that the caution may not preclude a private prosecution (and will not preclude a civil action) by an aggrieved party. A court before which any such private prosecution is brought will retain a power to stay the proceedings in the event that it concludes that, despite the warning, it would be abusive for them to continue.

Appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Lambeth London Borough Council and another v Kay and others

Leeds City Council v Price and others

[2006] UKHL 10

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE, LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE, BARONESS HALE OF RICHMOND AND LORD BROWN OF EATON-UNDER-HEYWOOD

12–15 DECEMBER 2005, 8 MARCH 2006

Local authority – Land – Housing – Right to respect for private and family life – Tenants of housing trust occupying properties owned by local authority and leased to housing trust – Gipsies occupying local authority land without licence or consent – Local authorities seeking possession orders – Whether breach of right to respect for private and family life – Human Rights Act 1998, s 2, Sch 1, Pt I, art 8.

Precedent – House of Lords – Decision of European Court of Human Rights inconsistent with previous decision of the House – Whether appropriate for House of Lords to depart from previous decision of the House.

The respondent local authority in the first of two conjoined appeals (Lambeth) came to an informal agreement with a housing trust (LQHT) under which Lambeth licensed 'short life' premises, ie premises which were not in a condition suitable for normal housing use or capable of being rendered so suitable within the finances available to Lambeth, to LQHT for LQHT to make the premises available as accommodation for persons who were homeless but to whom Lambeth owed no statutory duty to arrange accommodation. LQHT purported to grant licences to those whom it allowed into occupation, including the appellants. In 1995 Lambeth granted LQHT a ten-year lease of the short life properties. Clause 2 of the lease gave Lambeth the right to determine the ten-year terms on the expiry of six months and one week's notice in writing to LQHT stating that Lambeth required possession of the demised properties. As a result of a decision of the House of Lords, an occupier of one of the properties was held not to be, as had been supposed, a licensee of LQHT, but its tenant. Lambeth thereafter terminated the 1995 lease, notified the appellants that they were trespassers, and took possession proceedings against them. The appellants claimed to have become, on the determination of the 1995 lease, tenants of Lambeth, and that their right under art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) to respect for their homes gave them an alternative defence to the possession claim. The judge and the Court of Appeal, following previous House of Lords authority, rejected their reliance on art 8. They also rejected the private law tenancy defence. The appellants appealed. The respondent local authority in the second appeal (Leeds) was freehold owner of a recreation ground which was occupied without its permission by gipsies, amongst whom were the appellants in that appeal. Leeds issued proceedings for possession against the appellants as trespassers two days after they had entered the site. The appellants' defence was based on art 8. The judge, holding himself bound by the same House of Lords authority as the courts in the first appeal, decided as a preliminary issue that art 8 could not in law provide the appellants with a defence to the claim for possession. The Court of Appeal upheld the judge's decision, but considered that the House of Lords authority was incompatible with a later decision of the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR), and granted permission to appeal.

Held – The appeals would be dismissed for the following reasons.

(1) Where a court would ordinarily be bound by domestic rules of precedent to follow the decision of another court higher in the domestic hierarchy, but that decision appeared to be inconsistent with a subsequent ruling of the ECHR, the court should follow the binding precedent. Certainty was best achieved by adhering, even in the convention context, to domestic rules of precedent. It would of course be the duty of judges to review convention arguments addressed to them, and if they considered a binding precedent to be, or possibly to be, inconsistent with Strasbourg authority, they might express their views and give leave to appeal, as the Court of Appeal had in the instant case. Leap-frog appeals might be appropriate. In that way the courts would discharge their duty under the 1998 Act. The Strasbourg Court authoritatively expounded the interpretation of the rights embodied in the convention and its protocols, as it had to if the convention was to be uniformly understood by all member states. However, in its decisions on particular cases the Strasbourg Court accorded a margin of appreciation, often generous, to the decisions of national authorities and attached much importance to the peculiar facts of the case. Thus it was for national authorities, including national courts particularly, to decide in the first instance how the principles expounded in Strasbourg should be applied in the special context of national legislation, law, practice and social and other conditions. It was by the decisions of national courts that the domestic standard had initially to be set, and to those decisions the ordinary rules of precedent should apply (see [43], [44], [50], [62], [121], [177], [178], [213], below); Harrow London BC v Qazi [2003] 4 All ER 461 explained; Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639 considered.

(2) It was not necessary for a local authority in possession proceedings to plead or prove in every case that domestic law complied with art 8. Courts should proceed on the assumption that domestic law struck a fair balance and was compatible with art 8 (see [39], [54], [55], [72]–[76], [181], below).

(3) (Per Lord Hope, Lord Scott, Baroness Hale and Lord Brown) A defence which did not challenge the law under which the possession order was sought as being incompatible with art 8 but was based only on the occupier's personal circumstances should be struck out. Where domestic law provided for personal circumstances to be taken into account, as in a case where the statutory test was whether it would be reasonable to make a possession order, then a fair opportunity had to be given for the arguments in favour of the occupier to be presented. However, if the requirements of the law had been established and the right to recover possession was unqualified, the only situations in which it would be open to the court to refrain from proceeding to summary judgment and making the possession order were as follows: (a) if a seriously arguable point was raised that the law which enabled the court to make the possession order was incompatible with art 8, the county court in the exercise of its jurisdiction under the 1998 Act should deal with the argument either by giving effect to the law, so far as it was possible for it do so under s 3, in a way that was compatible with art 8, or by adjourning the proceedings to enable the compatibility issue to be dealt with in the High Court; and (b) if the defendant wished to challenge the decision of a public authority to recover possession as an improper exercise of its powers at common law on the ground that it was a decision that no reasonable person would consider justifiable, he should be permitted to do that provided again that the point was seriously arguable (see [110], [174], [190]–[192], [212], below).

(4) In the first appeal, LQHT was, when it granted the tenancies to the appellants, merely a licensee of Lambeth. The tenancies were not granted by Lambeth and were not carved by LQHT out of any estate that Lambeth had granted to LQHT. They were not derivative estates. LQHT, prior to the grant of the 1995 lease, had no estate in the land. It merely had a contractual licence. Once the LQHT licence had been terminated the appellants were trespassers as against Lambeth. Accordingly, the appellants had no right under ordinary domestic law to retain possession of their respective properties after the termination of the 1995 lease. They had no right to remain there indefinitely, which would be the effect of denying to Lambeth its unqualified right to possession of the premises on the ground that to give effect to that right would be incompatible with art 8. Their interests would be sufficiently protected by the fulfilment of the formal requirements for the eviction, which demanded proof by the public authority landowner of its entitlement to obtain an order for possession in the exercise of its property rights (see [2], [50], [62], [115], [143], [148], [177], [178], [193], [213], below); Mellor v Watkins (1874) LR 9 QB 400 and Barrett v Morgan [2000] 1 All ER 481 distinguished; Bruton v London and Quadrant Housing Trust [1999] 3 All ER 481 followed.

(5) In the second appeal, it was all but unarguable that the recreation ground on which the appellants had parked their caravans was ever their home within the meaning of art 8(1). If, however, the land was their home, it was plain that their eviction was in accordance with domestic property law, which had the legitimate end of enabling public authorities to evict unlawful squatters from public land and restore it to public use. There was no ground on which such action could be stigmatised as disproportionate and accordingly their appeals also had to fail (see [48], [116], [129], [193], below); Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639 considered.

Decision of the Court of Appeal in Leeds City Council v Price [2005] 3 All ER 573 affirmed.

Notes

For the convention rights and their interpretation, see Supp to 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 104A.1, and for the right to respect for private and family life, home and correspondence generally, for respect for home in particular, and for what constitutes respect and interference, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 149, 152, 154, 155.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, s 2, Sch 1, Pt I, art 8, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2004 reissue) 678, 707.

Cases referred to in opinions

Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2003] UKHL 37, [2003] 3 All ER 1213, [2004] 1 AC 546, [2003] 3 WLR 283.

Baker v Turner [1950] 1 All ER 834, [1950] AC 401, HL.

Barrett v Morgan [2000] 1 All ER 481, [2000] 2 AC 264, [2000] 2 WLR 284, HL.
Blecic v Croatia (2005) 41 EHRR 185, [2004] ECHR 59532/00, ECt HR.
Boddington v British Transport Police [1998] 2 All ER 203, [1999] 2 AC 143, [1998] 2 WLR 639, HL.
Bruton v London and Quadrant Housing Trust [1999] 3 All ER 481, [2000] 1 AC 406, [1999] 3 WLR 150, HL.
Buckley v UK (1997) 23 EHRR 101, [1996] ECHR 20348/92, ECt HR.
Cassell & Co Ltd v Broome [1972] 1 All ER 801, [1972] AC 1027, [1972] 2 WLR 645, HL.
Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48, ECt HR.
Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639, ECt HR.
D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust, K v Dewsbury Healthcare NHS Trust, K v Oldham NHS Trust [2003] EWCA Civ 1151, [2003] 4 All ER 796, [2004] QB 558, [2004] 2 WLR 58; affd [2005] UKHL 23, [2005] 2 All ER 443, [2005] 2 WLR 993.
Di Palma v UK (1986) 10 EHRR 149, E Com HR.
Feyereisel v Parry [1952] 1 All ER 728, sub nom Feyereisel v Turnidge [1952] 2 QB 29, CA.
Fitzleet Estates Ltd v Cherry (Inspector of Taxes) [1977] 3 All ER 996, [1977] 1 WLR 1345, HL.
Gillow v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 335, [1986] ECHR 9063/80, ECt HR.
Harrow London BC v Qazi [2003] UKHL 43, [2003] 4 All ER 461, [2004] 1 AC 983, [2003] 3 WLR 792; rvsg [2001] EWCA Civ 1834, [2002] HLR 276.
Howard v UK (1987) 9 EHRR 116, E Com HR.
Larkos v Cyprus (1999) 7 BHRC 244, ECt HR.
London Tramways Co v LCC [1898] AC 375, HL.
Mabey v UK (1996) 22 EHRR CD 123, E Com HR.
Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175, E Com HR.
McPhail v persons, names unknown [1973] 3 All ER 393, [1973] Ch 447, [1973] 3 WLR 71, CA.
Mellor v Watkins (1874) LR 9 QB 400.
O'Rourke v UK App No 39022/97 (26 June 2001, unreported), ECt HR.
P v UK App No 14751/89 (12 December 1990, unreported), E Com HR.
Pennell v Payne [1995] 2 All ER 592, [1995] QB 192, [1995] 2 WLR 261, CA.
Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595, [2001] 4 All ER 604, [2002] QB 48, [2001] 3 WLR 183.
R (on the application of Casey) v Crawley BC [2006] EWHC 301 (Admin), [2006] LGR 239.
R (on the application of McLellan) v Bracknell Forest BC, Reigate and Banstead BC v Benfield [2001] EWCA Civ 1510, [2002] 1 All ER 899, [2002] QB 1129, [2002] 2 WLR 1448.
R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator, Do v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] UKHL 26, [2004] 3 All ER 785, [2004] 2 AC 323, [2004] 3 WLR 23.
R v Huntingdon DC, ex p Cowan [1984] 1 All ER 58, [1984] 1 WLR 501.
R v Lincolnshire CC, ex p Atkinson (1995) 8 Admin LR 529.
R v Spear, R v Boyd, R v Saunby [2002] UKHL 31, [2002] 3 All ER 1074, [2003] 1 AC 734, [2002] 3 WLR 437.
S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274, E Com HR.
Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 04, [2002] LGR 467.

St Brice v Southwark London BC [2001] EWCA Civ 1138, [2002] LGR 117, [2002] 1 WLR 1537.
Ure v UK App No 28027/95 (27 November 1996, unreported), E Com HR.
Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271, [2002] 4 All ER 1136, [2003] 1 WLR 617.
Wandsworth London BC v Winder [1984] 3 All ER 976, [1985] AC 461, [1984] 3 WLR 1254, HL.
Wood v UK (1997) 24 EHRR CD 69, E Com HR.
X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633, [1995] 3 WLR 152, HL; affg [1994] 4 All ER 602, [1994] 2 WLR 554, CA.
Z v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 384, ECt HR.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

A v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, X v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] UKHL 56, [2005] 3 All ER 169, [2005] 2 AC 68, [2005] 2 WLR 87.
A-G's Ref (No 2 of 2001) [2003] UKHL 68, [2004] 1 All ER 1049, [2004] 2 AC 72, [2004] 2 WLR 1.
Ashburn Anstalt v Arnold [1988] 2 All ER 147, [1989] Ch 1, [1988] 2 WLR 706, CA.
Avon CC v Buscott [1988] 1 All ER 841, [1988] QB 656, [1988] 2 WLR 788, CA.
B v France (1993) 16 EHRR 1, [1992] ECHR 13343/87, ECt HR.
Beith's Trustees v Beith 1950 SC 66, Ct of Sess.
Belgian Linguistic Case (No 2) (1968) 1 EHRR 252, [1968] ECHR 1474/62, ECt HR.
Bensaid v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 297, ECt HR.
Birmingham City Council v Bradney [2003] EWCA Civ 1783, [2004] HLR 451.
Botta v Italy (1998) 4 BHRC 81, ECt HR.
Brown v Stott (Procurator Fiscal, Dunfermline) [2001] 2 All ER 97, [2003] 1 AC 681, [2001] 2 WLR 817, PC.
Burrows v Brent London BC [1996] 4 All ER 577, [1996] 1 WLR 1448, HL.
Campbell v MGN [2004] UKHL 22, [2004] 2 All ER 995, [2004] 2 AC 457, [2004] 2 WLR 1232.
Copsey v WWB Devon Clays Ltd [2005] EWCA Civ 932, [2005] IRLR 811, [2005] ICR 1789.
Cossey v UK [1993] 2 FCR 97, ECt HR.
Cyprus v Turkey (1976) 4 EHRR 482, E Com HR.
D v UK (1997) 2 BHRC 273, ECt HR.
Davis v Johnson [1978] 1 All ER 1132, [1979] AC 264, [1978] 2 WLR 553, HL.
Doe d Beadon v Pyke (1816) 5 M & S 146.
Dutton v Manchester Airport plc [1999] 2 All ER 675, [2000] QB 133, [1999] 3 WLR 524, CA.
Eastleigh BC v Walsh [1985] 2 All ER 112, [1985] 1 WLR 525.
Ezeh v UK (2003) 15 BHRC 145, ECt HR.
Family Housing Association v Jones [1990] 1 All ER 385, [1990] 1 WLR 779, CA.
Frette v France [2003] 2 FCR 39, ECt HR.
Gallagher v Castle Vale Action Trust Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 944, (2001) 33 HLR 810.
Gardner v London Chatham and Dover Rly Co (1867) LR 2 Ch App 201, LJJ.
Ghaidan v Mendoza [2004] UKHL 30, [2004] 3 All ER 411, [2004] 2 AC 557, [2004] 3 WLR 113.
Goodwin v UK (2002) 13 BHRC 120, ECt HR.
Guerra v Italy (1998) 4 BHRC 63, ECt HR.
Gul v Switzerland (1996) 22 EHRR 93, [1996] ECHR 23218/94, ECt HR.

Hackney London BC v Lambourne (1992) 25 HLR 172, CA.
Hatton v UK (2003) 15 BHRC 259, ECt HR.
James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123, ECt HR.
Karner v Austria (2003) 14 BHRC 674, ECt HR.
Kensington and Chelsea Royal London BC v O'Sullivan (2003) 35 HLR 877.
Khawaja v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1983] 1 All ER 765, [1984] AC 74, [1983] 2 WLR 321, HL.
Lambeth London BC v Howard [2001] EWCA Civ 468, (2001) 33 HLR 636.
Lewis v A-G, Taylor v A-G, Brown v A-G [2000] 5 LRC 253, [2001] 2 AC 50, [2000] 3 WLR 1785, PC.
Lopez Ostra v Spain (1995) 20 EHRR 277, ECt HR.
Markx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330, ECt HR.
Marshall v South Staffordshire Tramways Co [1895] 2 Ch 36, CA.
Mellacher v UK (1990) 12 EHRR 391, ECt HR.
Moat Housing Group South Ltd v Harris [2005] EWCA Civ 287, [2005] 4 All ER 1051, [2005] 3 WLR 691.
N v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2005] UKHL 31, [2005] 4 All ER 1017, [2005] 2 AC 296, [2005] 2 WLR 1124.
National Westminster Bank plc v Spectrum Plus Ltd [2005] UKHL 41, [2005] 4 All ER 209, [2005] 2 AC 680, [2005] 3 WLR 58.
O'Reilly v Mackman [1982] 3 All ER 1124, [1983] 2 AC 237, [1982] 3 WLR 1096, HL.
Oneryildiz v Turkey (2004) 18 BHRC 145, ECt HR.
Parker v Camden London BC, Newman v Camden London BC [1985] 2 All ER 141, [1986] Ch 162, [1985] 3 WLR 47, CA.
Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593, [1992] 3 WLR 1032, HL.
R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929, [2003] 2 AC 295, [2001] 2 WLR 1389.
R (on the application of Al-Hasan) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Carroll) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Greenfield) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 1224, [2002] 1 WLR 545; rvsd [2005] UKHL 13, [2005] 1 All ER 927.
R (on the application of Amin) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] UKHL 51, [2003] 4 All ER 1264, [2004] 1 AC 653, [2003] 3 WLR 1169.
R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] UKHL 46, [2002] 4 All ER 1089, [2003] 1 AC 837, [2002] 3 WLR 1800.
R (on the application of Carson) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2002] EWHC 978 (Admin), [2002] 3 All ER 994; affd [2003] EWCA Civ 797, [2003] 3 All ER 577; affd [2005] UKHL 37, [2005] 4 All ER 545, [2006] 1 AC 173, [2005] 2 WLR 1369.
R (on the application of Clays Lane Housing Co-operative Ltd) v Housing Corp [2004] EWCA Civ 1658, [2005] 1 WLR 2229.
R (on the application of Greenfield) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2005] UKHL 14, [2005] 2 All ER 240, [2005] 1 WLR 673.
R (on the application of H) v Secretary of State for Health [2005] UKHL 60, [2005] 4 All ER 1311, [2006] 1 AC 441, [2005] 3 WLR 867.
R (on the application of Hooper) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2005] UKHL 29, [2006] 1 All ER 487, [2005] 1 WLR 1681.
R (on the application of Khatun) v Newham London BC (Office of Fair Trading, interested party) [2004] EWCA Civ 55, [2004] LGR 696, [2005] QB 37, [2004] 3 WLR 417.

R (on the application of ProLife Alliance) v BBC [2003] UKHL 23, [2003] 2 All ER 977, [2004] 1 AC 185, [2003] 2 WLR 1403.

R (on the application of Razgar) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] UKHL 27, [2004] 3 All ER 821, [2004] 2 AC 368, [2004] 3 WLR 58.

R (on the application of S) v Chief Constable of South Yorkshire, R (on the application of Marper) v Chief Constable of South Yorkshire [2004] UKHL 39, [2004] 4 All ER 193, [2004] 1 WLR 2196.

R (on the application of Simmons) v First Secretary of State [2005] EWCA Civ 1295, [2005] All ER (D) 51 (Nov).

R (on the application of Smith) v Barking and Dagenham London BC [2002] EWHC (Admin) 2400, [2002] All ER (D) 266 (Nov).

R (on the application of Tangney) v Governor of Elmley Prison, R (on the application of Francis) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] EWHC 2888 (Admin), [2004] All ER (D) 216 (Nov); affd [2005] EWCA Civ 1009, [2005] All ER (D) 458 (Jul), (2005) Times, 30 August.

R (on the application of Wells) v Secretary of State for Transport, Local Government and the Regions [2005] All ER (EC) 323, [2004] ECR I-723, ECJ.

R (on the application of Wilkinson) v Responsible Medical Officer, Broadmoor Hospital [2001] EWCA Civ 1545, (2001) 65 BMLR 15, [2002] 1 WLR 419.

R v Botmeh [2001] EWCA Crim 2226, [2002 1 WLR 531.

R v Devon CC, ex p Baker, R v Durham CC, ex p Curtis [1995] 1 All ER 73, CA.

R v DPP, ex p Kebeline, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi [1999] 4 All ER 801, [2000] 2 AC 326, [1999] 3 WLR 972.

R v Governor of Brockhill Prison, ex p Evans, R v Governor of Onley Young Offender Institution, Rugby, ex p Reid [1997] 1 All ER 439, [1997] QB 443, [1997] 2 WLR 236, DC.

R v Hillingdon London BC, ex p Royco Homes Ltd [1974] 2 All ER 643, [1974] QB 720, [1974] 2 WLR 805, DC.

R v International Stock Exchange of the UK and the Republic of Ireland Ltd, ex p Else (1982) Ltd, R v International Stock Exchange of the UK and the Republic of Ireland Ltd, ex p Roberts [1993] 1 All ER 420, [1993] QB 534, [1993] 2 WLR 70, CA.

R v Kansal (No 2) [2001] UKHL 62, [2002] 1 All ER 257, [2002] 2 AC 69, [2001] 3 WLR 1562.

R v Lyons [2002] UKHL 44, [2002] 4 All ER 1028, [2003] 1 AC 976, [2002] 3 WLR 1562.

Rajapakse v Fernando [1920] AC 892, [1920] All ER Rep Ext 832, PC.

Rees v UK [1993] 2 FCR 49, ECt HR.

Somerset CC v Isaacs [2002] EWHC 1014 (Admin).

South Bucks DC v Porter, Chichester DC v Searle, Wrexham County BC v Berry [2003] UKHL 26, [2003] 3 All ER 1, [2003] 2 AC 558, [2003] 2 WLR 1547; affg [2001] EWCA Civ 1549, [2002] 1 All ER 425, [2002] 1 WLR 1359.

Sporrong v Sweden (1983) 5 EHRR 35, [1982] ECHR 7151/75, ECt HR.

Stec v UK (2006) 20 BHRC 348, ECt HR.

Street v Mountford [1985] 2 All ER 289, [1985] AC 809, [1985] 2 WLR 877, HL.

Sunday Times v UK (1979) 2 EHRR 245, [1979] ECHR 6538/74, ECt HR.

Tower Hamlets London BC v Abdi (1992) 91 LGR 300, CA.

Trendtex Trading Corp v Central Bank of Nigeria [1977] 1 All ER 881, [1977] QB 529, [1977] 2 WLR 356, CA.

Tyrer v UK (1978) 2 EHRR 1, [1978] ECHR 5856/72, ECt HR.

Uganda Co (Holdings) Ltd v Government of Uganda [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep 481.

Uratemp Ventures Ltd v Collins [2001] UKHL 43, [2002] 1 All ER 46, [2002] 1 AC 301, [2001] 3 WLR 806; rvsg [2000] 1 EGLR 156, CA.
V v UK (1999) 30 EHRR 121, [1999] ECHR 24888/94, ECt HR.
Waverley BC v Hilden [1988] 1 All ER 807, [1988] 1 WLR 246.
Westminster City Council v Clarke [1992] 1 All ER 695, [1992] 2 AC 288, [1992] 2 WLR 229, HL.
Wiggins v UK (1978) 13 DR 40, E Com HR.
Wilson v First County Trust Ltd [2003] UKHL 40, [2003] 4 All ER 97, [2004] 1 AC 816, [2003] 3 WLR 568.
X v Germany (1956) 1 YB 202, E Com HR.
Zamir v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1980] 2 All ER 768, [1980] AC 930, [1980] 3 WLR 249, HL.

Appeals

Lambeth London Borough Council and another v Kay and others

The defendants Gavin Kay, William Gorman, Ian Peter Constantine, Cherry Barnett, Christopher Cole, Mieczyslaw Dymny and Thomas Greenhalgh appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee against the decision of the Court of Appeal (Auld, Latham and Arden LJJ) on 20 July 2004 ([2004] EWCA Civ 926, [2005] QB 352, [2004] 3 WLR 1396) dismissing their appeals against rulings by Judge Cooke in the Lambeth County Court on 13 December 2002 and 19 December 2003 on preliminary issues in claims against them by Lambeth London Borough Council for possession of residential properties occupied by them. The First Secretary of State intervened in the appeal and JUSTICE and LIBERTY intervened by written submissions only. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Scott of Foscote.

Leeds City Council v Price and others

The defendants Kim Maloney, Patrick Maloney (senior), Ellen Maloney, Patrick Maloney (junior) and Kathleen Maloney appealed against the decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR, Brooke and Sedley LJJ) ([2005] EWCA Civ 289, [2005] 3 All ER 573, [2005] 1 WLR 1825) dismissing their appeal against a decision of Judge Bush sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court on 25 October on a preliminary issue in proceedings brought by Leeds City Council against Sean Price, F Smith and persons unknown for possession of land at Spinkwell Lane, Wakefield. The appellants had defended those proceedings and subsequently been joined formally. The proceedings were transferred from the Leeds County Court to the High Court. The First Secretary of State intervened in the appeal and JUSTICE and LIBERTY intervened by written submissions only. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

Jan Luba QC, David Watkinson, Kelvin Rutledge and Alex Offer (instructed by Davies Gore Lomax, Leeds) for the Leeds appellants and (instructed by Nicholas & Co and Thomas & Co) for the Lambeth appellants.
Andrew Arden QC, Terence Gallivan and John McCafferty (instructed by Devonshires) for Lambeth.
Ashley Underwood QC and Thomas Tyson (instructed by Nicole Jackson, Leeds) for Leeds.
Philip Sales and Daniel Stilitz (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the First Secretary of State.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

8 March 2006. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, these appeals have been joined and heard together because they raise an important common issue on the scope and application of the right to respect for the home protected by art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) and the 1998 Act. The House is invited to reconsider and depart from its decision in Harrow London BC v Qazi [2003] UKHL 43, [2003] 4 All ER 461, [2004] 1 AC 983.

THE LAMBETH APPEAL

[2] The first (Lambeth) appeal also raises a discrete issue on the occupation status of the appellants as the result of transactions between the London Borough of Lambeth, the London and Quadrant Housing Trust and them over a period of years. On that issue, I have had the benefit of reading in draft the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Scott of Foscote, with which I am in complete agreement and to which I cannot usefully add. I need not repeat the facts summarised in his opinion. I take as the legal and factual premise of this opinion that, on termination by Lambeth of the headleases to Quadrant and notification by Quadrant to these appellants of that termination, the appellants' right to occupy their respective premises came to an end and they continued in occupation with no right to do so under the domestic property law of England and Wales.

[3] In July 2000 Mr Gorman (the second-named Lambeth appellant) brought an action against Lambeth seeking a declaration that he was a secure tenant. In August 2000 Lambeth began summary proceedings for possession against all these appellants including Mr Gorman. In his case, the claim was struck out as abusive, and Lambeth sought an order for possession by way of counterclaim. Since the other appellants were also seeking recognition as secure tenants, the issue was in each case the same.

[4] For detailed reasons given in his judgment dated 13 December 2002, Judge Roger Cooke resolved all the domestic property law issues against the appellants. The judge then heard argument on the appellants' alternative defence based on the convention and the 1998 Act and, following the decision of the House in Qazi's case, he struck it out. His decision on that ground (as on the domestic property law ground) was upheld by the Court of Appeal (Auld, Latham and Arden LJJ) ([2004] EWCA Civ 926, [2005] QB 352, [2004] 3 WLR 1396). Certain convention issues argued in the Court of Appeal have not been pursued in the House, and only the appellants' argument on art 8 remains for decision.

THE LEEDS APPEAL

[5] In the second (Leeds) appeal there is an additional issue, on the extent to which, if at all, our domestic rules of precedent are, or should be, modified to give effect to our obligations under the convention and the duties imposed on domestic courts by the 1998 Act.

[6] The respondent, Leeds City Council, is a local authority and the freehold owner of a recreation ground at Spinkwell Lane in Leeds. On about 24 May 2004 that land was occupied by travellers without the council's permission. By 2 June 2004 the first group of travellers had left but others had arrived. On 13 June these appellants (who are the Maloney family) moved onto the site. On 15 June the council issued proceedings for possession in the Leeds County Court. On 24 June, the return date on the claim form, the appellants attended and were represented. On 22 September the proceedings were transferred to the High Court. They had originally been issued against Mr Price, Mr Smith and persons unknown, but the Maloney family were the only occupiers to appear at court or contest the proceedings and they were formally joined as defendants on 18 October 2004 when the claim was heard.

[7] The council claimed possession as freehold owner against the appellants as trespassers. The appellants did not challenge the council's title, and they claimed no leave or licence to enter or occupy the land. They based their defence on art 8, averring that, although the statutory scheme for the protection of gipsy families, taken with the government guidance, was compatible with the convention, the council could not rely on this when it was itself in clear and substantial breach of its obligations under the scheme and the guidance. They also asserted that their personal circumstances and those of their immediate family were exceptional, and so required the council to justify evicting them.

[8] In making these allegations of breach against the council the appellants contended that the council—

> '(a) had not addressed the needs of the Gypsy population in its homelessness strategy at all, contrary to the Homelessness Act 2002 and the Government Guidance given thereupon. This was also averred to be in breach of its obligations under the Race Relations Act 1976; (b) had failed to deal adequately with the needs of the Gypsy community in its Unitary Development Plan. This was alleged to be contrary to both the Homelessness Act 2002 and the Government Guidance given thereupon and to be a breach of the Respondent's duties under the Race Relations Act 1976; (c) did not have a Race Relations Strategy which made any provision for the needs of the gypsy/traveller population; (d) had not complied with the Guidance given either in the 1998 DETR and Home Office publication, "Managing Unauthorised Camping: A Good Practice Guide" or that given in Circular 18/94.'

The appellants further submitted that these alleged failures had to be seen in context, namely that—

> '(a) the [council] had declined to consider additional site provision for the Gypsy community; despite the fact that this should be a key part of any homelessness strategy, and; (b) there was only one official site in the Leeds metropolitan area. This site was full and had a waiting list. Approximately 20% of the gypsy population of Leeds consequently lived on unauthorised encampments.'

The appellants further relied on a number of matters particular to them and at the date of trial:

> '(a) in the 12 months immediately prior to them moving onto the land at Spinkwell Lane the family had either been evicted or forced to move under the threat of eviction in excess of 50 times; (b) in May 2004 Kim Maloney had been admitted to the Leeds General Infirmary suffering from exhaustion and stress resulting directly from these regular moves. She had been in hospital for 2 nights; (c) Patrick Maloney (Senior) suffered from Alzheimer's disease. He was also affected by a serious head injury which he had sustained in a road traffic accident. He was unable to copy [sic] on his own and had significant memory loss and care needs; (d) Ellen Maloney suffered from depression and associated psychiatric problems as detailed in the report of Dr K. Rix. She also had mobility problems; (e) Ellen Elizabeth Maloney suffered from fits. She was hospitalised with pneumonia at the beginning of June 2004. She was only one year old. Her mother Kathleen Maloney was a single parent; (f) Patrick Maloney (Junior) had major mental health problems as a result of a serious head injury he sustained following a vicious assault on him on 4th July 1998. He was also blind in one eye following a further attack with broken glass. His mental health condition was variable and unpredictable; (g) there were 3 school age children residing on the site; (h) Patrick Maloney (Senior) had just been treated as an inpatient at the Leeds General Infirmary for a gall bladder problem. He was admitted to the hospital on 9th July 2004. He was awaiting further admission and treatment; (i) Patrick Maloney (Junior) had recently suffered from bowel problems and had been treated as an inpatient at St James' hospital for about 3 weeks. He was awaiting further investigations.'

[9] Before the trial, by a letter dated 8 October 2004, the council had formally notified the appellants that they had been found to be unintentionally homeless and in priority need, and had accepted a duty to help them secure accommodation. The appellants at trial contended that in all the circumstances an order for possession was neither necessary nor proportionate. The council replied that it had an absolute right to possession, that the 1998 Act had no application to the case and that the court had no need to consider questions of necessity, justification or proportionality. It had been agreed that the question whether art 8 of the convention could in law provide the appellants with a defence to the council's claim for possession should be resolved as a preliminary issue and on the trial date Judge Bush, sitting as a judge of the High Court, heard submissions and reserved his decision.

[10] On 25 October 2004 the judge gave judgment resolving the preliminary issue in the council's favour. Holding himself bound by the decision of the House in Qazi's case and that of the Court of Appeal in the Lambeth appeal, he held that the council's contractual and proprietary claim to possession could not be defeated or qualified by art 8. He made an order for possession forthwith, and refused a stay of execution, but granted leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal.

[11] After this order the appellants left the site. But they appealed to the Court of Appeal (Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR, Brooke and Sedley LJJ), which on 16 March 2005 dismissed the appeal ([2005] EWCA Civ 289, [2005] 3 All ER 573, [2005] 1 WLR 1825). The court held that it was bound by the decision of the House in Qazi's case. But it considered that decision to be incompatible with a later decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639 and granted the appellants leave to appeal to the House.

MR QAZI'S CASE

[12] The facts of this case were summarised by four members of the House ([2003] 4 All ER 461 at [2], [3], [40]–[44], [90]–[92], [112]–[114]), and were of the simplest. The local authority were the freehold owners of a house which they let to Mr Qazi and his wife as joint tenants. After some six years she left, with their daughter, and she gave notice to quit, which brought the tenancy to an end.

He applied to the local authority for the grant of a tenancy to him alone, but this was refused. The authority issued proceedings for possession, which he resisted. He had married another wife in an Islamic ceremony before the proceedings began, and was later living at the house with her and her young son. He based his resistance to the claim for possession on the right to respect for his home, protected by art 8 of the convention, to which effect in the domestic law of the United Kingdom was given by the 1998 Act. Article 8 provides:

> '1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
>
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.'

[13] In the House there were said to be two issues and a third potential issue (at [6]), and there was no difference of opinion on the formulation of the issues (at [28]). They were (1) whether, when proceedings were issued and possession was ordered, the house was Mr Qazi's home within the meaning of that expression in art 8 and, if so, (2) whether what the local authority did or proposed to do infringed his right to respect for his home. If those questions were answered in Mr Qazi's favour, there arose the issue whether the local authority's action or proposed action was justified.

[14] At first instance, the recorder answered the first question in the local authority's favour and adversely to Mr Qazi. He held that because Mr Qazi had no legal or equitable right in the house, it was not his home and art 8 was not engaged. He did not, therefore, address the remaining questions. The correctness of this answer to the first question was the main focus of debate in the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 1834, [2002] HLR 276) and in the House ([2003] 4 All ER 461 at [29] per Lord Steyn). But the Court of Appeal unanimously took a different view, and a clear view was expressed by the House (at [11], [26], [68], [95], [99], [110]) that the premises had at the relevant times been Mr Qazi's home within the autonomous meaning of that expression in art 8.

[15] A majority of members of the House, and perhaps all members, held in answer to the second question that there had on the facts been an interference by a public authority with Mr Qazi's right to respect for his home. That was my conclusion (at [24]) and that of Lord Steyn (at [30]–[33]). Lord Hope of Craighead (at [70]) and Lord Millett (at [103]) were, as I understand them, of the same opinion. Lord Scott (at [149]) would for his part have ruled that art 8 was not in the circumstances applicable, but he also expressed agreement with Lord Hope and Lord Millett.

[16] There was, however, a clear difference of opinion among the members of the House. In a case such as Mr Qazi's where a public authority had an unqualified right to possession under domestic property law, Lord Hope (at [83]) did not consider art 8 to be irrelevant but held (at [78], [83]) that art 8(2) is satisfied where domestic property law gives an unqualified right to possession. He concluded (at [84]) that contractual and proprietary rights to possession cannot be defeated by a defence based on art 8. Lord Millett was of a similar opinion (at [100]): art 8 was engaged, but save in wholly exceptional circumstances there would be no lack of respect and no infringement of art 8, where an order is made in favour of a person entitled to possession under domestic property law (see [107]). Lord Scott echoed this view in holding that art 8 cannot be raised to defeat contractual and proprietary rights to possession. Lord Steyn and I, dissenting, were of opinion that where, as in that case, there was a proposed interference with a person's right to respect for his home, the question of justification, if raised, did fall to be considered (see [24], [26]), even though considerations of domestic property law were likely to be crucial (see [12]) and the occasions on which a court would be justified in declining to make a possession order would, as the parties agreed, be very highly exceptional (see [25]).

THE COURT OF APPEAL DECISIONS UNDER APPEAL

[17] In its judgment on the Lambeth appeal [2005] QB 352, the Court of Appeal first considered at length and in detail the private law issues raised by the appellants, resolving them in favour of the local authority, as the House concludes, rightly. The court then turned to the art 8 issue and (at [93]) the decision of the House in Qazi's case, and stated what it understood to be the ratio of the majority. It said (at [98]):

> 'The majority opinions are based, it seems to us, on the logic that the incidents of the domestic law of landlord and tenant provide the answer to the question whether or not, in any case, the interference with the person's home is justified under article 8(2) . . .'

It added (at [100]):

> '. . . The fact is that Lambeth has an unqualified right to possession. And on the basis of the majority opinions in Qazi's case by which we are bound, that is a sufficient answer to the claim under article 8 . . .'

Thus the appellant's art 8 claim was bound to fail. After reserving judgment, the court received the judgment of the European Court in Connors v UK (see [20], [22], below). It heard no oral argument on the significance of that decision, but concluded (at [106]) that it could not affect its assessment of the decision of the House in Qazi's case and that it was of assistance to United Kingdom courts only in relation to cases involving gipsies.

[18] In its judgment on the Leeds appeal ([2005] 3 All ER 573), the Court of Appeal (at [13]) again summarised the ratio of the majority in Qazi's case:

> 'Thus all three of the majority held that, under the Strasbourg jurisprudence, the exercise of an absolute proprietary right to possession could not infringe art 8. Implicit in this conclusion was the premise that the English domestic law which conferred the absolute right to possession was, itself, compatible with convention rights . . .'

The court then reviewed the compatibility of the majority reasoning in Qazi's case with the decision of the European Court in Connors v UK and concluded (at [26]):

> 'The decision in Connors v UK is unquestionably incompatible with the proposition that the exercise by a public authority of an unqualified proprietary right under domestic law to repossess its land will never constitute an interference with the occupier's right to respect for his home, or will always be justified under art 8(2). To that extent Connors v UK is incompatible with Qazi's case . . .'

The court considered (at [27], [28]) the earlier judgment of the court in the Lambeth appeal, but did not consider (at [29]) that the reasoning of the European Court in Connors v UK could be confined to the treatment of gipsies and accordingly accepted (at [30]) the appellants' submission that Connors v UK was incompatible with Qazi's case.

THE STRASBOURG JURISPRUDENCE

[19] In their opinions in Qazi's case the members of the House analysed what were then the leading Strasbourg authorities pertaining to the right to respect for the home, although the majority and the minority drew different inferences from them: contrast the opinions of Lord Hope (at [78]), Lord Millett (at [103], [104]) and Lord Scott (at [125], [146], [149]) with those of myself (at [20], [23]) and Lord Steyn (at [30]). S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274, to which my noble and learned friend Lord Hope attaches much significance, was an early admissibility decision of the European Commission of Human Rights on which the court has never, to my knowledge, relied in any later case. It would, in my opinion, serve no useful purpose to repeat this analysis, since if matters rested where they did when Qazi's case was decided the majority interpretation of the Strasbourg jurisprudence would be bound to prevail, whatever reservations there may have been in the minds of some, at the time, about its correctness. It is, however, argued by the appellants, with strong support by the First Secretary of State as intervener, that matters do not rest where they did when Qazi's case was decided, since two cases have since been decided by the European Court which are inconsistent with the ratio of the majority in Qazi's case and support the approach of the minority. Those decisions are Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639 and Blecic v Croatia (2005) 41 EHRR 185.

[20] The facts of these two cases were quite different. Mr Connors and his family had lived as licensees on a local authority gipsy site for most of the preceding 16 years when, in January 2000, they were given notice to quit. This notice was prompted by complaints about the behaviour on the site of some members of the applicant's family or their guests, which was said to be a breach of the licence conditions. The applicant did not leave, and proceedings were brought for possession. He sought to challenge the authority's decision to initiate proceedings by judicial review, but permission was refused. The authority's complaints of misbehaviour were strongly denied by the applicant, and so the authority dropped these complaints and relied instead on its right to terminate the applicant's licence on notice, which had been given. There was no answer to this claim under English domestic property law. A possession order was accordingly made, and some weeks later the applicant and his family and their caravans and possessions were forcibly removed from the site.

[21] In Blecic v Croatia the applicant had for nearly 40 years before 1992 been a specially-protected tenant of a publicly-owned flat in Zadar. Under the domestic property law of Croatia a specially-protected tenancy might be terminated if the tenant ceased to occupy the flat for a continuous period of six months, but termination might not be effected on that ground if the tenant's failure to use the flat was attributable to medical treatment, military service or 'other justified reasons'. The applicant left Zadar in July 1991 to visit her daughter in Rome. War then intervened, conditions in Zadar were bad, and the applicant did not return until May 1992, by which time another occupant had, without permission, moved into the flat. In February 1992 the local authority had already initiated proceedings to terminate the tenancy. The applicant claimed that she had had justified reasons for not using the flat, and this argument was accepted by an intermediate court, but it was rejected at first instance and, finally, by the Supreme Court. Thus, without justified reasons, the applicant had no grounds for resisting the termination of her tenancy.

[22] It was agreed in Connors v UK (at 658 (para 68)) and held in Blecic v Croatia (at 194 (para 52)) that the premises in question were, for purposes of art 8, the applicant's home. It was agreed in Connors v UK (at 658 (para 68)) and held in Blecic v Croatia (at 195 (para 54)) that the facts disclosed an interference with the applicant's right to respect for his and her home. Under the domestic property law of the two jurisdictions there was no arguable defence to either claim (in Blecic v Croatia, once she had been found to have no justified reasons). But in each case the court went on to consider, at some length, the excepting conditions in art 8. In Connors v UK (at 659 (para 69)) it was agreed, and in Blecic v Croatia (at 195 (paras 57, 58)) it was held, that the interference had a legitimate aim. In each case the crux was whether the interference was necessary in a democratic society, namely whether the interference answered a pressing social need and was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued (see Connors v UK at 662 (para 81), Blecic v Croatia at 195–196 (para 59)). These are matters which would not have fallen for consideration at all if a clear answer given by domestic property law were decisive. As it was, the court devoted 14 paragraphs of its judgment in Connors v UK to this aspect and 11 paragraphs of its judgment in Blecic v Croatia. It reached differing conclusions in the two cases. In ruling against the United Kingdom in Connors v UK the court took account of the nature of the rights involved in the case (at 662 (para 82)), the procedural safeguards available to the individual (at 663 (para 83)), the vulnerable position of gipsies as a minority whose way of life member states are positively obliged to facilitate (at 663 (para 84)) and the disadvantageous position of gipsies on local authority as opposed to privately-owned sites (at 647–648, 664–665 (paras 43–46, 87–90)). It concluded that judicial review was not an adequate safeguard (at 665–666 (para 92)) and that (at 666–667 (para 95))—

> 'the eviction of the applicant and his family from the local authority site was not attended by the requisite procedural safeguards, namely the requirement to establish proper justification for the serious interference with his rights and consequently cannot be regarded as justified by a "pressing social need" or proportionate to the legitimate aim being pursued. There has, accordingly, been a violation of art 8 of the convention.'

Reaching a different conclusion in Blecic v Croatia, the court respected the margin of appreciation accorded to national authorities (at 196–197 (paras 64–65)) and found (at 198 (paras 68–70)) that the applicant had had a fair opportunity to put forward her views and resist the claim made against her.

[23] The decision of the House in Qazi's case was not cited in Connors v UK, perhaps because the majority reasoning was inconsistent with the basis on which the United Kingdom's case was put (and had been put on earlier occasions such as Howard v UK (1987) 9 EHRR 116, P v UK App No 14751/89 (12 December 1990, unreported) and Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48 and, domestically, in St Brice v Southwark London BC [2001] EWCA Civ 1138, [2002] LGR 117, [2002] 1 WLR 1537). The respondents, however, place considerable reliance on the fact that when Mr Qazi sought to apply to Strasbourg to complain of a violation of his art 8 right his application was declared inadmissible. From the very brief reasons given, the respondents infer approval of the majority's reasoning. The Court of Appeal in the Leeds case discounted the significance of this finding ([2005] 3 All ER 573 at [15]), and the House itself has been at pains over the years to make plain that the refusal of leave does not necessarily import approval of the reasoning of the judgment which it is sought to challenge. It may have been thought, as the Qazi minority certainly thought, that Mr Qazi was most unlikely to win even if his case were remitted to the county court, and his case may have had more in common with earlier cases held inadmissible because the justification was obvious than cases such as Connors v UK and Blecic v Croatia. I do not, in any event, think that any reliable inference can be drawn from the finding of inadmissibility made against Mr Qazi's application.

[24] The respondents sought in argument to explain Connors v UK, as the Court of Appeal did in its Lambeth judgment, as a case turning on the special position of gipsies. This is, in my opinion, partly right and partly wrong. It is right in as much as the position of Mr Connors and his family as members of a vulnerable minority, to whom the state owed a positive obligation, and who had inadequate means of protecting their rights in domestic law, founded the court's finding in their favour on the issue of necessity in a democratic society (ie pressing social need and proportionality). It is wrong in so far as it is relied on to support the majority reasoning in Qazi's case: for on that reasoning the applicants' lack of any proprietary interest whatever under domestic property law would have effectively concluded the case against them, without any need to explore questions of necessity, pressing social need and proportionality. The Court of Appeal in its Leeds judgment (at [29]) was in my opinion correct to hold that the reasoning in Connors v UK could not be confined to the treatment of gipsies.

[25] The appellants point out that in Connors v UK both the applicability of art 8 and an act of interference by a public authority were conceded by the United Kingdom. This is correct, as noted in [22], above. But the Court of Appeal in its Leeds judgment (at [25]) rejected the suggestion that the decision was founded on the concession, and thought it clear that the court considered the concession to have been rightly made. I agree. It is also clear that if either of the two cases now before the House were to reach Strasbourg the same concessions would be made (subject, in the Leeds case, to the prior contention that the premises were not the appellants' home: see [48], below).

[26] The Court of Appeal in its Leeds judgment (at [26]) was in my view right to hold that the decision in Connors v UK is 'unquestionably incompatible' with the majority ratio of Qazi's case. It does not appear that Blecic v Croatia was cited to the Court of Appeal: had it been, it could only have fortified the court in the correctness of its conclusion.

THE APPLICATION OF THE STRASBOURG JURISPRUDENCE

[27] The appellants contended, with strong support from the First Secretary of State, that: (1) the majority ratio in Qazi's case should be modified to take account of the later Strasbourg jurisprudence, particularly Connors v UK and Blecic v Croatia; (2) defendants to possession proceedings brought by public authorities should be permitted in principle to raise an art 8 defence in those proceedings; (3) defendants should be permitted to raise such defences in the county court in the possession proceedings and should not be required to raise such defences in separate proceedings for judicial review, and (4) such a procedure would not in practice impose an excessive or unsustainable burden on the administration of justice in the county courts. Each of these contentions was challenged by the respondents, and each of them is important.

[28] The mandatory duty imposed on domestic courts by s 2 of the 1998 Act is to take into account any judgment of the Strasbourg Court and any opinion of the Commission. Thus they are not strictly required to follow Strasbourg rulings, as they are bound by s 3(1) of the European Communities Act 1972 and as they are bound by the rulings of superior courts in the domestic curial hierarchy. But by s 6 of the 1998 Act it is unlawful for domestic courts, as public authorities, to act in a way which is incompatible with a convention right such as a right arising under art 8. There are isolated occasions (of which R v Spear, R v Boyd, R v Saunby [2002] UKHL 31 at [12], [92], [2002] 3 All ER 1074 at [12], [92], [2003] 1 AC 734, is an example) when a domestic court may challenge the application by the Strasbourg Court of the principles it has expounded to the detailed facts of a particular class of case peculiarly within the knowledge of national authorities. The 1998 Act gives it scope to do so. But it is ordinarily the clear duty of our domestic courts, save where and so far as constrained by primary domestic legislation, to give practical recognition to the principles laid down by the Strasbourg Court as governing the convention rights specified in s 1(1) of the 1998 Act. That court is the highest judicial authority on the interpretation of those rights, and the effectiveness of the convention as an international instrument depends on the loyal acceptance by member states of the principles it lays down. In the present instance the governing principle is now clear, and gives fair effect to the right to respect for his home which everyone is entitled to enjoy under art 8(1). That provision does not, as has been repeatedly and rightly held, guarantee a right to a home or the right to have one's housing problems solved by the authorities: see Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48 at 72 (para 99), Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175 at 179, O'Rourke v UK App No 39022/97 (26 June 2001, unreported). But it does guarantee a right to respect for the place where a person lives if his links with that place are close enough and continuous enough (see Buckley v UK (1997) 23 EHRR 101 at 115 (para 63), Mabey v UK (1996) 22 EHRR CD 123 at 124, O'Rourke v UK above) to make it proper to regard that place as his home. To evict or seek to evict a person from such a place is to interfere with his exercise of his art 8(1) right, as the House held in reliance on Strasbourg and other authority in Qazi's case. Article 8(2) forbids such interference by a public authority unless the excepting conditions are satisfied. Compliance with domestic property law is a necessary excepting condition but not a sufficient one, since the other conditions must also be met, notably that the interference must answer a pressing social need and be proportionate to the legitimate aim which it is sought to achieve. This must now be recognised as the correct principle. In stating it, I enter the same important reservation as in Qazi's case [2003] 4 All ER 461 at [23]: nothing in this opinion should be understood as applying to any landlord or owner which is not a public authority. Competing submissions were made on this point. It does not arise for decision in these appeals. It is best left for resolution in a case where it arises.

[29] It necessarily follows, in my judgment, that where a public authority seeks to evict a person from premises (which may be land where a traveller has pitched his caravan) which he occupies as his home, that person must be given a fair opportunity to contend that the excepting conditions in art 8(2) have not been met on the facts of his case. I do not accept, as the appellants argued, that the public authority must from the outset plead and prove that the possession order sought is justified. That would, in the overwhelming majority of cases, be burdensome and futile. It is enough for the public authority to assert its claim in accordance with domestic property law. If the occupier wishes to raise an art 8 defence to prevent or defer the making of a possession order it is for him to do so and the public authority must rebut the claim if, and to the extent that, it is called upon to do so. In the overwhelming majority of cases this will be in no way burdensome. In rare and exceptional cases it will not be futile.

[30] The respondents submitted that if, on art 8 grounds, an occupier wishes to resist a claim for possession valid under domestic property law, the proper medium for such a challenge is an application for judicial review and the proper venue the Administrative Court and not the county court. That is the proper forum in which a challenge to an exercise of public power by a public authority should be resolved. If this were a correct submission it would have to be accepted, but it would have very unfortunate procedural consequences. It would lead to the adjournment of the county court proceedings while application was made for permission to apply for judicial review. Even if permission were refused, as would almost always be the case, there would be additional expense and delay, preventing summary disposal of the matter in the county court. The occupier would be restricted to a procedure not well-adapted or routinely used for the resolution of sensitive factual questions and to a court traditionally and rightly reluctant to explore the merits of an apparently lawful decision, as it proved to be in Connors v UK. But in my opinion it is not a correct submission. Effect must be given to s 7(1)(b) of the 1998 Act, which provides:

> '(1) A person who claims that a public authority has acted (or proposes to act) in a way which is made unlawful by section 6(1) [ie in a way which is incompatible with a convention right] may . . . (b) rely on the Convention right or rights concerned in any legal proceedings, but only if he is (or would be) a victim of the unlawful act.'

This is express authority entitling the occupier to raise his art 8 challenge to the possession order sought against him in those proceedings. It is consistent with authorities such as Wandsworth London BC v Winder [1984] 3 All ER 976, [1985] AC 461 and Boddington v British Transport Police [1998] 2 All ER 203, [1999] 2 AC 143, and respects the principle that if other means of redress are conveniently and effectively available to a party they ought ordinarily to be used before resort to judicial review: see, for example, R v Huntingdon DC, ex p Cowan [1984] 1 All ER 58 at 63, [1984] 1 WLR 501 at 507. Where a party seeks relief, on conventional judicial review grounds, which only the Administrative Court can grant, there will, of course, be no alternative to an application for judicial review, but that will very rarely, if ever, be the case where an occupier seeks to resist a possession order in reliance on art 8.

[31] The respondents contended that if the approach indicated above were given practical effect the result would be to dislocate the conduct of housing claims in the county court, distort local authority housing policies and budgets, and upset the important compromises inherent in our property law and housing legislation. The appellants, supported by the First Secretary of State, strongly challenged this prediction, while accepting that the threshold for relying successfully on art 8 in response to an otherwise well-founded possession claim should be very high and that the number of successful defendants would be minimal. This is an important aspect of these appeals, and one that has caused the House much concern.

[32] The respondents insisted on the relevance of three principles which are very familiar but are, indeed, fundamental. The first is that the Strasbourg authorities routinely accord a wide margin of appreciation to the national authorities of member states, not least in the context of both art 8 and art 1 of the First Protocol. While in some situations (such as that in Connors v UK) the margin is treated as narrower than in some other situations, and the court reserves to itself the power of final review, this principle is undoubtedly correct. So is the closely-allied second principle, that the Strasbourg authorities generally respect, subject to similar qualifications, decisions made by democratically-elected assemblies following public debate. So too is the third principle, that inherent in the whole of the convention is a search for balance between the rights of the individual and the wider rights of the society to which he belongs, neither enjoying any absolute right to prevail over the other. It is unnecessary to cite authority for propositions so well established and understood.

[33] The third of these principles has obvious relevance in a context such as that giving rise to these appeals. For the general property law of England and Wales has developed over the centuries reconciling the rights and interests, sometimes in harmony, sometimes conflicting, of owners, landlords and licensors on one hand and occupiers, tenants and licensees on the other. Over the last century or so, this general property law has been overlaid by a mass of very detailed, very specific housing legislation. Giving the House the benefit of their great expertise, the respondents' counsel drew attention to, among other examples, secure tenancies, introductory tenancies, demoted tenancies, assured tenancies, assured shorthold tenancies and demoted assured shorthold tenancies, all of them created or to a greater or lesser extent regulated by statute. Most of these statutes (and further examples could readily be given) were no doubt prompted by recognition that housing (in which expression I include pitches on which travellers may lawfully pitch their caravans) is a scarce and in the short term finite commodity. The demand for housing at a reasonable price is greater than the supply. This of course means that security of tenure for A means a denial of accommodation for B, recognition of a right for C to succeed to a tenancy means there is no tenancy for D, an extension of time granted to E defers the date when F can find somewhere to live. Our housing legislation strikes a balance between the competing claims to which scarcity gives rise, taking account, no doubt imperfectly but as well as may be, of the human, social and economic considerations involved. And it is, of course, to housing authorities such as the respondents that Parliament has entrusted the power of managing and allocating the local authority housing stock and the pitches on local authority gipsy sites.

[34] Under some statutory regimes, as where discretionary grounds are relied on to terminate a secure tenancy under the Housing Act 1985, the court may make an order for possession only where, other conditions for making such an order being met, the court thinks it reasonable to do so. This enables the court to take account of all circumstances which it judges to be relevant. If, in any case covered by such a regime, the statutory conditions are satisfied and the court does, on consideration of all the circumstances, think it reasonable to make a possession order, the court will in effect have undertaken the very assessment which art 8(2) requires. In such a situation art 8(2) adds nothing of substance to the protection which the occupier already enjoys.

[35] Under some statutory regimes the court may be required to make an order for possession if certain prescribed conditions are met and there is no overriding requirement that the court considers it reasonable or just to make such an order. The statutory scheme is none the less likely to satisfy the art 8(2) requirement of proportionality if it is clear that the statutory scheme represents a democratic solution to the problems inherent in housing allocation. Thus in Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue [2001] EWCA Civ 595 at [69], [2001] 4 All ER 604 at [69], [2002] QB 48, the Court of Appeal found no breach of art 8(2) in the use of s 21(4) of the Housing Act 1988, as amended, to gain possession of an assured shorthold tenancy granted to a person who had been intentionally homeless, because Parliament had intended to give preference to the needs of those dependent on social housing as a whole over those who, like the tenant, had been intentionally homeless. Similarly, in R (on the application of McLellan) v Bracknell Forest BC, Reigate and Banstead BC v Benfield [2001] EWCA Civ 1510 at [63], [2002] 1 All ER 899 at [63], [2002] QB 1129, the Court of Appeal found no breach of art 8 where a housing authority determined the introductory tenancies of tenants whose rent was in arrears under s 127(2) of the Housing Act 1996, since Parliament had decided that it was necessary in the interest of tenants generally and the local authorities to have a scheme whereby, during the first 12 months, tenants were on probation and could be evicted without long battles in the county court, there being (it was held) adequate procedural safeguards. The Court of Appeal took a similar approach when holding, in Sheffield City Council v Smart, Central Sunderland Housing Co Ltd v Wilson [2002] EWCA Civ 04 at [37], [2002] LGR 467 at [37], that Parliament clearly enacted the relevant statutory provisions upon the premise that while a tenant is housed as a homeless person he enjoys no security of tenure. See also Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271 at [63], [78], [2002] 4 All ER 1136 at [63], [78], [2003] 1 WLR 617. Where a statutory scheme covers the case of an occupier, and conditions are prescribed for obtaining possession, and those conditions are met, it will only be in highly exceptional circumstances that the occupier will gain additional protection from art 8.

[36] There are of course some cases (of which the present cases are examples) in which the relationship between public authority owner or landlord and individual tenant or occupier is not governed by any statutory scheme. But possession may be sought on expiry of the period for which the right to occupy was granted, or because the notice required by domestic property law to bring that term to an end has been given, or because one or more of the conditions on which the right to occupy was granted has been broken. It cannot be said that the relationship between the parties in such cases is the subject of a balance struck by Parliament, but it is not unrealistic to regard the general law as striking such a balance. The public authority owner or landlord has, broadly speaking, a right to manage and control its property within bounds set by statute. The occupier acquires a right, but only a limited right, to occupy. On due determination of that interest, a claim for possession must ordinarily succeed, since any indulgence to the occupier necessarily derogates from the property right of the public authority, whose rights are also entitled to respect. It is not therefore surprising that in P v UK App No 14751/89 (12 December 1990, unreported) and Ure v UK App No 28027/95 (27 November 1996, unreported), the occupiers' complaints were held to be inadmissible because the public authority's interference or assumed interference was held to be clearly justified. It would, again, require highly exceptional circumstances before art 8 would avail the occupiers. The peculiar facts and circumstances of Connors v UK could fairly be regarded as crossing that high threshold, given the positive obligation to which reference is made in [24], above.

[37] Rarely, if ever, could this test be satisfied where squatters occupy the land of a public authority which they do not and (unlike Connors v UK) never have had any right to occupy, and the public authority acts timeously to evict them. The public look to public authorities to preserve their land for public purposes and to bring unlawful occupation to an end, with the environmental hazards it is likely to entail. CPR 55.5(2) and 55.6 provide for the summary removal of squatters. The rule in McPhail v persons, names unknown [1973] 3 All ER 393, [1973] Ch 447 must, in my opinion, be relaxed in order to comply with art 8, but it is very hard to imagine circumstances in which a court could properly give squatters of the kind described above anything more than a very brief respite.

[38] I do not think it possible or desirable to attempt to define what facts or circumstances might rank as highly exceptional. The practical experience of county court judges is likely to prove the surest guide, provided always that the stringency of the test is borne in mind. They are well used to exercising their judgment under existing statutory schemes and will recognise a highly exceptional case when they see it. I do not, however, consider that problems and afflictions of a personal nature should avail the occupier where there are public services available to address and alleviate those problems, and if under the relevant social legislation the occupier is specifically disentitled from eligibility for relief it will be necessary to consider the democratic judgment reflected in that provision. Nor can art 8 avail a tenant, otherwise perhaps than for a very brief period, if he can be appropriately accommodated elsewhere (whether publicly or privately). Where, as notably in the case of gipsies, scarcity of land adversely affects many members of the class, an art 8(2) defence could only, I think, succeed if advanced by a member of the class who had grounds for complaint substantially stronger than members of the class in general.

[39] The practical position, in future, in possession proceedings can be briefly summarised as follows. (1) It is not necessary for a local authority to plead or prove in every case that domestic law complies with art 8. Courts should proceed on the assumption that domestic law strikes a fair balance and is compatible with art 8. (2) If the court, following its usual procedures, is satisfied that the domestic law requirements for making a possession order have been met the court should make a possession order unless the occupier shows that, highly exceptionally, he has a seriously arguable case on one of two grounds. (3) The two grounds are: (a) that the law which requires the court to make a possession order despite the occupier's personal circumstances is convention-incompatible; and (b) that, having regard to the occupier's personal circumstances, the local authority's exercise of its power to seek a possession order is an unlawful act within the meaning of s 6. (4) Deciding whether the defendant has a seriously arguable case on one or both of these grounds will not call for a full-blown trial. This question should be decided summarily, on the basis of an affidavit or of the defendant's defence, suitably particularised, or in whatever other summary way the court considers appropriate. The procedural aim of the court must be to decide this question as expeditiously as is consistent with the defendant having a fair opportunity to present his case on this question. (5) If the court considers the defence sought to be raised on one or both of these grounds is not seriously arguable the court should proceed to make a possession order. (6) Where a seriously arguable issue on one of these grounds is raised, the court should itself decide this issue, subject to this: where an issue arises on the application of s 3 the judge should consider whether it may be appropriate to refer the proceedings to the High Court.

PRECEDENT

[40] Reference has already been made to the duty imposed on United Kingdom courts to take Strasbourg judgments and opinions into account and to the unlawfulness of courts, as public authorities, acting incompatibly with convention rights. The questions accordingly arise whether our domestic rules of precedent are, or should be modified; whether a court which would ordinarily be bound to follow the decision of another court higher in the domestic curial hierarchy is, or should be, no longer bound to follow that decision if it appears to be inconsistent with a later ruling of the Court in Strasbourg. The Court of Appeal concluded, at [33] of its judgment on the Leeds appeal, that the only permissible course was to follow the decision of the House in Qazi's case, despite finding that it was incompatible with Connors v UK, but to give permission, if sought and not successfully opposed, to appeal to the House, and in that way to take the decision in Connors v UK into account.

[41] The House has had the benefit of carefully considered submissions on this issue. In a written case submitted on behalf of JUSTICE and LIBERTY as interveners it is contended that the lower court is free to follow, and barring some special circumstances should follow, the later Strasbourg ruling where four conditions are met, namely (1) the Strasbourg ruling has been given since the domestic ruling on the point at issue, (2) the Strasbourg ruling has established a clear and authoritative interpretation of convention rights based (where applicable) on an accurate understanding of United Kingdom law, (3) the Strasbourg ruling is necessarily inconsistent with the earlier domestic judicial decision, and (4) the inconsistent domestic decision was or is not dictated by the terms of primary legislation, so as to fall within s 6(2) of the 1998 Act. The appellants' formulation was to very much the same effect, although they did not suggest that the domestic court should follow the Strasbourg ruling, only that it might; they emphasised that the inconsistency between the otherwise binding domestic decision and the later Strasbourg ruling should be very clear; and they elaborated somewhat the conditions pertaining to primary domestic legislation. The First Secretary of State, after a judicious review of the arguments for and against the Court of Appeal's approach, favoured a (strictly circumscribed) relaxation of the doctrine of precedent in the circumstances of the Leeds appeal. He proposed that a lower court should be entitled to depart from an otherwise binding domestic decision where there is a clearly inconsistent subsequent decision of the Strasbourg Court on the same point. But the inconsistency must be clear. A mere tension or possible inconsistency would not entitle a lower court to depart from binding domestic precedent. The respondent gave a guarded answer. A lower court may decline to follow binding domestic authority in the limited circumstances where it decides that the higher courts are bound to resile from that authority in the light of subsequent Strasbourg jurisprudence.

[42] While adherence to precedent has been derided by some, at any rate since the time of Bentham, as a recipe for the perpetuation of error, it has been a cornerstone of our legal system. Even when, in 1966, the House modified, in relation to its own practice, the rule laid down in London Tramways Co v LCC [1898] AC 375, it described the use of precedent as—

> 'an indispensable foundation upon which to decide what is the law and its application to individual cases. It provides at least some degree of certainty upon which individuals can rely in the conduct of their affairs, as well as a basis for orderly development of legal rules.' (See Practice Statement (Judicial Precedent) [1966] 3 All ER 77.)

The House made plain that this modification was not intended to affect the use of precedent elsewhere than in the House, and the infrequency with which the House has exercised its freedom to depart from its own decisions testifies to the importance its attaches to the principle. The strictures of Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC in Cassell & Co Ltd v Broome [1972] 1 All ER 801 at 808–810, [1972] AC 1027 at 1053–1055, are too well known to call for repetition. They remain highly pertinent.

[43] The present appeals illustrate the potential pitfalls of a rule based on a finding of clear inconsistency. The appellants, the First Secretary of State and the Court of Appeal in the Leeds case find a clear inconsistency between Qazi's case and Connors v UK. The respondents and the Court of Appeal in the Lambeth case find no inconsistency. Some members of the House take one view, some the other. The prospect arises of different county court and High Court judges, and even different divisions of the Court of Appeal, taking differing views of the same issue. As Lord Hailsham observed ([1972] 1 All ER 801 at 809, [1972] AC 1027 at 1054), 'in legal matters, some degree of certainty is at least as valuable a part of justice as perfection'. That degree of certainty is best achieved by adhering, even in the convention context, to our rules of precedent. It will of course be the duty of judges to review convention arguments addressed to them, and if they consider a binding precedent to be, or possibly to be, inconsistent with Strasbourg authority, they may express their views and give leave to appeal, as the Court of Appeal did here. Leap-frog appeals may be appropriate. In this way, in my opinion, they discharge their duty under the 1998 Act. But they should follow the binding precedent, as again the Court of Appeal did here.

[44] There is a more fundamental reason for adhering to our domestic rule. The effective implementation of the convention depends on constructive collaboration between the Strasbourg Court and the national courts of member states. The Strasbourg Court authoritatively expounds the interpretation of the rights embodied in the convention and its protocols, as it must if the convention is to be uniformly understood by all member states. But in its decisions on particular cases the Strasbourg Court accords a margin of appreciation, often generous, to the decisions of national authorities and attaches much importance to the peculiar facts of the case. Thus it is for national authorities, including national courts particularly, to decide in the first instance how the principles expounded in Strasbourg should be applied in the special context of national legislation, law, practice and social and other conditions. It is by the decisions of national courts that the domestic standard must be initially set, and to those decisions the ordinary rules of precedent should apply.

[45] To this rule I would make one partial exception. In its judgment on the Leeds appeal (at [33]), the Court of Appeal said:

> 'In D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust, K v Dewsbury Healthcare NHS Trust, K v Oldham NHS Trust [2003] EWCA Civ 1151, [2003] 4 All ER 796, [2004] QB 558 this court held that the decision of the House of Lords in X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633 could not survive the introduction of the 1998 Act. This was, however, because the effect of the 1998 Act had undermined the policy consideration that had largely dictated the House of Lords' decision. Departing from the House of Lords decision in those circumstances has attracted some academic criticism. It remains to see whether this will be echoed by the House itself.'

When that case reached the House, no criticism of the Court of Appeal's bold course was expressed, the House agreed that the policy considerations which had founded its decision in X v Bedfordshire had been very largely eroded and it was accepted that that decision was no longer good law: [2005] UKHL 23 at [21], [30]–[36], [82], [119], [124]–[125], [2005] 2 All ER 443 at [21], [30]–[36], [82], [119], [124]–[125], [2005] 2 WLR 993. The contrary was not suggested. But there were other considerations which made X v Bedfordshire a very exceptional case. Judgment was given in 1995, well before the 1998 Act. No reference was made to the convention in any of the opinions. And, importantly, the very children whose claim in negligence the House had rejected as unarguable succeeded at Strasbourg in establishing a breach of art 3 of the convention and recovering what was, by Strasbourg standards, very substantial reparation: see Z v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 384. On these extreme facts the Court of Appeal was entitled to hold, as it did in D v East Berkshire (at [83]), that the decision of the House in X v Bedfordshire, in relation to children, could not survive the 1998 Act. But such a course is not permissible save where the facts are of that extreme character.

DISPOSAL

The Lambeth appeal

[46] It follows from the foregoing paragraphs of this opinion that the courts below should have held the premises in question to be the homes of the respective appellants and should have held their eviction or proposed eviction to be an interference with their exercise of their right to respect for their homes within the meaning of art 8(2). Their defences should not have been struck out save on the basis that nothing sufficient was pleaded to support them.

[47] The question then arises whether these cases should, even after this lapse of time, be remitted to the county court for consideration whether eviction is necessary in a democratic society, as that expression has been defined in the Strasbourg jurisprudence. I would favour that course if there appeared any reasonable prospect of the court deciding that it was not necessary. But it is clear that under domestic property law the appellants have no right to occupy their respective premises, of which the local authority has an unqualified right to possession. The appellants fall outside the categories to which Parliament has extended a measure of protection. The local authority has no duty to accommodate the appellants, but has a power and duty to manage its housing stock. The appellants have not pleaded or alleged facts which give them a special claim to remain. I am satisfied that if these cases were remitted, possession orders would necessarily be made. I would accordingly, although for reasons differing from those of the Court of Appeal, dismiss these appeals.

The Leeds appeal

[48] It seems to me all but unarguable that the recreation ground at Spinkwell Lane on which the appellants parked their caravans was ever their home within the meaning of art 8(1). On the agreed facts, they had been on the site for two days, without any authority whatever, when the council issued proceedings for possession. There is nothing to suggest that they could show such continuous links with the land as would be necessary if it were to be regarded as their home.

If, however, the land was their home, it is plain that their eviction was in accordance with domestic property law, which had the legitimate end of enabling public authorities to evict unlawful squatters from public land and restore it to public (in this case recreational) use. I can see no ground on which such action could be stigmatised as disproportionate, despite the personal afflictions to which these appellants were unfortunately subject. The facts are far removed from those of Connors v UK where the family had been lawful occupiers of the authority's gipsy site, with one relatively brief intermission, for many years. I am satisfied that these appellants could not succeed if the case were remitted to the county court. In any event, they left the site over a year ago. I would accordingly, dismiss this appeal also.

[49] I would, in each case, invite written submissions on costs within 14 days.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[50] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill. For the reasons he gives, with which I fully agree, I too would dismiss both appeals. I also agree with his observations on the judicial precedent point. On the 'Bruton tenancy' issue in the Lambeth appeal (see Bruton v London and Quadrant Housing Trust [1999] 3 All ER 481, [2000] 1 AC 406), I agree with the conclusions and reasoning of my noble and learned friend Lord Scott of Foscote whose speech I have had the advantage of reading in draft. I add some short observations only on the procedural aspects of the main issue. I must first set them in their context.

[51] These appeals concern a subject matter of great importance to many people: the right of a local authority to repossess a property occupied by a defendant as his home. The two sets of proceedings exemplify two typical circumstances where repossession claims are made by a local authority. One is where the defendant was lawfully in possession of property, his rights of occupation were duly terminated, and a possession order was then sought. The other is where the defendant entered upon the local authority's property unlawfully and the local authority then took steps to obtain a possession order.

[52] The problems before the House arise from the impact of the Human Rights Act 1998 in these cases. In both sets of proceedings the defendants contend that eviction would violate their convention right to respect for their home. The House is concerned to give guidance on what should be the general approach to such contentions and, where seriously arguable issues arise, in which court the issues should be decided.

[53] The starting point is clear enough. A possession order made by a court in respect of a defendant's home will be, at least ordinarily, an interference with the defendant's right to respect for his home within the meaning of art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). Equally clearly, in almost all cases of the two types mentioned above that interference will be justified as 'necessary in a democratic society' on one or more of the grounds set out in art 8(2). The interference will be justified because in one case the defendants never had any right to be on the property at all. In the other case the defendants had only the limited rights afforded by the housing legislation. This complex, ever-changing law is testimony to the elaborate steps taken by Parliament to strike an appropriate balance between the competing interests of all those who are in need of homes. The country's housing stock is finite, and for many years the legislature has striven repeatedly to achieve the best and fairest use of the available housing. Parliament's decisions on this extremely difficult and intricate social problem are to be respected.

[54] I said 'in almost all cases' because inevitably there may be the exceedingly rare case where the legislative code or, indeed, the common law is impeachable on human rights grounds. Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639, regarding the lack of protection for gipsies, is an example. It is this possibility, rare and exceptional though it may be, which gives rise to a hugely important practical problem. Day in, day out, possession orders are routinely made in county courts all over the country after comparatively brief hearings. The hearings are mostly brief because the time needed to dispose fairly of the formalities and also of questions of reasonableness, where they arise, is usually short. This will no longer be the position if, as has been contended, local authorities must now plead and prove in every case that domestic law meets the requirements of art 8.

[55] I am unable to accept this remarkable contention. The course proposed would be a recipe for a colossal waste of time and money, in case after case, on futile challenges to the convention-compatibility of domestic law. On the contrary, despite the possibility of a successful challenge under art 8, I see no reason for the present practice to change. Courts should proceed on the assumption that domestic law strikes a fair balance and that it is compatible with the requirements of art 8 and also art 1 of the First Protocol.

[56] This assumption is of course rebuttable. It is for a defendant to place before the court material necessary to displace this assumption, and he must have a fair opportunity to do so. Like Lord Bingham, I am in no doubt that judges will quickly be able to recognise the highly exceptional case where there is a seriously arguable issue based on the requirements of art 8 or art 1 of the First Protocol.

[57] So far I have referred in quite general terms to the compatibility of domestic law with the requirements of the convention. I must now delve just a little more deeply into the particular types of challenge which may be made, because that has a bearing on which court should decide the issue. At this point it is necessary to recall the two routes by which the 1998 Act has incorporated convention rights into this country's law. These are set out in ss 3 and 6 of the Act. These sections provide the protection afforded to convention rights in United Kingdom law.

[58] Against this background take first a case where the defendant's challenge is to the convention-compatibility of primary or secondary legislation. In such cases a judge in the county court, like every judge in every court, is bound to give effect, should occasion arise, to the interpretive obligation set out in s 3. That is within his jurisdiction. But in the scheme of the Act the s 3 interpretive obligation may lead on to a declaration of incompatibility under s 4, which is a matter not within the jurisdiction of a county court. So, in the rare case where seriously arguable questions of this nature arise in the county court, it will be for the judge to consider whether the more appropriate course is for these questions to be resolved in the High Court.

[59] The human rights challenge may take a different form. A local authority is obliged by s 6 to act compatibly with convention rights. The defendant's contention may be that the local authority's exercise of its power to seek a possession order is, in the circumstances, an unlawful act within the meaning of s 6. As with a challenge to the convention-compatibility of housing legislation, so here it will be a rare case indeed where this allegation can be made good. This is because in the ordinary course a public authority in seeking possession will be doing no more than relying on its ownership of land coupled with the limits on the defendant's rights of occupation as determined by Parliament or, where the defendant has never had any rights of occupation, coupled with his absence of any rights to be present on the land at all. However, if a convention-compatibility issue under s 6 is raised in county court possession proceedings, that court is the appropriate forum for deciding the issue. It is the appropriate forum because in such a case the defendant is entitled to rely upon this allegation as a defence in the possession proceedings: see s 7(1)(b) of the 1998 Act. If the allegation is made good, the court may grant relief as provided in s 8 of the Act. The relief would include dismissing the possession proceedings or staying a possession order for such a period and on such terms as the court considers just and appropriate. I agree therefore with the summary of the practical position set out in the speech of Lord Bingham (at [39]).

[60] For completeness I mention a third possibility which has nothing to do with the 1998 Act. A defendant may seek to challenge the lawfulness of the local authority's decision to pursue possession proceedings as an improper exercise of its powers quite apart from its obligations under s 6. Here again, this issue can be treated as a defence in the proceedings, in accordance with the principle enunciated in the well-known decision of Wandsworth London BC v Winder [1984] 3 All ER 976, [1985] AC 461.

[61] These brief observations on s 6 are directed solely at local authorities and other landlords which are public authorities within the meaning of s 6. I say nothing about private landlords. They are not public authorities and they are outside the scope of s 6. The court of course is itself a public authority. Courts are bound to conduct their affairs in a way which is compatible with convention rights. The court's own practice and procedures must be convention-compliant. Whether, and in what circumstances, the court's s 6 obligation extends more widely than this, and affects the substantive law to be applied by the court when adjudicating upon disputes between private parties, still awaits authoritative decision. This point does not call for a decision in the present appeals, nor was the point argued.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[62] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of all my noble and learned friends. I agree with Lord Scott of Foscote, for all the reasons he gives, that the appellants in the Lambeth appeal had no right under ordinary domestic law to retain possession of their respective properties after the termination of the 1995 lease and had become trespassers with no right to remain. I agree with everything that Lord Bingham of Cornhill has said on the issue of precedent. I also agree, for substantially the same reasons as those given by all my noble and learned friends, that both appeals should be dismissed.

[63] Although the essential point on the main issue has been put much more simply and much more attractively by Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead and Lord Brown of Eaton-under-Heywood, I must deal more fully with the detail of the appellants' argument. It was directed to two main questions. The first was how the right to respect for a person's home under art 8(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) is to be given effect to by the court where a public authority landowner seeks an order for possession of the premises to which it is undoubtedly entitled under domestic property law. The second was whether the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639 is, as the Court of Appeal put it in its Leeds judgment [2005] EWCA Civ 289 at [26], [2005] 3 All ER 573 at [26], [2005] 1 WLR 1825, 'unquestionably incompatible' with the ratio of the majority in Harrow London BC v Qazi [2003] UKHL 43, [2003] 4 All ER 461, [2004] 1 AC 983.

[64] These are important questions, as the answers to them will affect all cases in which the owner of land seeks to recover possession from someone who has no right under domestic law to remain there. I agree with Lord Bingham and Lord Nicholls that the position as it affects private landlords does not call for decision in this case, as the respondents to these appeals are both public authorities. But I do not think that it can be left out of account as we explore the wider implications of the argument. As Mr Sales for the First Secretary of State explained, the art 8(1) right to respect for the home does not distinguish between public authorities and private landlords and landowners. Private landlords and landowners too must obtain an order from the court, and the court itself is a public authority (see [104], below). For the purposes of s 6(1) of the 1998 Act the words 'public authority' embrace a wide and indeterminate variety of bodies, in addition to those that are 'core' public authorities, which perform functions of a public nature: see Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2003] UKHL 37 at [6]–[12], [41], [163], [2003] 3 All ER 1213 at [6]–[12], [41], [163], [2004] 1 AC 546. But in my opinion a correct understanding of the basis of the majority decision in Qazi's case and of the Strasbourg jurisprudence both before and after Qazi's case should lead to the conclusion that it is not unquestionably incompatible with Connors v UK, although I accept that in one respect the reasoning in Qazi's case needs to be modified. I agree with Lord Scott that such differences as there may be between Qazi's case and the Strasbourg Court as to art 8 defences in possession cases are of no relevance to the issue which the House had to decide in Qazi's case.

[65] The appellants' argument, following the approach favoured by the minority in Qazi's case, gives rise to the following conundrum. They say that every person against whom a public authority seeks a possession order with respect to premises which he occupies as his home must be given a fair opportunity to raise as a defence to the proceedings that the excepting conditions in art 8(2) have not been met on the facts of his case and that, if such a defence is raised, it must be rebutted by the public authority. But what if there is a statutory scheme which covers the case of an occupier, and the scheme itself is not challenged as being incompatible with his convention rights? What if that scheme prescribes conditions that must be met for the obtaining of a possession order by the public authority and the court finds that the requirements of the scheme have all been satisfied? And what if there is no statutory scheme but all the requirements for the making of a possession order by the court under domestic property law, which is not challenged as being incompatible with the occupier's convention rights, have been satisfied? Lord Bingham says of these cases, that it would require highly exceptional circumstances before a defence under art 8(2) would avail the occupiers (see [35], [36], above). But what are these circumstances? What is there in the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg Court that tells us that, in those situations, there is anything left for the court to consider under that article? Does that jurisprudence not teach us that the only question that can be raised under that article is whether the law itself is compatible with the occupier's convention rights and that, so long as the law itself is compatible, it is open to the court to apply it to the facts of each case once the requirements of the law have been satisfied? This is the point that the majority in Qazi's case were seeking to grapple with when they said that, because the domestic property law gave an unqualified right to immediate possession to the housing authority once service of the notice to quit had terminated the joint tenancy, there was nothing left for the court to consider under art 8 in that case and the judge had been right to strike out the defence and make the possession order.

[66] The jurisprudence of the Strasbourg Court indicates that three requirements must be met under art 8(2) in cases where a possession order is sought before it can be held that the interference with the exercise of the right to respect for the home that will result from the making of the possession order is justified. Article 8(2) provides:

> 'There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.'

The first question is whether the interference is 'in accordance with the law'. As art 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which was adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations in 1948 (Paris, 10 December 1948; UN 2 (1949); Cmnd 7662) puts it, no one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his home. The requirement that any interference must be in accordance with the law meets the point that it must not be arbitrary. The next question is whether it has an aim that is identified by that paragraph as a legitimate one. Satisfaction of the housing needs of others is regarded as a legitimate aim for this purpose, because it was intended to promote 'the economic well-being of the country' and 'the protection of the rights of . . . others': see Blecic v Croatia (2005) 41 EHRR 185 at 195 (para 58). In Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639 at 658 (para 69) the legitimate aim pursued by the interference was 'the protection of the rights of . . . other[s]'—other occupiers of the site and the public authority as its owner and manager. It is hard to conceive of a case where this requirement would not be met where a landowner seeks to vindicate his right to obtain an order for possession of his property on the grounds that all the requirements that the law lays down for recovery of possession from its occupier by means of a court order have been satisfied. The final question is whether interference in pursuit of that aim is 'necessary in a democratic society'. The notion of necessity implies a pressing social need, and the measure employed must be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued: see Blecic v Croatia (at 195–196 (para 59)). In this context a margin of appreciation is allowed to the government of the contracting state. The scope of this margin of appreciation will depend not only on the aim of the interference but also, where the right to respect for the home is involved, the importance of that right to the individual: see Gillow v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 335 at 349 (para 48), Blecic v Croatia (at 195–196 (paras 59, 60)). This is the only area for legitimate debate in cases where the other requirements have been satisfied.

[67] But, as I shall seek to show in the following paragraphs, Connors v UK is the only case where the Strasbourg Court has held that the making of a possession order against an occupier in favour of a public authority in accordance with the requirements of domestic property law has failed to meet the third requirement in art 8(2). It failed to do so in that case because the making of the order was not attended by the procedural safeguards that were required to establish that there was a proper justification for the interference with the applicant's right to respect for his private and family life and his home. So it could not be regarded as justified by a pressing social need or as proportionate to the aim being pursued (see 666–667 (para 95)). The point of that case, however, was that the law enabled the public authority to evict the applicant from the site which he had been given a licence to occupy without giving reasons which could be examined on their merits by an independent tribunal. There were exceptional circumstances, but it was the law itself that was defective. The margin of appreciation within which in spheres such as housing the judgment of the legislature will be respected did not save it from this criticism (see 662 (para 82)). It leaves untouched cases, of which Qazi's case is an example, where the judgment of the legislature on issues of property law meets the third requirement of the article.

THE CORRECT STARTING POINT

[68] The key to a proper understanding of the decision in Qazi's case is to be found in an appreciation of the fact that the question whether an interference with the respondent's right to respect for his home is permitted by art 8(2) of the convention raises a question of procedure as well as one of substance. The question of substance is whether, on the facts of that case, the interference with the respondent's convention right is permitted by art 8(2). The question of procedure is whether it is necessary, as the appellants submit, for the question whether the excepting conditions in art 8(2) are met to be considered by the county court in every case where the court is asked to make a possession order. In the view of the majority in Qazi's case the question does not require to be considered by the county court if the case is of a type where an application of the law shows that the outcome is a foregone conclusion, as it was in that case because the tenancy which gave the right to occupy had come to an end on the expiry of a notice to quit. In that situation the exercise would have been a pointless one (see [83], [84], [103], [152]).

[69] The jurisprudence of the European Court to which we must look for guidance as to how the question of substance should be answered does not provide much guidance as to how we should deal with the question of procedure. It is a domestic problem. It is not one which troubles the European Court when it is asked to decide the issues remitted to it by art 41 of the convention. That is why the questions arising under art 8(1) and (2) are so often run together at the admissibility stage, with the result that the Commission or the court, as the case may be, is content to address art 8(2) on the assumption that, or after only a cursory examination of the question whether, the right to respect for the home has been interfered with and has to be justified: see S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274 at 278 (para 4), O'Rourke v UK App No 39022/97 (26 June 2001, unreported), Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639 at 658 (para 68) (the parties were agreed that the applicant's eviction disclosed an interference with his right to respect for his private life, family life and home), Blecic v Croatia (2004) 41 EHRR 185 at 195 (para 54) (the court found, in the light of its finding (at 194 (para 52)) that the flat in question could reasonably be regarded as the applicant's home, that the termination of her specially protected tenancy of it by the domestic courts constituted an interference with her right to respect for her home).

[70] The European Court leaves questions of procedure to the contracting states. Its only concern is that procedures are in place which enable individuals to assert their convention rights where there is a live question as to whether or not they have been violated. How this is to be done is a matter for the domestic system. There is therefore no objection in principle, on convention grounds, to a system which treats cases where a violation of art 8 of the convention is likely to be a live issue differently from those where it is not. Provided means are in place which enable those cases where this is a live question to be dealt with appropriately, a system which provides for all other cases where possession is sought to be dealt with simply and summarily will not be objectionable. That, no doubt, is why, notwithstanding Lord Steyn's strong condemnation of it in [27] of his dissenting opinion, the decision in Qazi's case which on its own facts did not disclose a breach of the convention right has survived European scrutiny: see [88], below.

[71] In the domestic legal order actions for possession are brought in the county court. In Scotland they are brought under the summary cause procedure in the sheriff court. This has important implications for the way issues as to whether an interference with the art 8 right is justified can be dealt with domestically. These courts do not have unlimited jurisdiction. They cannot make a declaration of incompatibility: see s 4(5) of the 1998 Act. The question whether, and if so to what extent, they have a discretion to make or withhold an order for possession depends, and depends only, on the law which has to be applied to the facts of each case.

[72] The effect of the decision in Qazi's case is that where an order for possession is made by the court in accordance with domestic property law the essence of the art 8(1) right to respect for the home will not be violated. So the question whether the interference is permitted by art 8(2) is not a matter that need be considered by the county court. The law itself provides the answer to that question. The only matter which the court needs to consider is whether the requirements of the law and the procedural safeguards which it lays down for the protection of the occupier have been satisfied. There may perhaps be cases where the party seeking to recover possession is a public authority and there is a live issue as to whether the requirements of the law and the procedural safeguards which it lays down fall short of what is required to satisfy the convention right. The law in this area is guided by the decisions of the European Court in Strasbourg, and it must be acknowledged that it is capable of being adapted to new and as yet unexplored circumstances. But cases of this kind are likely to occur only very rarely in practice. As a general rule all the court need concern itself with are the requirements of the law and the relevant safeguards.

[73] Almost every working day judges sitting in the county and sheriff courts throughout the United Kingdom are presented with a long list of claims by public authorities seeking orders for possession of houses and other property forming part of their social housing stock against their occupiers. Almost all of these cases are brought by local authorities, housing association trusts or registered social landlords with respect to property let to tenants on a secure tenancy under s 79 of the Housing Act 1985 and the equivalent legislation that operates in Scotland under the Housing (Scotland) Act 2001. For the most part they are cases where, assuming that one or other of the various grounds for possession which are laid down in Sch 2 to the 1985 Act or its Scottish equivalent is established (and there is usually little or no dispute about this), the court cannot make an order for possession unless it considers it reasonable to make the order, or it is satisfied that suitable alternative accommodation will be available and it is also reasonable to make the order: see s 84(2) of the 1985 Act and s 16 of the 2001 Act.

[74] The hearings on this issue are, for the most part, brief and to the point. They are often unopposed, although an order cannot be made in accordance with the statute unless the party seeking possession can show that the statutory requirements are satisfied. Where there is opposition the hearings are frequently adjourned for a short period for the parties to reach agreement. Where agreement cannot be reached a full hearing is necessary. But this rarely happens. On the whole, despite the high volume of cases, the system appears to work well. It is widely seen as fair, quick and reliable. The legislation relating to housing in the public sector has been in place for over 20 years. It was recently reviewed and the Scottish equivalent of the 1985 Act was re-enacted in 2001 with only minor modifications by the Scottish Parliament. Nowhere has it been suggested in the Strasbourg case law that a public authority landlord's claim to possession which has been upheld on these grounds in accordance with the statute was a violation of the occupier's right to respect for his home under art 8 of the convention.

[75] At the other extreme, and much less frequent, are actions brought by the owners of land in the public or private sector for the recovery of possession of property over which the occupiers had no security of tenure at all. These include licensees, other than those such as persons employed in agriculture whose licence to occupy is protected by statute, tenants such as those in property with a high rateable value who are excluded from the security of tenure which most tenants in the private sector have under the Housing Act 1988 and other statutes whose contractual right to occupation of the property has been terminated, occupiers under student or holiday lets and trespassers. The absence of any statutory protection in these cases is the result of a deliberate decision by Parliament that the owner's right to recover possession should in these cases be unqualified, other than by the requirement that an order for possession must be sought from the court which ensures that procedures are in place to safeguard the rights of the occupier. That was the position in Connors v UK under the legislation that was then in force. The significance of the decision in that case is that it has shown that cases falling within this end of the spectrum may raise issues as to whether the law itself satisfies the requirements of art 8(2). This is not something that can be dealt with in the county court.

[76] In between these extremes there are a wide variety of lettings of one kind or another controlled by statute or by the common law which it is impossible accurately to summarise in a few sentences. The position is complex because it has been appreciated for many years that the law in this area has a strong social content. By the end of the war of 1914–18 many countries had enacted provisions controlling rent: see John W Willis 'A Short History of Rent Control Laws' (1950) 36 Cornell LQ 54, pp 67–71. By 1950 some 150 countries had adopted such laws: see Megarry The Rent Acts (10th edn, 1967) vol 1, p 7. Hand in hand with rent control goes security of tenure. In Feyereisel v Parry [1952] 1 All ER 728 at 733, [1952] 2 QB 29 at 37, Denning LJ said that the guiding light through the darkness of the Rent Acts was to remember that they confer personal security of tenure on a tenant in respect of his home. The same approach is taken almost every day in the county and sheriff courts as the judges apply the legislation by which Parliament controls the provision of housing in the public sector. As Lord Porter observed in Baker v Turner [1950] 1 All ER 834 at 842, [1950] AC 401 at 417, the rules of formal logic must not be applied with too great strictness to legislation of this kind.

[77] The issues addressed by this legislation involve questions of social and economic policy where the choices that are to be made can easily be seen as falling within the discretionary area of judgment best left to the considered opinion of the legislature. They include decisions as to the circumstances in which protection of tenure is not to be given to those who have no contractual right to occupy as well as those in which there is to be security of tenure, and if so, on what terms. Cases falling into this category are typical of those where the Strasbourg Court will respect the judgment of the contracting state. They are most unlikely to raise an issue as to whether the right to possession which is afforded by domestic law violates the art 8 convention right. If they do, the county court in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction should, so far as it is possible for it to do so, deal with it: see [109], below. But no example has been referred to in the Strasbourg jurisprudence where a claim to possession in such a case has failed on art 8(2) grounds.

[78] This is the background to the claim by the appellants in these two appeals that the orders for possession which were made against them in the county court violated their rights under art 8(1) of the convention.

THE APPEALS

[79] In the Lambeth appeal the properties in question are owned by Lambeth. The appellants were let into possession of them by the London and Quadrant Housing Trust (LQHT) at various times from about 1981, initially under an informal arrangement with Lambeth and from 1986 under the authority of a licence which was replaced in 1995 by ten-year leases granted by Lambeth to LQHT which were subject to a break clause providing for early termination by either party. In 1999 Lambeth gave notice to terminate these leases. The county court judge, Judge Roger Cooke, held that the effect of the notices was that Lambeth had an unqualified right to possession and that, as the appellants were not tenants of Lambeth, they had no security of tenure under the 1985 Act. The defence under art 8 was struck out. The Court of Appeal, applying Qazi's case, dismissed the appeal: Kay v Lambeth London BC [2004] EWCA Civ 926, [2005] QB 352, [2004] 3 WLR 1396.

[80] In the Leeds appeal the respondent local authority is the freehold owner of a recreation ground onto which the appellants, who are gipsies, moved without the respondents' consent on 13 June 2004. The respondents issued possession proceedings against them two days later on 15 June 2004 on the ground that they were trespassers. It was not disputed that the appellants had entered onto and remained in occupation of the land without any licence from or consent of the respondents. The case having been transferred to the High Court, Judge Bush held that the appellants had no defence to the claim for possession under art 8. The Court of Appeal held that the decision in Qazi's case was incompatible with Connors v UK. But, regarding itself as bound to follow the decision in Qazi's case, it dismissed the appeal: [2005] 3 All ER 573.

[81] The following points are common to both cases. First, the claim by the owners of the properties is that the appellants have no right to remain in occupation of them. They seek to vindicate their right, as owners of the land, to exclusive occupation of the properties. Secondly, the owners in each case are a public authority. They are under a statutory duty to use the property which they own for public purposes—in Leeds' case as land held for use as a public recreation ground, in Lambeth's case as part of the land held for use as part of its social housing stock. Thirdly, as they are public authorities, they are under a duty not to act in a manner that is incompatible with the appellants' convention rights: see s 6(1) of the 1998 Act. Fourthly, the factual circumstances are different from those which were before the House in Qazi's case. In neither of these cases was there a right to possession of the property granted by the owner of the land which under domestic law was no longer enforceable against it by the occupier.

THE ARTICLE 8(2) ISSUE

[82] In Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639 the European Court of Human Rights held that the eviction of the applicant and his family, who were gipsies, from a local authority gipsy site which they were licensed to occupy so long as they did not cause a nuisance was a violation of art 8 because it had not been attended by the requisite procedural safeguards. The appellants submit that this case shows the decision of the majority in Harrow London BC v Qazi [2003] 4 All ER 461 was wrong, and that the decision in Qazi's case should be departed from because it is incompatible with what the European Court said in Connors v UK.

[83] The facts in these two cases were different, as indeed are the facts in these two appeals. But the scope of the argument is such as to raise again the question of procedure to which the majority drew attention in Qazi's case. In para 5.74 of the Law Commission's Consultation Paper Renting Homes I: Status and Security (Consultation Paper No 162, March 2002), Part V, 'The Impact of Human Rights Law', it is said that a procedure which gives a discretion to the county court by requiring it to consider whether having regard to art 8(2) the making of an order would be proportionate is inimical to the purpose of providing a quick and reliable way of evicting tenants whose leases have by the operation of law been terminated. This conclusion has all the more force if the case is one where the person in possession never had a right to occupy the land in the first place.

[84] Mr Luba QC for the appellants submitted that it was a norm of convention law that every case of a person's dispossession from his home had to be justified under art 8(2). He said that a merits review was required in every case, and that there was no room for a short cut. It was not sufficient for the public authority to show that it had an absolute right to possession. Its claim for possession must be accompanied in every case by a pleaded case that the claim for possession was justified under art 8(2). Mr Sales for the First Secretary of State submitted that in principle it was open to any defendant to proceedings for possession to advance an art 8(2) defence in the county court. He differed from Mr Luba in that he accepted that in the vast majority of cases it would be sufficient for the public authority simply to assert its absolute right to possession. But he maintained that in every case—even in those cases where the statutory reasonableness test had to be satisfied by a housing authority—there was a balance that had to be struck under art 8(2) of the convention. This was a matter about which the county court had to be satisfied in every case, notwithstanding the fact that in the overwhelming majority of cases this would, as Lord Bingham points out, be both burdensome and futile: see [29], above.

[85] Despite Mr Luba's assurances to the contrary, there are substantial grounds for thinking that, if it were to be open to a defendant to raise this issue in the county court in every case where the premises are occupied as his home, this would have serious consequences for the system which Parliament has chosen for dealing with possession cases—as the Law Commission has pointed out. He would have to be given a fair opportunity to advance this defence, as the art 8 right carries with it the right to respect for the interest safeguarded in the decision-making process. So he would have to be permitted to plead the defence if he wished to do so. This would have consequences both for the public authority, which would have to rebut it, and for the court which would have to consider and dispose of the issue in every case where it was raised. This is the procedural problem under the domestic system which confronts us, as it did in Qazi's case.

[86] Any procedure that requires consideration of the art 8(2) issue on its merits would be bound to delay the proceedings in one way or another. It is preferable, wherever possible, that the matter should be dealt with in the county court, rather than by adjourning the proceedings to enable the defendant to apply in the High Court for permission for judicial review of the decision to apply for the possession order. A defendant has the right to contend in his defence that the decision of a public authority to recover possession was one which no reasonable person could consider justifiable, as Lord Fraser of Tullybelton explained in Wandsworth London BC v Winder [1984] 3 All ER 976 at 978, 981, [1985] AC 461 at 506, 509. But it has to be borne in mind that it would not have been open to the county court to hold that the claim by the public authority in Connors v UK to seek to recover possession was unlawful as it was invoking a right to possession that was provided by statute: see s 6(2)(b) of the 1998 Act, which provides that s 6(1) does not apply to an act if the authority was acting so as to give effect to or enforce provisions under primary legislation which cannot be read or given effect to in a way which is compatible with the convention rights. If the ground of challenge is that the legislation is incompatible with art 8 and the statute cannot be read or given effect in a way that is compatible with that article, the county court judge must make the order required by the legislation notwithstanding the incompatibility. The defendant can, if he wishes, apply to the High Court for a declaration of incompatibility. But it would serve no good purpose for the proceedings in the county court to be adjourned to allow him to do so.

[87] In R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator, Do v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] UKHL 26 at [20], [2004] 3 All ER 785 at [20], [2004] 2 AC 323 Lord Bingham acknowledged that courts should, in the absence of some special circumstances, follow any clear and constant jurisprudence of the Strasbourg Court:

> 'This reflects the fact that the European Convention is an international instrument, the correct interpretation of which can be authoritatively expounded only by the ECtHR. From this it follows that a national court subject to a duty such as that imposed by s 2 [of the 1998 Act] should not without strong reason dilute or weaken the effect of the Strasbourg case law. It is indeed unlawful under s 6 of the 1998 Act for a public authority, including a court, to act in a way which is incompatible with a convention right. It is of course open to member states to provide for rights more generous than those guaranteed by the convention, but such provision should not be the product of interpretation of the convention by national courts, since the meaning of the convention should be uniform throughout the states party to it. The duty of national courts is to keep pace with the Strasbourg jurisprudence as it evolves over time: no more, but certainly no less.'

[88] The question is whether the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg Court now requires us to say that county courts trying a claim for possession must in every case conduct a review of the defendant's personal circumstances before they can be satisfied that the requirements of art 8(2) are met before they make a possession order or, if the proposition for which Mr Luba contends is too wide, how far if at all the decision in Qazi's case needs to be modified in the light of the decision in Connors v UK. The question is not made easier by the fact that when Qazi's case reached the Strasbourg Court it was dismissed as inadmissible without any reasons having been given, and by the absence of any mention of the House's decision in Qazi's case in the court's judgment in Connors v UK. Lord Steyn's declaration in Qazi's case (at [27]), that it would be surprising if the views of the majority on the interpretation and application of art 8 withstood European scrutiny, cannot have escaped attention in Strasbourg. But two opportunities to meet his challenge have now been passed over. This is not a ground for complacency. But it does make it all the more important for us to be careful lest taking account of the decision in Connors v UK leads us to breach Lord Bingham's rule that national courts should not outpace the Strasbourg Court. The 'no more' part of this rule is just as important as the 'no less' part.

[89] I propose therefore to examine this issue in three stages: (1) to look again at the Strasbourg cases before Qazi's case, (2) to look at the Strasbourg cases after Qazi's case and (3) then to re-examine Qazi's case itself to see whether that decision should be departed from and, if so, to what extent.

THE STRASBOURG CASES BEFORE QAZI'S CASE

[90] I do not think that any advantage is to be gained by conducting a fresh review of all the decisions of the Strasbourg institutions that were considered in Qazi's case. There was a good deal of common ground between the majority and the minority as to the cases that were relevant and their effect. It was agreed that art 8 does not in terms give a right to be provided with a home and does not guarantee the right to have one's housing problem solved by the authorities: see [6] and [50], [53], [55] per Lord Bingham and myself. It was agreed that sufficient and continuous links are required for a house to be considered a 'home' for the purposes of art 8: see [9] and [64], [68] per Lord Bingham and myself. It was accepted by both parties that the Strasbourg jurisprudence did not provide a conclusive answer to the case in the respondent's favour: see [13] per Lord Bingham. Lord Bingham's analysis of the relevant Strasbourg authority was matched step by step in the analysis of it by the majority. There was only one case about the effect of which there was any real disagreement. This was S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274. In that case the Commission, when considering whether a house could be regarded as the applicant's home and whether her right to respect for her home could be regarded as interfered with, attached importance to the fact that she was not entitled in domestic law to succeed to the tenancy of the dwelling house and remain in possession of it on the death of her partner who had been the tenant of it (see 278 (para 4)).

[91] For reasons which he explained (at [10]) and were concurred in by Lord Steyn, Lord Bingham concluded that the ruling in S v UK no longer offered guidance on the issue of justification as it was made before the formulation of the sufficient and continuing links test in Gillow v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 335 at 348–349 (para 46). The majority however took a different view on this point: myself, at [62], [67]; Lord Millett, at [97], [98], [103]; Lord Scott of Foscote, at [126]–[129], [134]. I recognised that the decisions in S v UK and in Gillow v UK were not entirely consistent with each other. But I drew support from the Commission's approach in S v UK (at 278 (para 4)), to the contractual relations established between the local authority and the deceased partner for the proposition that the purpose of art 8 must be kept firmly in mind when one is considering the question whether the right to respect for the home is being interfered with, and for my conclusion (at [83]) that such interference with that right as flowed from the claim for possession by the public authority landlord did not violate the essence of it. Lord Millett and Lord Scott were of the opinion that, although it was clumsily expressed, the Commission's decision in S v UK, properly understood, remained authority for the proposition that the applicant's house could no longer be regarded as attracting the protection of art 8 so as to afford a defence to the local authority's claim to possession as she no longer had any right vis-à-vis the landlord to remain there: see per Lord Millett at [97]; Lord Scott at [134].

[92] I acknowledge Lord Bingham's point that S v UK has not been relied on in any later case (see [19], above). This is, of course, not untypical of decisions on admissibility that turn on their own facts. It must be approached with caution too because its reasoning is not entirely in tune with the view developed in later cases that the real issue in these cases is not whether there is an interference but whether that interference is justified. Having reflected again on what was said in S v UK in the light of the other pre-Qazi authorities, I remain of the opinion that the Commission's decision in that case provides authority for the proposition that the right to respect for the home does not provide the occupier with a defence to the local authority's claim where it was entitled under domestic law to enforce its contractual right to have the property back at the end of the tenancy. This was, of course, a crucial step in the reasoning of the majority that the Strasbourg jurisprudence shows that contractual and proprietary rights of a person entitled to possession cannot be defeated by a defence based on art 8. In none of the Strasbourg cases before Qazi's case was anything said which diminished or detracted from such a person's contractual and proprietary rights, as Lord Scott was careful to emphasise (at [139]).

[93] In Fitzleet Estates Ltd v Cherry (Inspector of Taxes) [1977] 3 All ER 996 at 999, [1977] 1 WLR 1345 at 1349 Lord Wilberforce said that the best way to resolve a question as to which there are two eminently possible views is by the considered majority opinion of the ultimate tribunal, and that much more than mere doubts as to the correctness of that opinion are needed to justify departing from it. Assuming, which I would respectfully question, that there were two eminently possible views as to whether the Commission's decision in S v UK provides the guidance which was found in it by the majority, the fact is that it was the considered opinion of the majority that it did provide that guidance. In these circumstances it would only be if the Strasbourg cases after Qazi's case showed that the majority were wrong that your Lordships would be justified now in departing from what that case decided. This, of course, leaves open the question whether the present cases are distinguishable on their facts from Qazi's case, which I shall reserve until later.

THE STRASBOURG CASES AFTER QAZI'S CASE

[94] Three cases must be considered under this heading. The first is Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639, which was a decision issued on 27 May 2004. The second is Blecic v Croatia (2005) 41 EHRR 185. The third is the decision of the Strasbourg Court, issued in March 2004 shortly after the oral hearing in Connors v UK which took place on 22 January 2004, that the application in Qazi's case was inadmissible. The judgment of your Lordships' House in Qazi's case [2003] 4 All ER 461 was delivered on 31 July 2003.

[95] The significance of Connors v UK is best judged by examining the court's assessment of the general principles that fell to be applied to the question whether there had been a violation of art 8 (see 662–663 (paras 81–84)). The parties were agreed that art 8 applied to the circumstances of that case and that the eviction of the applicant disclosed an interference with his right to respect for, among other things, his home (see 658 (para 68)). They were also agreed that the interference was in accordance with the law and that it pursued a legitimate aim (see 658 (para 69)). This left for examination by the court the question whether the interference was 'necessary in a democratic society' (see 658 (para 70)).

[96] In its discussion of the general principles bearing on this issue the court dealt with the matter in three stages. First, there was the scope of the margin of appreciation in cases which give rise to general social and economic considerations. The scope of this margin depends on the context of the case. Particular significance is to be attached to the extent of the intrusion into the personal sphere of the individual. Then there was the question of procedural safeguards which the state has provided when fixing the regulatory framework. The decision-making process leading to measures of interference must be fair and such as to afford due respect to the interests safeguarded to the individual by art 8. Finally there was the vulnerable position of gipsies as a minority. This meant that some special consideration should be given to their needs and their different lifestyle both in the regulatory framework and in reaching decisions in particular cases. As the court put it in the last sentence of para 84 (at 663), there is to this extent a positive obligation on the contracting states by virtue of art 8 to facilitate the gipsy way of life.

[97] The conclusion which the court reached, after examining the facts from this standpoint, was that the eviction of the applicant and his family was not attended by the requisite safeguards (see 666–667 (para 95)). The particular defect that was identified was the failure to provide a proper justification for the serious interference with the applicant's rights that resulted from his eviction. The court had noted (at 663 (para 85)) that the respective merits of the arguments as to whether there had been a breach of the licence conditions were not examined in the county court proceedings. They were only concerned with the fulfilment of the formal requirements of the eviction, as the council had relied simply on the power to give 28 days' notice to obtain summary possession without proving any breach of licence. The court held that, in the absence of that justification, the applicant's eviction from the local authority site could not be regarded as justified by a pressing social need or as proportionate to the legitimate aim that was being pursued.

[98] I agree with the Court of Appeal's conclusion in the Leeds appeal that the decision in Connors v UK is incompatible with the proposition that the exercise by a public authority of an unqualified right to possession will never constitute an interference with the occupier's right to respect for his home, and that it will always be justified under art 8(2): see [2005] 3 All ER 573 at [26]. Nowhere in my speech in Qazi's case did I subscribe to a proposition in such extreme terms. On the other hand, as I read the Strasbourg Court's judgment, it did not go so far as to say that the recovery of possession will constitute an interference with that right in every case where the premises are occupied by the person as his home. Connors v UK was decided, as is usual in that court, on a relatively narrow ground which was related to its own facts.

[99] As the court said in Connors v UK at the end of para 85 (at 663), the central issue was whether, in the circumstances, the legal framework applicable to the occupation of pitches on local authority gipsy sites provided the applicant with sufficient procedural protection of his rights. There is an echo here of the point made in para 84 (at 663) about the vulnerable position of gipsies as a minority and the need for some special consideration to be given to their needs and different lifestyles. No mention is made of the general principles or their application to the situation that was discussed in Qazi's case, where the issue was whether the procedure by which a public authority landlord recovers possession of residential accommodation from a former tenant whose tenancy has come to an end by operation of law by asserting its unqualified right to possession was incompatible with the rights guaranteed by art 8. It is, of course, possible to envisage special cases other than that of gipsies. But the fact that special consideration must be given to their needs does not justify the proposition that this must be done in every case. As the Court of Appeal acknowledged ([2005] 3 All ER 573 at [29]), a statutory regime may itself achieve the balance required by art 8(2) so that, if the judge complies with it, the requirements of art 8(2) will be satisfied.

[100] There was also criticism in Connors v UK of the procedure that was adopted in the county court, on the ground that it was concerned only with the fulfilment of the formal requirements for the eviction. The case for the local authority was that it had an absolute and unqualified right to possession, as the applicant's licence had been validly terminated. But this criticism was made in the context of a case where there was a need to give special consideration to the needs of gipsies and their different lifestyles, which was absent from the local authority's decision that the licence should be terminated and for which the statutory regime then in force did not provide. There was no request that the possession proceedings should be stayed for judicial review of the question whether the decision to seek possession was arbitrary, unreasonable and disproportionate.

[101] The facts in Blecic v Croatia were also unusual. The applicant was the holder of a specially protected tenancy of a publicly-owned flat in a town in Croatia. Among the conditions that were applied to a specially protected tenancy by the relevant statutes was the holder's entitlement to purchase it under favourable conditions. But it was open to the public authority to terminate it if the holder ceased to occupy the flat for an uninterrupted period of six months. The applicant left the flat in July 1991 to stay with her daughter in Rome for the summer. As this was intended to be for a short period only she left her furniture and belongings in the flat. She locked it and asked a neighbour to take care of it during her absence. But soon after she left it there was an escalation in the armed conflict which made living in the city dangerous and uncomfortable. Her pension was stopped, she lost the right to medical insurance and her flat was broken into in her absence and occupied by another family. She decided to stay in Rome and did not return until May 1992, by which date a civil action had been brought against her for the tenancy to be terminated. After protracted legal proceedings the Supreme Court held in February 1996 that the applicant's non-use of the flat was unjustified as all residents in the town were exposed to the same living conditions as she would have been, had she made the considerable mental and physical effort that would have been required to provide for her basic living needs there.

[102] The court dealt first with the question whether the flat was the applicant's home within the meaning of art 8 of the convention. It held (at 194 (para 52)) that it was, as it was satisfied that she did not intend to abandon it and had made appropriate arrangements for its maintenance with a view to its return. Having found that the termination of the tenancy was an interference with her right to respect for her home, the court then concentrated on the question whether the interference was justified. It was not disputed that the interference was in accordance with the law, and the court held that a legitimate aim was being pursued by the statutory provision which enabled the public authority to terminate specially protected tenancies held by individuals who no longer lived in the publicly-owned flats that had been allocated to them. The only point at issue was whether, in applying that provision to the applicant's case, the Croatian courts infringed her right to respect for her home in a manner that was disproportionate (see 195 (para 58)).

[103] In its introduction to its judgment on this issue (at 195–196 (para 59)) the court made the familiar points that the crucial questions were whether there was a pressing social need, whether the measure employed was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued and that the scope of the margin of appreciation enjoyed by the national authorities depended not only on the nature of the aim of the restriction but also on the nature of the right involved. Having examined these issues and decided (at 197 (para 66)) that the decisions of the Croatian courts were based on reasons that were not only relevant but also sufficient for the purposes of art 8(2), the court (at 198 (para 68)) dealt with the question whether the applicant had been involved in the decision-making process, looked at as a whole, to a degree that was sufficient to provide her with the requisite protection of her interests. As it was satisfied on this point too, it held (at 198 (paras 70, 71)) that there had been no violation of art 8.

[104] The important point which emerges from the court's decision for present purposes is the need for the applicant to be sufficiently involved in the decision-making process leading to her eviction so that she had the opportunity to present the arguments which in her view were decisive for the outcome of the proceedings. Article 8 contains no explicit procedural requirements, as the court acknowledged at the outset of para 68 (at 198). But it said that the decision-making process must be fair and such as to ensure due respect of the interests safeguarded by art 8. The task which the court set for itself therefore, basing itself on its existing case law, was to determine whether, having regard to the circumstances of the case and the importance of the decision to be taken, the applicant was involved to a sufficient degree in the decision-making process, seen as a whole, to provide her with the requisite protection. It is also worth noting that the institutions whose actions in the domestic system were under scrutiny in that case were the courts in the contracting state. This suggests that no relevant distinction can be drawn between cases where the party seeking possession is a public authority and those where it is not. The court itself has a function to fulfil in all cases where there is an interest under art 8 that needs to be safeguarded, as it too is a public authority.

[105] That however was a case where, as in Connors v UK, the question whether the interference with the applicant's home was justified under art 8(2) was a live issue. As I said earlier in this opinion (see [70], above), the court's only concern as to the question of procedure is that procedures are in place which enable individuals to assert their convention rights where there is a live question as to whether or not they have been violated. The circumstances which led to the court's decision that there was an interference with the right to respect for the home that had to be justified were quite different from those in Qazi's case. There was a real and substantial issue as to whether the Supreme Court's decision to terminate the specially protected tenancy in the unusual circumstances of that case was proportionate to the legitimate aim which was being pursued by the public authority. It does not follow that a procedure which enables this issue to be addressed to the extent that was found to be necessary in Blecic v Croatia must be available in every case.

[106] This provides the context for an assessment of the significance of the court's decision that the application in Qazi's case was inadmissible. This is after all a decision of the Strasbourg Court. The court was provided with the entirety of your Lordships' judgment in that case, as it was submitted as an annexe to the application. So it had before it in full the two dissenting opinions, including Lord Steyn's observation that it would be surprising if the views of the majority on the interpretation and application of art 8 withstood European scrutiny. The fact that there was a sharp division of opinion on these issues could not have been put more clearly. The application was held nevertheless, without detailed discussion, to be inadmissible. What are we to make of this?

CONCLUSIONS

[107] I would draw the following conclusions. I think that it is reasonable to think that the court accepted that the applicant had established that the house was his home for the purposes of art 8 and that the enjoyment of his right to respect for his home was interfered with at least to some extent by the order for possession sought by the local authority. To that extent therefore there was an issue to be considered under art 8(2). But I think that it is reasonable also to think that the court was satisfied that the requirements of art 8(2) were so obviously met by the law which was applied in that case that there was, as Lord Millett put it at [103], simply no balance left for the court to strike between the interference with the applicant's right and the legitimate aim that was being pursued by the local authority. As Lord Scott says, the obvious inference is that the Strasbourg Court were satisfied that there was nothing more to be said in Mr Qazi's case. The tenancy had come to an end, and he no longer had any right to remain in occupation of the premises. His personal circumstances were irrelevant.

[108] These conclusions can be fitted into the lessons to be drawn from Connors v UK and from Blecic v Croatia in this way. There will be some cases of a special and unusual kind, of which Connors v UK is an example, where the interference with the right to respect for the home which results from the making of a possession order will require to be justified by a decision-making process that ensures that 'some special consideration' (the words used in Connors v UK at 663 (para 84)) is given to the interests safeguarded by art 8. If there is such a defect the law will need to be amended to provide the necessary safeguards. But there will be many other cases where there are no such special circumstances—where the person's right to occupy the premises as his home has simply been brought to an end by the operation of law and his eviction is necessary to protect the rights under the law of the landowner. In these cases it is enough that the eviction is in accordance with what the law itself requires as the case of Blecic v Croatia, in which it was held that the requirements of the law had been satisfied, demonstrates. Further consideration of the interests safeguarded by art 8 will be unnecessary. Cases where the home was occupied under a tenancy, or some other interest falling short of a tenancy, which has been brought to an end in accordance with the relevant law, as in Qazi's case, will fall into this category. The interests safeguarded by art 8 will be sufficiently protected by the fulfilment of the formal requirements for the eviction laid down by the relevant statute or by the common law.

[109] The contrary conclusion, for which the appellants contend, is that procedures must exist in the domestic system for a consideration of the interests safeguarded by art 8 in every case where a person is evicted from his home by the making of a possession order. A requirement that the art 8 issue must be considered by the court in every case by taking into account the defendant's personal circumstances would go further than a reading of these three cases, taken together and in the light of the prior Strasbourg jurisprudence, will justify. It would breach Lord Bingham's 'no more and no less' rule. The extent and consequences of this breach should not be underestimated. It would drive a deep wedge into the domestic system for the handling of possession cases and would be a colossal waste of time and money, as Lord Nicholls indicates. So I agree with him that judges in the county courts, when faced with such a defence, should proceed on the assumption that domestic law strikes a fair balance and is compatible with the occupier's convention rights.

[110] But, in agreement with Lord Scott, Baroness Hale and Lord Brown, I would go further. Subject to what I say below, I would hold that a defence which does not challenge the law under which the possession order is sought as being incompatible with art 8 but is based only on the occupier's personal circumstances should be struck out. I do not think that McPhail v persons, names unknown [1973] 3 All ER 393, [1973] Ch 447 needs to be reconsidered in the light of Strasbourg case law. Where domestic law provides for personal circumstances to be taken into account, as in a case where the statutory test is whether it would be reasonable to make a possession order, then a fair opportunity must be given for the arguments in favour of the occupier to be presented. But if the requirements of the law have been established and the right to recover possession is unqualified, the only situations in which it would be open to the court to refrain from proceeding to summary judgment and making the possession order are these: (a) if a seriously arguable point is raised that the law which enables the court to make the possession order is incompatible with art 8, the county court in the exercise of its jurisdiction under the 1998 Act should deal with the argument in one or other of two ways: (i) by giving effect to the law, so far as it is possible for it do so under s 3, in a way that is compatible with art 8, or (ii) by adjourning the proceedings to enable the compatibility issue to be dealt with in the High Court; (b) if the defendant wishes to challenge the decision of a public authority to recover possession as an improper exercise of its powers at common law on the ground that it was a decision that no reasonable person would consider justifiable, he should be permitted to do this provided again that the point is seriously arguable: see Wandsworth London BC v Winder [1984] 3 All ER 976, [1985] AC 461. The common law as explained in that case is, of course, compatible with art 8. It provides an additional safeguard.

THE DECISION IN QAZI'S CASE ITSELF

[111] How then does the decision of this House in Qazi's case stand up to examination when it is looked at in the light of the subsequent decisions of the Strasbourg Court? I would hold that there are no grounds for concluding that the decision itself, on its own facts, was unsound. I would draw support for this conclusion from [the] fact that the respondent's subsequent application to Strasbourg was held to be inadmissible. On the other hand I would acknowledge that Lord Scott's observation in Qazi's case (at [139]), that in no case has art 8 been applied to detract from the contractual and proprietary rights of the person entitled to possession is no longer true. Connors v UK was such a case. The local authority in that case was relying on its contractual and proprietary rights when it applied for the eviction order. As I have already said (see [98], above), I agree with the Court of Appeal's conclusion in the Leeds appeal that the decision in Connors v UK is incompatible with the extreme propositions that the exercise by a public authority of an unqualified right to possession will never constitute an interference with the occupier's right to respect for his home, and that it will always be justified under art 8(2): [2005] 3 All ER 573 at [26]. a [112] But it needs to be stressed that the facts in Connors v UK were entirely different from those in Qazi's case. There was no need in Qazi's case to give special consideration to the needs of gipsies and their different lifestyles, and the background to the local authority's decision to seek a possession order was that a valid notice to quit had been served on the local authority by one of the tenants b of the tenancy. Connors v UK does not resolve the problem as to how the need to give special consideration to cases of that kind where the law itself is defective—and I do not confine this category to gipsies—can be fitted in to the domestic system which requires that orders for possession must be sought in the county court. So I do not think that the decision in Connors v UK is incompatible with the view of the majority in Qazi's case that there is no need for c a review of the issues raised by art 8(2) to be conducted in the county court if the case is of a type where the law itself provides the answer, as in that situation a merits review would be a pointless exercise. In such a case the art 8 defence, if raised, should simply be struck out.

[113] For these reasons I do not think that the reasoning of the majority in d Qazi's case should be departed from. But I accept that the reasoning needs to be clarified. In the light of the subsequent Strasbourg cases I would now place greater emphasis on the need for the court to provide a remedy in those special cases of a kind not considered in Qazi's case where it is seriously arguable that the right to possession which is afforded by domestic law violates the convention e right. Lord Millett suggested in [109] of his speech in Qazi's case that judicial review would provide the appropriate remedy. On balance I think that it would be better for the issue to be dealt with by way of defence to the proceedings in the county court, to the extent that the limits on the jurisdiction of that court permit it to do so (see [86], [110], above).

[114] There may, however, be cases like Connors v UK where the f incompatibility with the art 8 convention right lies in primary legislation which the county court is being asked to apply to the case by the public authority: see [86], above. In such a case it would be open to the High Court to make a declaration of incompatibility, if it was not possible to read or give effect to the legislation under s 3 of the 1998 Act in a way which was compatible with g the convention right. But the legislation would nevertheless still have to be enforced, unless the decision of the public authority to seek to enforce it when faced with that incompatibility could be said, when judicially reviewed, to be arbitrary, unreasonable or disproportionate. The decision could not be held in the county court to be an unlawful act within the meaning of s 6 of the 1998 Act: see s 6(2)(b). The fact that the question of incompatibility that was raised in h Connors v UK was not capable, under the domestic system, of being dealt with effectively in the county court because of the limits on its jurisdiction reinforces, rather than detracts from, the proposition that a defence which is raised in that court under art 8 should be struck out unless the legislation can be read and given effect in a way that is compatible or it raises an issue as to its incompatibility that j ought to be considered in the High Court.

CONCLUSION IN THE LAMBETH APPEAL

[115] For the reasons given by my noble and learned friend Lord Scott of Foscote I would reject the arguments which Mr Luba advanced on the private law issue. The appellants' right to continue in occupation of premises over which they never had any rights granted to them by the landowner was brought to an end by the operation of law when Lambeth gave notice terminating the leases to LQHT. They have no right to remain there indefinitely, which would be the effect of denying to Lambeth its unqualified right to possession of the premises on the ground that to give effect to this right would be incompatible with art 8. Their interests will be sufficiently protected by the fulfilment of the formal requirements for the eviction, which demand proof by the public authority landowner of its entitlement to obtain an order for possession in the exercise of its property rights. I would dismiss this appeal.

CONCLUSION IN THE LEEDS APPEAL

[116] These appellants had been present on the recreation ground for only two days when proceedings were taken against them for the making of the possession order. Unlike the applicant and his family in Connors v UK, they never had any right of any kind to make their home there. They were trespassers. They are, of course, gipsies who are in a vulnerable position as a minority. But they had not established the links with the place which they were occupying that were needed for it to be considered as their home within the meaning of art 8(1). Even if it was, such consideration as ought to be given to their needs and their different lifestyle under art 8(2) is met, on the facts of their case, by requiring proof by the public authority of its entitlement as the owner of the land to obtain an order for possession in the exercise of its property rights. I would dismiss this appeal also.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

INTRODUCTION

[117] My Lords, an appellate committee of seven has heard two appeals together in each of which the main issue for decision is the scope that should be given to art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

[118] Article 8, entitled 'Right to respect for private and family life', provides: '1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.' And, in art 8(2), imposes a bar on interference by a public authority with that right:

> 'There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.'

[119] The art 8(1) 'right to respect' covers, potentially, a very wide spectrum of personal interests (see Lester and Pannick Human Rights Law and Practice (2nd edn, 2004) pp 261–262 (para 4.8.2)), but these appeals are concerned only with the art 8 right of a person to respect for his home. It is contended by the appellants, against whom possession orders have been made, that whenever an owner of land takes legal proceedings to recover possession of the land from an occupier who has his home on the land, the action taken by the owner constitutes, prima facie, an interference with the occupier's right to respect for his home, and, consequently, that an order for possession cannot properly be made unless the art 8(2) conditions are satisfied. It may be, of course, that the occupier has some ground under ordinary domestic law for resisting the possession application. In that case reliance by the occupier on art 8 rights will be unnecessary. But in a case in which the occupier is a trespasser with no right under ordinary domestic law to resist the landowner's possession application, art 8(2), it is said, provides a further ground for resistance and obliges the judge who hears the application to be satisfied, before making an order for possession, that the order is necessary and proportionate in furthering one or other of the legitimate aims referred to in art 8(2).

[120] In Harrow London BC v Qazi [2003] UKHL 43, [2003] 4 All ER 461, [2004] 1 AC 983 this House by a majority rejected that contention and held (at [84] per Lord Hope of Craighead) that 'contractual and proprietary rights to possession cannot be defeated by a defence based on art 8'. If that is right, both these appeals must fail. But the issue has come back before the House, this time with an appellate committee of seven, because in Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639 the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg held that the eviction of a gipsy family and their caravan from a local authority gipsy site on which the family had no contractual or proprietary right to remain constituted a violation of their art 8 right to respect for their home. It is submitted that the decisions in Qazi's case and Connors v UK are irreconcilable and your Lordships are asked to follow the latter case, reverse the former case, and hold that the possession orders made against the appellants violated their art 8 rights. The main issue for your Lordships is whether or not to accede to that submission.

[121] In both the cases now before the House the lower courts held themselves bound to follow Qazi's case notwithstanding the later decision of the Strasbourg Court. The question has been raised whether the requirement imposed by s 2(1) of the 1998 Act, that a domestic court determining a question which has arisen in connection with a convention right must take into account 'any judgment, decision, declaration or advisory opinion' of the Strasbourg Court, relieved the domestic courts of their obligation to follow the prior ruling of your Lordships in Qazi's case. This, too, is an important issue regardless of whether on these appeals your Lordships conclude that the Connors v UK decision requires the conclusion that the Qazi ruling was wrong. On both these two important issues the First Secretary of State has intervened and, through Mr Philip Sales, has assisted your Lordships with written and oral submissions. As to the issue of precedent, I am in complete agreement with what my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill has said in [40]–[45], above and to which there is nothing that I can usefully add.

[122] In addition, however, there is a domestic private law issue which arises in the Lambeth appeal. The appellants contend that they were entitled to be treated by Lambeth Borough Council (Lambeth) as tenants, not as trespassers. If that is right, it is common ground that the tenancies under which they say they are entitled to occupy the properties in question were never terminated and the possession orders made against them must be set aside. It is convenient to deal with this private law issue before grappling with the art 8 issue. First, however, I should refer to the essential facts of the two cases.

THE FACTS IN THE LEEDS CASE

[123] The appellants are the Maloney family. There are five of them. They are travellers, whose home is in one or more caravans, often on the move from one place to another.

[124] The respondent is Leeds City Council (Leeds). Leeds is the owner of a recreation ground at Spinkwell Lane in Leeds. On or about 24 May 2004 a number of travellers with their caravans entered the recreation ground and parked their caravans there. This was without Leeds' permission. After a few days the first group of travellers moved on, but others took their place. On 13 June 2004 the Maloneys moved on to the recreation ground. Two days later, on 15 June, Leeds commenced proceedings in the Leeds County Court for possession of the recreation ground. The particulars of claim said that the travellers were trespassers and refused to vacate the recreation ground. 24 June 2004 was the return date specified on the claim form. The Maloney family were the only occupiers of the recreation ground to attend court on that date and contest the possession application. They were formally joined as defendants. The case was adjourned to be heard on 18 October.

[125] Leeds' claim to possession was based on its ownership of the recreation ground which was not in dispute. Nor was it in dispute that the Maloneys were trespassers who had entered onto and remained on the land without any licence or consent from Leeds. They sought to defend by relying on art 8 and by contending that Leeds was in breach of its statutory obligations to provide suitable sites where gipsies could park their caravans. They said, also, that their personal circumstances were 'exceptional' in that several members of the family suffered from medical and psychiatric problems, three members of the family were school age children and in the 12 months preceding their entry onto the recreation ground the family had been evicted or forced to move under threat of eviction more than 50 times. Leeds responded by notifying the family that their status as unintentionally homeless and in priority need was accepted and by accepting a duty to help them obtain accommodation.

[126] On 22 September the case was transferred to the High Court. The art 8 issue was dealt with as a preliminary issue and, on 25 October, Judge Bush, sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court, following Qazi's case, held that contractual and proprietary rights to possession could not be defeated or qualified by reliance on art 8. So he made an order for possession forthwith. He refused a stay of execution but gave leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal.

[127] Following the order for possession and the refusal of the stay of execution the Maloneys and their caravans left the recreation ground. But, none the less, they gave notice of appeal to the Court of Appeal. The appeal seems to have been prosecuted simply for the purpose of ventilating the art 8 issue. Important though this issue undoubtedly is, it seems to me a misuse both of public money and of court time to have prosecuted on appeal a point that had become moot. No one has suggested that an appellate court would have had power to order Leeds to permit the Maloneys and their caravans to re-enter the recreation ground, trespassers again as they had been before. No one has suggested that any monetary award should be made in favour of the Maloneys and against Leeds.

[128] There is a further point to be made on the facts of the Maloney case. Whether the approach to art 8 taken in Qazi's case be right or wrong, it is common ground that the article does not give any protection to the occupation of land or a building unless the land or building is the occupier's 'home'. If a traveller with his caravan enters as a trespasser upon a piece of land, by what process does the small area of land on which he happens to station his caravan and, presumably, a few square yards surrounding that small area of land, become identified as his 'home'? If a homeless person enters an unoccupied building, places his few possessions in one of the rooms and spends the next night or two there, does the room become his 'home' in relation to which he is entitled to an art 8 'right of respect'? The answer must, I think, be no. It is clearly possible for a trespasser to establish a 'home' in property that belongs to someone else but whether and when he has done so must be matters of degree. In Buckley v UK (1997) 23 EHRR 101 at 115 (para 63) the Strasbourg Commission said that—

> '[w]hether or not a particular habitation constitutes a "home" which attracts the protection of Article 8(1) will depend on the factual circumstances, namely, the existence of sufficient and continuous links.'

[129] It could not, in my opinion, credibly be suggested that in the two days between the entry by the Maloneys on the recreation ground and the commencement by Leeds of possession proceedings the Maloneys had established 'sufficient and continuous links' with the piece of land on which their caravan stood so as to constitute that singular piece of land their art 8(1) 'home'.

[130] In my opinion, the Leeds case was a very bad one to choose for the purpose of revisiting the correctness of Qazi's case since, whether the appellants' arguments be right or wrong, it is grotesque to suppose that the Maloneys could claim that the commencement by Leeds of possession proceedings to recover its recreation ground was an interference with their right to respect for a 'home' that they had established on Leeds' land. Be that as it may, the Lambeth case, by contrast, seems to me a very good test case.

[131] Both Judge Bush and the Court of Appeal, following Qazi's case, rejected the Maloneys' reliance on art 8.

THE FACTS IN THE LAMBETH CASE

[132] This case involves residential premises as opposed to open spaces on which caravans may be parked. The properties in question are owned by Lambeth and are mostly in the area of Rushcroft Road London SW2. They are, and have been for several years, occupied by the appellants and it is common ground that they constitute the appellants' homes for art 8 purposes. The properties are part of Lambeth's 'short life' housing stock, that is to say, they 'are not in a condition suitable for normal housing use or capable of being rendered so suitable within finances available to Lambeth' (per Auld LJ at [7] of his Court of Appeal judgment).

[133] London and Quadrant Housing Trust (LQHT) is a charitable housing trust. In 1979 Lambeth and LQHT came to an informal arrangement under which Lambeth licensed 'short life' premises to LQHT for LQHT to make the premises available as accommodation for persons who were homeless but to whom Lambeth owed no statutory duty to arrange accommodation. LQHT purported to grant licences to those whom it allowed into occupation. Each of the appellants is a person who was allowed by LQHT into occupation of a Lambeth owned short life property under a purported licence granted by LQHT.

[134] In 1986 the informal arrangement between Lambeth and LQHT was replaced by a formal licence agreement which reflected the previous informal arrangements. On 4 December 1995, however, Lambeth granted LQHT a ten-year lease of the short life properties. Clause 2 of the lease gave Lambeth the right to determine the ten-year terms on the expiry of six months and one week's notice in writing to LQHT stating that Lambeth required possession of the demised properties.

[135] On 24 June 1999 this House announced its decision in Bruton v London and Quadrant Housing Trust, now reported in [1999] 3 All ER 481, [2000] 1 AC 406. The House held that the 'licence' arrangement between LQHT and Mr Bruton, who had been allowed by LQHT into occupation of one of the properties that had been subject to the 1986 licence arrangements and, since 4 December 1995, subject to the 1995 lease, had created as between LQHT and Mr Bruton a relationship of landlord and tenant and not, as LQHT had supposed, a relationship of licensor and licensee. It followed from the Bruton decision that each of the occupiers who had been allowed by LQHT to occupy properties on similar terms to those under which Mr Bruton occupied was a tenant of LQHT, not a licensee. So each of the appellants in the Lambeth case was a tenant of LQHT.

[136] Lambeth's response to the Bruton decision was to give notice to LQHT to terminate the 1995 lease. The notice was given on 23 November 1999. Lambeth then notified the occupiers that they were, or would soon become, trespassers vis-à-vis Lambeth and would have to leave their respective residences. Six actions were commenced over the period between July 2000 and the end of that year. In each action Lambeth claimed possession of a property of which LQHT had been the lessee under the 1995 lease. The possession claim was made against the occupier of the property. Each occupier, who had, as a result of Bruton's case, been a tenant of LQHT, responded by claiming to have become, on the determination of the 1995 lease, a tenant of Lambeth. And, in addition, each occupier claimed that his art 8 right to respect for his home gave him an alternative defence to Lambeth's possession claim.

[137] Judge Roger Cooke, in the county court, and the Court of Appeal followed Qazi's case and rejected the occupiers' reliance on art 8. As to the private law tenancy defence, that too was rejected both at first instance and on appeal. A number of grounds in support of the tenancy defence that were relied on in the courts below were not relied on here. Two grounds only have been relied on here and to those I now turn.

ARE THE APPELLANTS TENANTS OF LAMBETH?

[138] The first of the two grounds relied on starts with the proposition that the grant of the 1995 lease by Lambeth to LQHT involved, by necessary implication, a surrender by LQHT of the licence it had been granted by Lambeth in 1986. But, it is said, it was not open to LQHT to surrender the tenancies that, as Bruton's case had held, LQHT had granted to the appellants. So, the argument proceeds, the appellants' Bruton tenancies must have survived the surrender by LQHT of its 1986 licence and have become, in the scintilla temporis between the surrender of the licence and the grant of the 1995 lease, tenancies held directly of Lambeth. Lambeth thereby became, and has remained, bound by the tenancies. The grant of the 1995 lease to LQHT interposed LQHT once more between Lambeth and the appellants but could not detract from the rights that the occupiers had already, in the scintilla temporis, acquired against Lambeth.

[139] Alternatively, it is said that when Lambeth served notice on LQHT to determine the 1995 lease, the only effect of the notice, as between Lambeth and the appellants, was to clear away LQHT's intermediate estate. The notice could not affect the appellants' rights under their tenancies which predated the grant of the 1995 lease.

[140] For the purpose of both these arguments the appellants rely on the principle established by Mellor v Watkins (1874) LR 9 QB 400, namely, that where

A has granted a tenancy to B and B has granted a sub-tenancy to C, a surrender by B to A of B's tenancy does not determine C's sub-tenancy but has the effect that A becomes C's landlord ie C holds his tenancy directly from A. The principle was explained by Blackburn J (at 405):

> '[B] had no power to derogate from his landlord's [A's] rights. Subject to those rights, he had a right to sub-let; and by doing that he could not prevent the landlord from giving a notice to quit in invitum, which would have determined both [B's] and the defendant's [C's] interest. But no voluntary act on the part of [B], by which his own interest might be determined, could put an end to the interest which he had created in the defendant. [B's] tenancy was put an end to as far as he was concerned, as between him and [A], by the voluntary surrender of his lease; but the defendant's [C's] tenancy . . . still remained, until determined by a proper notice to quit.'

[141] The reason why this principle is applicable where an intermediate tenant who has granted a sub-tenancy surrenders his tenancy to his landlord is that the sub-tenancy is a derivative interest created by the intermediate landlord out of the interest created by the head landlord. The sub-tenancy belongs to the sub-tenant, not to the intermediate landlord. It is an item of property that cannot be given away by someone to whom it does not belong. It follows that it cannot be surrendered by the intermediate landlord. A surrender is a consensual transaction between landlord and tenant. It derives its effect from the terms of that transaction, not from the terms of the lease or tenancy that is surrendered. The rights of a sub-tenant cannot be reduced or terminated by a transaction to which the sub-tenant is not a party (see Barrett v Morgan [2000] 1 All ER 481 at 485, [2000] 2 AC 264 at 271 per Lord Millett).

[142] If, on the other hand, the termination of the lease is provided for in the terms of the lease itself, eg a provision in the lease enabling the landlord or the tenant to give a week's notice terminating the lease, a sub-tenancy cannot, absent statutory intervention, survive the termination of the tenancy by such a notice. The interest of the sub-tenant was created out of the term created by the lease and was, therefore, always subject to termination in accordance with the terms of the lease. Pennell v Payne [1995] 2 All ER 592, [1995] QB 192 is a recent reaffirmation by a strong Court of Appeal of this principle and was approved by this House in Barrett v Morgan [2000] 1 All ER 481 at 488, [2000] 2 AC 264 at 274.

[143] But the Mellor v Watkins principle and the Pennell v Payne principle can have no relevance to a case in which a tenancy has been granted by someone without any estate in the land in question. The Bruton tenancies are all of that character. LQHT was, when it granted the Bruton tenancies, merely a licensee of Lambeth. The tenancies were not granted by Lambeth and were not carved by LQHT out of any estate that Lambeth had granted to LQHT. They were not derivative estates. LQHT, prior to the grant of the 1995 lease, had no estate in the land. It merely had a contractual licence. In these circumstances the Mellor v Watkins point that the intermediate landlord cannot by a consensual surrender give away an interest that belongs to a sub-tenant has no substance. True it is that LQHT could not by a surrender of its licence give away or prejudice the rights of the Bruton tenants against itself, LQHT. But these rights never were enforceable against Lambeth. Once the LQHT licence had been terminated the appellants were trespassers as against Lambeth.

[144] An analogous situation would arise if a person not the owner of land but in adverse possession of it were to grant a tenancy of the land to another.

As between the grantor and grantee there would be a valid 'non-estate' tenancy. But unless and until the adverse possession had continued for the requisite 12 years the tenancy would not bind the true owner of the land. An agreement by the adverse possessor to deliver up the land to the true owner would not affect the rights of his tenant against him, the landlord, but equally could not turn the tenant into the true owner's tenant or give the tenant any rights against the true owner.

[145] So, too, the consensual termination of LQHT's contractual licence from Lambeth could not, in my opinion, turn the Bruton 'non-estate' tenants into estate tenants of Lambeth. I agree with Mr Luba, counsel for the appellants, that the Bruton tenants were not bound by a transaction between Lambeth and LQHT to which they were not parties. But the contended for conclusion that they therefore became tenants of Lambeth is a non-sequitor. They never were sub-tenants holding, via a grant from LQHT, an interest created by Lambeth. They were tenants of LQHT holding an interest created by LQHT. The Mellor v Watkins principle has, in my opinion, no application to such a case.

[146] As to the effect on the Bruton tenancies of the grant of the 1995 lease to LQHT and the termination of that lease in 2000, there are two points to be made. First, I agree with the appellants that when in 1995 LQHT were granted a term of years by Lambeth the Bruton tenancies became, vis-à-vis Lambeth, no longer 'non-estate' tenancies but estate tenancies. The Bruton tenancies were, so to speak, fed by the estate that their landlord, LQHT, had acquired.

[147] But that estate was from the outset subject to the terms of the 1995 lease. The termination of that lease in 2000 in accordance with the termination provisions contained in it terminated the entitlement of the Bruton tenants to claim an estate derived from and binding on Lambeth: see Barrett v Morgan [2000] 1 All ER 481 at 486, [2000] 2 AC 264 at 272 where Lord Millett referred to a sub-tenant's derivative title as precarious 'for it cannot survive the natural termination of the head tenancy in accordance with its terms agreed before his subtenancy was created'. The 'estate' tenancies held by the appellants were derived from and could not survive the termination of the 1995 lease. The 'non-estate' Bruton tenancies could survive as against the grantor of them, LQHT, but they were not binding as against Lambeth.

[148] In my opinion, therefore, in agreement with Judge Cooke and the Court of Appeal, the appellants had no right under ordinary domestic law to retain possession of their respective properties after the termination of the 1995 lease. They had become, vis-à-vis Lambeth, the owner of their properties, trespassers with no right to remain.

THE ARTICLE 8 ISSUE

[149] These appeals have proceeded on the footing that at the heart is the issue whether there is an inconsistency between the Strasbourg Court's judgment in Connors v UK and the judgment of this House in Qazi's case and, if so, to what extent. The Court of Appeal in Leeds thought that the two were inconsistent. A differently constituted Court of Appeal in the Lambeth case (at [106]) distinguished Connors v UK as being applicable only to cases involving gipsies but Mr Luba QC's art 8 submissions to the House on both these appeals were based on the proposition that there were substantial inconsistencies between Qazi's case and Connors v UK. My Lords I believe this focus to be misdirected. There are, I would accept, inconsistencies between Qazi's case and Connors v UK but they are minor. Much more important is an analysis of the Strasbourg art 8 jurisprudence, ending with Connors v UK and Blecic v Croatia. If that is done then I think it becomes apparent that such differences as there are between the approach of the majority in Qazi's case to art 8 defences in possession cases and the approach of the Strasbourg Court to art 8 defences in possession cases is of no relevance to cases like those now before the House or, indeed, to a case such as Qazi's case.

[150] Let me start with the state of Strasbourg art 8 jurisprudence as it stood when the House heard the appeal in Qazi's case. The Strasbourg case law as it then stood was examined and analysed by my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hope of Craighead. In the opinion I gave, I expressed the view that in a case where the person occupying the property as his home had no legal or contractual right to remain there, as against the legal owner of the property, a claim by the owner to recover possession would not engage art 8 at all. But Lord Bingham, Lord Hope, Lord Steyn and Lord Millett thought differently and I would accept that it is now settled that such a claim does engage art 8. The contrary view is not, and has not been since Qazi's case, in issue. It follows that art 8(2) comes into play in all such possession cases. But the Strasbourg jurisprudence showed, also, that where an ordinary housing possession claim is being made, whether by a local authority landlord eg S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274, a private landlord eg Di Palma v UK (1986) 10 EHRR 149, a mortgagee eg Wood v UK (1997) 24 EHRR CD 69, an art 8 defence cannot assist the occupier to resist a possession order sought by the legal owner. A fortiori art 8 could not assist an occupier who had entered and remained on the property as a trespasser. In each of the cases to which I have referred the ex-occupier's art 8 complaint was dismissed. In S v UK the Commission said (at 278 (para 4)) that the possession order—

> 'was clearly in accordance with the law and was also necessary for the protection of the contractual rights of the landlord to have the property back at the end of the tenancy.'

In Di Palma v UK, the Commission said (at 155–156) that the interference with the applicant's art 8 rights brought about by the forfeiture of her lease on account of her failure to pay a service charge—

> 'was in conformity with Art. 8(2) as a measure which was in accordance with the law and necessary in a democratic society for the protection of the rights of others.'

For 'the rights of others', read 'the rights of the landlord'. In Wood v UK the Commission said (at 70–71) that the repossession of the applicant's home on account of her failure to keep up repayments of the mortgage loan—

> 'was in accordance with the terms of the loan and the domestic law and was necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others, namely the lender.'

In none of these cases did the Commission undertake a balancing exercise which put into the scale the personal difficulties and problems of the occupier whose home had been the subject of the possession order.

[151] Contrast, on the other hand, the Strasbourg approach to the art 8 cases where the interference with the 'right to respect' for the home did not consist of an application for possession by the owner. (1) In Gillow v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 335, a Guernsey case, the issue concerned a provision of the housing legislation under which a person not resident in Guernsey required a licence to take up residence there. This provision was applied to Mr and Mrs Gillow. They were refused a licence and their occupation of the residence they had acquired for themselves some years earlier was declared unlawful by the domestic courts. On their complaint to Strasbourg the court examined all the facts, held that the housing law provisions were not per se inconsistent with art 8 but that the decision to refuse Mr and Mr Gillow the requisite licence did constitute an art 8 breach (see 353 (para 58)). (2) Buckley v UK (1997) 23 EHRR 101 is an important case. This was a gipsy case. The art 8 issue arose because the applicant, who with her family lived in caravans on land that she had acquired for that purpose, had been refused planning permission for that use of the land. An enforcement notice had been served. The Commission had held that the enforcement notice was 'excessive and disproportionate' (at 120 (para 84)) but the case then went to the full court. The court looked carefully at the justification for the application of the statutory planning controls to the applicant, noted (at 129 (para 74)) that it was for the national authorities to make the initial assessment of the necessity for the enforcement measures and said (at 130 (para 76)) that—

> '[w]henever discretion capable of interfering with the enjoyment of a Convention right such as the one at issue in the present case is conferred on national authorities, the procedural safeguards available to the individual will be especially material in determining whether the respondent State has, when fixing the regulatory framework, remained within its margin of appreciation. Indeed it is settled law that ... the decision-making process leading to measures of interference must be fair and such as to afford due respect to the interests safeguarded to the individual by Article 8.'

The court then (at 132 (para 84)) held that the planning authorities, in deciding to apply enforcement measures, had paid proper regard to the applicants' interests. The court emphasised that 'it is not the court's task to sit in appeal on the merits of [the planning authorities'] decision'. So no violation of the applicant's art 8 rights was found. I would, however, draw particular attention to the court's emphasis on the need for 'procedural safeguards'. This emphasis is found also in Connors v UK.

[152] I have mentioned Gillow v UK and Buckley v UK, neither of which was a possession order case, for the purpose of the contrast they present when compared with the ordinary housing possession cases. There are several other non-possession order cases but none adds anything to assist in the clarification of the Strasbourg jurisprudence relating to the possession cases. I should mention, however, Larkos v Cyprus (1999) 7 BHRC 244. This was a possession case which, on analysis, seems to me to have had a good deal in common with, and therefore to be of assistance in understanding, Connors v UK. The applicant, Larkos, was a tenant of the house in which he lived. His landlord was the government. His tenancy was terminated by the government and an eviction order was made against him. This, as I would now accept, was an interference with his art 8 right to respect for his home. Statutory provisions applicable in Cyprus gave a degree of security of tenure to domestic tenants that did not extend to domestic tenants of government-owned property. The applicant complained that this statutory discrimination constituted a violation of his rights under art 14 of the convention in conjunction with art 8. He said there was no good reason why he should enjoy less protection than tenants of private landlords. Both the Commission and the court agreed. The court (at 252 (para 31)) said that—

> 'the legislation was intended as a measure of social protection for tenants ... A decision not to extend that protection to government tenants living side by side with tenants in privately-owned dwellings requires specific justification . . .' a —and that the government had failed to provide 'any convincing explanation' for that decision.

[153] In Qazi's case the majority, of whom I was one, held that 'contractual and proprietary rights to possession cannot be defeated by a defence based on article 8' (at [84] per Lord Hope of Craighead). Mr Qazi and his wife had been tenants of a local authority house. They had parted company and Mrs Qazi had served a notice to quit on the landlords. This had the effect in law of terminating the tenancy. Mr Qazi wanted to remain in the house and applied for a new tenancy in his sole name; but his application was refused. The council said they wanted to let the house to someone else on their housing list. They instituted possession proceedings in the county court. Mr Qazi had no right under ordinary domestic law to remain in the house but he resisted the possession application on the ground that his art 8 right to respect for his home was being unlawfully interfered with. The trial judge held that once his legal and equitable right to occupy the house had come to an end the house could not constitute his 'home' for art 8 purposes. So the judge made a possession order. The Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 1834, [2002] HLR 276) did not agree that the house no longer constituted Mr Qazi's home and remitted the case to the county court in order for the issue as to whether the interference with his art 8 right could be justified under art 8(2) to be decided. On the council's appeal to this House we all agreed that the Court of Appeal's conclusion on the 'home' issue was correct but the majority took the view that it would be pointless to remit the case to the county court since it was plain that the art 8(2) point would have to be decided in the council's favour.

[154] The conformity of the majority's opinion on the art 8(2) point with Strasbourg jurisprudence was confirmed when Mr Qazi took his art 8 complaint to Strasbourg where it was peremptorily dismissed. The court dismissed his complaint as being manifestly ill-founded and inadmissible. This decision by the court was entirely consistent with their 1995 decision in Ure v UK App No 28027/95 (27 November 1996, unreported). My noble and learned friend Lord Bingham (at [23], above) has expressed doubt whether any reliable inference can be drawn from the finding of inadmissibility made in respect of Mr Qazi's application. The inference I would draw is the obvious one, namely, that the court thought his art 8 complaint could not succeed because his eviction could clearly be justified under art 8(2). His tenancy had come to an end and there was nothing more to be said. I would draw comparable inferences from the decisions in S v UK, in Di Palma v UK and in Wood v UK.

[155] It is true that the Strasbourg jurisprudence is not entirely consistent. In Ure v UK, for instance, the Commission appear to have reviewed the manner in which the council had 'balanced the various interests involved, such as the interest of the leaving co-tenant, of those in need of accommodation, and of the applicant' before concluding that the council's decision to evict the applicant was neither arbitrary nor unreasonable. And in Marzari v Italy (1999) 28 EHRR CD 175, where the applicant had been evicted for failure to pay his rent and had prayed in aid, in support of his art 8 complaint, his serious medical condition, the court (at 180) said that—

'[t]o the extent that the [Trentino Institute for Housing] aimed at recovering possession of the apartment on the ground that the applicant had ceased to pay the rent, the Court considers that the impugned decision had a legitimate purpose under paragraph 2 of Article 8, namely the protection of the rights of others . . .'

but then went on to consider the applicant's medical condition in connection with the question whether the eviction was necessary in a democratic society. The court found that it was, mainly, I think, because the applicant had been 'never co-operative' and had not 'use[d] the [a]venues which were available to him and which were even pointed out to him in order to avoid the eviction'. Very similar comments could have been made about the applicant in Di Palma v UK.

[156] None the less, despite some inconsistencies, the state of Strasbourg jurisprudence, at the time Connors v UK was decided, exhibited, in relation to art 8 defences to possession applications made by the owners of properties that constituted the homes of the occupiers from whom possession was sought, the following features: (1) There had been no case in which the grant of a possession order to enable the owner to evict from possession a person who was, or had become, a trespasser had been held to constitute a breach of the latter's art 8 right to respect for his home. (2) In the majority of cases the right of the owner to a possession order had been treated as axiomatic once it had become clear that the occupier had no contractual or proprietary right as against the owner to remain in possession. (3) But if the domestic law rules applicable to the relationship between the owner and the occupier included some unusual feature that placed the occupier in a position of particular disadvantage, that feature of the law, if insufficiently or unconvincingly justified, might lead to a finding of an art 8 infringement. It may be that Larkos v Cyprus should be regarded as an example of this. It so happens that the complaint made was an art 14 complaint. But the grounds on which the complaint was held to be well founded seem to me to show that if the complaint had been couched as an art 8 complaint it would, for the same reasons, have been held to be well founded.

[157] Both Connors v UK and Blecic v Croatia are, in my opinion, consistent with this analysis of the pre-Connors v UK jurisprudence. There are three features of Connors v UK that contributed to the court's conclusion that the eviction of the family from the local authority caravan site constituted a breach of their art 8 right to respect for their home.

[158] First, the security of tenure given by the Mobile Homes Act 1983 to travellers licensed to station their caravans on privately owned caravan sites was not extended to travellers licensed to station their caravans on local authority owned sites. The court was not persuaded by the government's attempt to justify this discrimination which raised an issue of the same nature as that which in Larkos v Cyprus had been successfully raised as an art 14 issue. In Larkos v Cyprus the result would have been the same if the complaint had been an art 8 complaint. In Connors v UK the result on this point would have been the same if the complaint had been dealt with as an art 14 complaint.

[159] Second, Strasbourg jurisprudence in relation to art 8 and gipsies has established that contracting states have a positive obligation 'to facilitate the gipsy way of life' (see the Connors v UK judgment at 663 (para 84)). The court said that—

> 'some special consideration should be given to their needs and their different lifestyle both in the relevant regulatory framework and in reaching decisions in particular cases . . .'

It was this requirement for 'special consideration' to be given to gipsies that led the Court of Appeal in the Lambeth case to conclude that the principles expressed by the Strasbourg Court in Connors v UK were not applicable to Kay and the other Bruton tenants. a [160] The third notable feature of Connors v UK is the importance placed by the court on 'procedural safeguards'. The applicant had sought permission to apply for judicial review of the local authority's decision to terminate his licence to remain on the caravan site. But the High Court had refused permission. In consequence, the reasons why the local authority had wanted him off the site were never b challenged in court proceedings. Under the applicable domestic law the local authority did not have to justify their decision to terminate his licence but in fact their reason had been that they thought Mr Connors and his family had been making a nuisance of themselves on the site. Mr Connors denied that that was so but, his attempt to seek judicial review of the decision having foundered, the issue c was never judicially tested.

[161] The three features to which I have referred provide the context for the Strasbourg Court's Connors v UK judgment, a context that has no counterpart in the facts of either of the appeals now before the House (nor in the facts of Qazi's case). There is no unusual or discriminatory feature of the legal framework under which Lambeth in the Bruton tenancy appeals and Leeds in the Maloney appeal d became entitled to possession orders in respect of their respective properties. In the Maloney case, whatever positive obligation there may be for Leeds to provide sites for gipsies and their caravans, the Maloney family cannot claim that two days of trespassing with their caravans on a local authority recreation ground enabled them to claim an art 8 right of respect for the patch of recreation ground on which they e happen to have parked the caravans.

[162] As to 'procedural safeguards', each of the Bruton tenants filed a pleading setting out the basis on which his art 8 defence, as well as his domestic law defence, was based. The art 8 defences were given due judicial consideration but were struck out as being incapable of constituting a defence to Lambeth's possession f claim. Whatever 'procedural safeguards' are requisite, they cannot bar a court from ruling in a particular case that the pleaded facts and matters relied on are not capable of outweighing in the balance the contractual and/or proprietary right to possession of the owner of the property in question. If the home occupier thinks the judge's ruling to be in error, the ruling can, as happened in the Bruton tenancy cases, be reviewed on appeal, or on an application for permission to appeal. g

[163] Blecic v Croatia (2005) 41 EHRR 185 is an interesting example of the Strasbourg Court's approach to a case where the interference with the home has involved an unusual statutory provision. Blecic v Croatia was not a case of an owner of property seeking possession from a home occupier. Mrs Blecic had left her flat in Zadar, Croatia, which she occupied under a 'specially protected' tenancy granted h by the local authority, in order to visit her daughter in Rome. While she was away armed conflict erupted in the area, her pension ceased to be paid and she lost the right to medical insurance. So she stayed in Rome for some nine months. During her absence another family moved into her flat and the local authority commenced proceedings to terminate her tenancy. The proceedings were taken in reliance on j a provision of the applicable housing legislation which said that a specially protected tenancy could be terminated if the tenant ceased to occupy the flat for a period exceeding six months without justified reasons. So the issue was whether Mrs Blecic had justified reasons for staying away for nine months. The course of the proceedings was somewhat convoluted but, despite some successes in the lower courts, Mrs Blecic lost both in the Croatian Supreme Court and in the Constitutional Court. She then took her complaint to Strasbourg and lost there as well.

[164] The Strasbourg Court explained its approach (at 197 (para 65)). They said that in socio-economic matters such as housing the domestic authorities should be accorded a wide margin of appreciation and that the judgment of the domestic authorities as to what was necessary to achieve its objectives should be respected unless that judgment was manifestly without reasonable foundation. They said that the court—

> 'will accept the judgment of the domestic authorities as to what is necessary in a democratic society unless that judgment is manifestly without reasonable foundation, that is, unless the measure employed is manifestly disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued.'

The court held, further (at 198 (para 70)) that they were satisfied—

> 'that the procedural requirements implicit in Art. 8 of the Convention were complied with and that [Mrs Blecic] was involved in the decision-making process to a degree sufficient to provide her with the requisite protection of her interests.'

So Mrs Blecic lost.

[165] It is informative, I think, to compare what was said in Blecic v Croatia with what had been said nine months earlier in Connors v UK. Where interference with gipsies' art 8 rights had happened, the court said that 'particularly weighty reasons of public interest by way of justification' were required and that the margin of appreciation to be afforded to the national authorities 'must be regarded as correspondingly narrowed' (see Connors v UK at 663 (para 86)). Accordingly, the court was not persuaded that 'the necessity for a statutory scheme which permitted the summary eviction of the applicant and his family [had] been sufficiently demonstrated' (see Connors v UK at 666 (para 94)). But in Blecic v Croatia, a housing case, the margin of appreciation was held to be wide and the judgment of the domestic authorities was to be accepted unless manifestly ill-founded.

[166] In both Connors v UK and Blecic v Croatia the Strasbourg Court reviewed with art 8 spectacles, first, the legal framework under which the home occupier had been deprived of his home. In Blecic v Croatia that framework passed muster. In Connors v UK it did not. Second, the court reviewed the manner in which the legal framework had been applied. In Blecic v Croatia that, too, passed muster. In Connors v UK, the review was of the local authority's decision to seek a court order to evict the Connors family. The only domestic law review of that decision consisted of the adverse ruling on the application for permission to seek judicial review of the decision. That review was held to be inadequate.

[167] So what are the implications of these two Strasbourg judgments, first, for the House's decision in Qazi's case and, more important, for the appeals now before the House? As to Qazi's case, the domestic law which left Mr Qazi, one of the joint tenants, without a tenancy once his wife, the other joint tenant, had served a notice to quit terminating the tenancy, had no special or discriminatory feature which might have attracted the attention of the Strasbourg Court on an art 8 review—as, indeed, the result when Qazi's case did reach Strasbourg demonstrated. As to the decision of the local authority to seek possession of the property from Mr Qazi and not to grant him a new tenancy, that decision, on the approach exemplified in Blecic v Croatia, was within the wide margin of appreciation available to local housing authorities faced with conflicting demands for a scarce commodity. This, too, is demonstrated by Strasbourg's rejection of Mr Qazi's art 8 complaint. The conclusion that the decision in Qazi's case is consistent with Strasbourg jurisprudence is further supported by the absence of any mention of Qazi's case either by counsel in the course of the Connors v UK hearing or by the Strasbourg Court in its Connors v UK judgment.

[168] It is right to notice, however, that Connors v UK and Blecic v Croatia do show that in two types of case where an owner is seeking to recover possession of his property the absence of any contractual or proprietary right of the home occupier to remain in possession may not be conclusive. The first type of case is where an arguable art 8 objection can be taken to some aspect of the statutory and common law rules that entitle the owner to possession. Connors v UK was such a case. So was Larkos v Cyprus. So, too, was Blecic v Croatia although the argument in the end failed. The second type of case is where the procedural means available to the home occupier for challenging the decision by the owner of the property to evict him are inadequate. Connors v UK was thought by the Strasbourg Court to be such a case. Subject to that qualification, the conclusion of the Court of Appeal in Leeds that Connors v UK and Qazi's case could not stand together and that a decision had to be taken as to which to follow is a conclusion with which I respectfully disagree.

[169] As for these appeals, may I consider first the Lambeth appeals. The possession orders sought by Lambeth engage the art 8 right to respect for the home of the respective occupiers from whom possession was sought. But an order for possession was in accordance with domestic law. As against Lambeth the occupiers had become trespassers with no right to remain in occupation. There was nothing discriminatory or unusual about the statutory and common law framework that produced that result nor about the absence of any statutory protection given to the occupiers by the housing legislation. I respectfully agree with my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill's remarks at [36], above that the balance required by art 8(2) to be struck was struck by the general law, that the public authority owner had a right to manage and control its property within the bounds set by statute, that the occupier acquired only a limited right to occupy and that on due determination of that right, a claim by the owner must ordinarily succeed. The appellants, the Bruton tenants of LQHT, could not resist Lambeth's possession applications on art 8 grounds unless either they mounted an art 8 attack on the legal framework that entitled Lambeth to possession or they attacked on art 8 grounds Lambeth's decision to seek possession. The first attack was not attempted, and, if it had been, would in my opinion have been bound to fail. There is nothing the matter, from an art 8 standpoint, with a common law rule which gives the owner of property, which is occupied as a home by a person who has no right as against the owner to remain there, the right to recover possession of the property. Parliament's omission to provide any statutory security of tenure for home occupiers in the position in which the Bruton tenants found themselves is well within the wide margin of appreciation referred to in Blecic v Croatia.

[170] As to the decision of Lambeth to seek possession of the properties occupied by the Bruton tenants, I agree with and adopt the conclusion expressed by Lord Bingham at [47], above. No facts have been pleaded or alleged by the appellants which outweigh the right and the duty of Lambeth to manage its housing stock. The wide margin of appreciation referred to in Blecic v Croatia must be accorded to Lambeth.

[171] The art 8 defences were struck out by Judge Roger Cooke. They were in my opinion rightly struck out. If a defendant does not plead or allege sufficient facts which, if made good, could constitute a defence, the defence can be struck out.

On the facts pleaded and alleged in the art 8 defences the defences could not have succeeded.

[172] Nor, in my opinion, where a home occupier has no contractual or proprietary right to remain in possession as against the owner of the property, could an art 8 defence based on no more than the personal circumstances of the occupier and his family ever succeed. Connors v UK is no authority to the contrary. The successful art 8 defence in Connors v UK was founded on a combination of Mr Connors's inability to enjoy the security of tenure advantages afforded by statute to occupiers of privately owned caravan sites and on the Strasbourg Court's perception (which I think was an unjustified perception) of a lack of sufficient procedural safeguards enabling him to dispute the grounds which had led the council to terminate his site licence.

[173] As to the Leeds appeal, first, it is inconceivable, I repeat, that the part of the recreation ground occupied by the caravans could in two days have become the Maloney home for art 8 purposes. But, second, even if that were not so, Leeds had an unimpeachable right to evict them and restore the site to use as a recreation ground for the benefit of the public generally. No court, domestic or in Strasbourg, has ever suggested that a person who enters and remains on land as a trespasser can assert an art 8 right to respect for the home he has unlawfully established on the land as a defence to the owner's eviction proceedings. In Connors v UK the defendant did not enter as a trespasser. He had for some 14 years held a licence entitling him to park his caravans on the caravan site. When the art 8(2) balance is struck in a case with facts like those in the Leeds case the balance must at once come down with a resounding clank in favour of the local authority. An art 8 defence in such a case could not ever succeed.

[174] For these reasons, and in agreement with the reasons given by my noble and learned friends Lord Hope of Craighead, Baroness Hale of Richmond and Lord Brown of Eaton-under-Heywood, these appeals should in my opinion be dismissed. And, for the avoidance of any doubt I wish to express my agreement, in particular, with the whole of Lord Hope's [110].

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

[175] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead. I agree that these appeals should be dismissed for the reasons which they give.

[176] In an earlier draft of this speech I tried to envisage the sort of highly exceptional circumstances in which (as in Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639) domestic law might fail to show the respect for the home required by art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). On reflection, however, I think that such an exercise would be speculative and unhelpful. As Lord Bingham says, the practical experience of county court judges is likely to prove the surest guide, so long as they bear in mind the stringency of the test.

[177] I am in full agreement with Lord Bingham on the issue of judicial precedent. I am also in full agreement with my noble and learned friend Lord Scott of Foscote on the private law issue which arises in the Lambeth appeal.

BARONESS HALE OF RICHMOND.

[178] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading, indeed of re-reading several times, the draft opinions circulated by your Lordships. I agree with, and have nothing to add to, the opinions of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill, on the question of precedent, and of my noble and learned friend, Lord Scott of Foscote, on the issue of domestic law arising in the Lambeth cases. On the main issues, however, while there are many points upon which we are all agreed, there is one matter upon which we remain divided.

[179] First, there is no reason to suppose that the actual outcome of the decision of this House in Harrow London BC v Qazi [2003] UKHL 43, [2003] 4 All ER 461, [2004] 1 AC 983 was incompatible with Mr Qazi's right to respect for his home guaranteed by art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). The European Court of Human Rights would not otherwise have found his complaint inadmissible. However, if the ratio decidendi of the majority's decision was that the enforcement of a right to possession in accordance with the domestic law of property can never be incompatible with that right, then it must now be modified in the light of the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639. There both the local authority and the court had acted entirely in accordance with the domestic law but the United Kingdom was nevertheless held to have acted in breach of art 8.

[180] Secondly, however, we are all agreed that in the vast majority of cases, the right of a public landowner to enforce a claim to possession of his own land in accordance with the relevant domestic law would automatically supply the justification required by art 8(2) for an interference with the occupier's right to respect for his home. By definition, it would be 'in accordance with the law'; it would serve the legitimate aim of protecting the property rights of the landowner and in some cases the rights of neighbouring occupiers; and it would be proportionate to that aim, the proper balance between the competing rights having been struck by Parliament: see Lord Bingham at [35], [36], above. If that is so, in most cases, granting a possession order in accordance with the domestic law would be the only means available of protecting the right which the landowner wished to assert, and thus could not be disproportionate in the individual case.

[181] Thirdly, we are all agreed that there can be no question of requiring the public landowner to plead and prove individual justification for that interference in every case: see Lord Bingham at [29], above. This was Mr Luba QC's bold submission to us on behalf of the occupiers in these cases. He was right to make that submission, as he recognised that it was the logical consequence of the case which he was putting forward: that the analysis adopted by the Strasbourg Court in the cases found admissible should also be adopted in county and sheriff courts up and down the land when considering any claim for the possession of premises where a person lives. Is it the defendant's home? Will the order interfere with his right to respect for that home? Is that interference in accordance with the law? Does it serve a legitimate aim? Is the interference 'necessary in a democratic society', ie proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued?

[182] As I understand it, none of your Lordships accepts that the sequential approach adopted in Strasbourg to the cases which it declares admissible should be adopted in the general run of possession actions. This is because the court is entitled to make two assumptions. The first is that the domestic law has struck the right balance between the competing interests involved: those of a person occupying premises as his home and those of the landowner seeking to regain possession of those premises in accordance with the law. The second is that the landowner, if a public authority, has acted compatibly with the convention rights of the individual occupier in deciding to enforce its proprietary rights.

[183] Hence it is only if the occupier advances grounds for challenging either or both of those assumptions that there need be any modification to present practice. Under CPR 24.2, the court may give summary judgment against a defendant if it considers that the defendant has no real prospect of successfully defending the claim. This is similar to but wider than the power to strike out all or part of the written statement of case in CPR 3.4.

[184] So far, so good. Let us next suppose a Connors v UK type of case. There an argument could readily be raised that United Kingdom property law did not strike the right balance. Someone who had lived, perfectly lawfully, on a designated gipsy caravan site for many years could be evicted without any good cause being shown, whereas someone who lived on a site governed by the Mobile Homes Act 1983 could only be evicted for cause. The gipsies had no means of challenging the reasons why the local authority wanted to evict them. This discrimination could not be justified.

[185] My Lords, we are all agreed that it must be possible for the defendant in a possession action to claim that the balance between respect for his home and the property rights of the owner, struck by the general law in the type of case of which his is an example, does not comply with the convention. We also agree that the cases in which such a claim will have a real prospect of success are rare. This is an area of the law much trampled over by the legislature as it has tried to respond to shifting and conflicting social and economic pressures. If there were enough suitable and affordable housing to share amongst those who needed it there would be no problem. But there is not, so priorities have to be established, either by Parliament or by the public sector landlord, who has to allocate this scarce resource in accordance with the priorities set by Parliament.

[186] The balance has changed over time in accordance with what were perceived to be the needs of the time. Once upon a time, it was thought necessary to control the freedom of private landlords to let for such terms and on such rents as the market allowed. Public sector landlords, on the other hand, could be left to manage the public housing stock in a responsible manner. Then things changed. Controls over private landlords were progressively relaxed, although never abandoned, with a view to expanding the supply of privately rented homes. Controls over public sector landlords, on the other hand, were increased and public sector tenants were given the security which previously only private sector tenants had enjoyed. This and other measures reduced the supply of public sector rented homes. These were all intensely political judgments. The extent to which, and the terms on which, public authorities should be engaged in providing housing for those who for whatever reason cannot or will not buy it on the private market was one of the most politically controversial issues of the twentieth century.

[187] To the extent that a court insists that a public authority does not rely upon its right to evict an occupier, it is obliging that public authority to continue to supply that person with a home in circumstances where Parliament has not obliged (and may not even have empowered) it to do so. In this politically contentious area of social and economic policy, any court should think long and hard before intervening in the balance currently struck by the elected legislature. There may be more scope for argument in a case not covered by statute, but the most obvious example of that is a trespasser who has never had any right to occupy the premises in question.

[188] We are also agreed as to the procedural route whereby a challenge to the general law may be made. Section 7(1) of the 1998 Act provides that a person who wishes to rely upon his convention rights may do so either in a free-standing action or by defending an action brought against him by a public authority. In those very rare cases where a person may be evicted from his home without any court order at all, a challenge would have to be raised by way of a free-standing action or judicial review. Otherwise, a defence can be raised in the possession action itself. However, the county court will not always be able to supply a remedy. In some cases the statute under which it is operating may be sufficiently flexible to enable the argument to be accommodated. But in many others, it will not. The very source of the complaint of incompatibility will be the inflexibility of the statutory scheme, leaving no discretion to the county court. The court will then have to decide whether the interpretative obligation in s 3 of the 1998 Act will enable it to solve the problem. If not, the matter could only be resolved by a declaration of incompatibility in the High Court, which would have no effect upon the outcome of the individual case.

[189] Thus far I believe that we are all agreed. But, as I understand it, some of your Lordships would go further and accept that there may be highly exceptional cases in which the occupier could argue that his individual personal circumstances made the application of the general law disproportionate in his case. When, if at all, should the court be able to say that, even [though] there is no obligation to continue to provide housing in these circumstances, it is not 'necessary in a democratic society' to permit the landowner to assert its property rights?

[190] My Lords, I myself do not think that the purpose of art 8 was to oblige a social landlord to continue to supply housing to a person who has no right in domestic law to continue to be supplied with that housing, assuming that the general balance struck by domestic law was not amenable to attack and that the authority's decision to invoke that law was not open to judicial review on conventional grounds. It should not be forgotten that in an appropriate case, the range of considerations which any public authority should take into account in deciding whether to invoke its powers can be very wide: see R v Lincolnshire CC, ex p Atkinson (1995) 8 Admin LR 529, R (on the application of Casey) v Crawley BC [2006] EWHC 301 (Admin), [2006] LGR 239.

[191] There is no doubt that art 8 entails both negative obligations—not to interfere—and positive obligations—to secure the right to respect for a person's private and family life, his home and his correspondence. But it does not confer any right to health or welfare benefits or to housing. The extent to which any member state assumes responsibility for supplying these is very much a matter for that member state. In this country, housing law defines the extent of the obligation and the power to provide housing at public expense. Social services law defines the extent of the obligation to provide services (which sometimes includes assistance with housing) for vulnerable people, such as children, the elderly, the sick and the disabled. If social services law does not provide assistance to an occupier whose personal circumstances are said to make eviction from this particular accommodation disproportionate, then I question whether housing law should be made to do so. In an appropriate case, it is incumbent upon the housing authority to liaise with the social services and education authorities before deciding to take action. There is nothing in the jurisprudence to indicate that art 8 requires more of them than is already required.

[192] The convention began life as a code of individual civil and political rights, not a code of social and economic rights. The distinction between the two is not clear-cut, particularly in the context of art 8. But to refuse to allow a landowner to recover possession of the dwelling to which he is entitled is to impose upon him a positive obligation to continue to make those premises available to the occupier. There might be more scope for argument where the claim lies in common law unregulated by legislation, but in such cases the landowner is likely to be a private person, upon whom no such positive obligation could be laid, or the occupiers are likely to be squatters who have never had a right to occupy the premises. There is nothing yet in the Strasbourg jurisprudence to require a reconsideration of the rule in McPhail v persons, names unknown [1973] 3 All ER 393, [1973] Ch 447. In common, therefore, with my noble and learned friends Lord Scott of Foscote and Lord Brown of Eaton under Heywood, I agree with the conclusions reached by my noble and learned friend, Lord Hope of Craighead, set out in [110], above.

[193] Each of the cases before us is a classic example of one in which a defence based upon art 8 would have no real prospect of success. In the Leeds case, it cannot plausibly be asserted that the respondents had established a home on the recreation ground. There was therefore no convention right to be interfered with. In the Lambeth cases, the occupiers had undoubtedly established homes in the dwellings but they had done so on terms which made them vulnerable, like many sub-tenants, to the superior claims of the landowner. Lambeth's attempts to evict them were in accordance with the law and in pursuit of the legitimate aim of regaining control over this short life housing stock. All the 'Bruton tenants' were offered alternative accommodation. It would take a very different case from that pleaded to give their claims to remain in the particular dwellings occupied a real prospect of success.

[194] In agreement with all of your Lordships, therefore, I would dismiss both appeals.

LORD BROWN OF EATON-UNDER-HEYWOOD.

[195] My Lords, the most important single question arising upon these appeals is to my mind whether a trial judge, seised of a home repossession claim, must in every case where the occupier seeks to raise a defence under art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) consider, however peremptorily, whether the particular facts of the case enable (indeed require) him to make an order (either withholding or postponing possession) more favourable to the occupier than would be permissible under the applicable domestic property law.

[196] In Harrow London BC v Qazi [2003] UKHL 43, [2003] 4 All ER 461, [2004] 1 AC 983, the House by a majority held that 'contractual and proprietary rights to possession cannot be defeated by a defence based on art 8' (at [84] per Lord Hope of Craighead); 'there is no lack of respect, and no infringement of art 8, where the [possession] order is made in favour of the person entitled to possession by national law' (at [107] per Lord Millett); '[a]rticle 8 cannot be raised to defeat contractual and proprietary rights to possession' (at [149] per Lord Scott of Foscote). The dissenting view of the minority (Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Steyn) was that in every home repossession case the question of justification under art 8(2), if raised, has to be considered although the domestic property law is 'likely to be crucial' (at [12] per Lord Bingham) and 'the occasions on which a court would be justified in declining to make a possession order would be very highly exceptional' (at [25] per Lord Bingham).

[197] It is now contended by the appellants that two subsequent decisions of the European Court of Human Rights, Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639 and Blecic v Croatia (2005) 41 EHRR 185, are inconsistent with the majority view in Qazi's case and support instead the approach of the minority.

[198] For my part I would accept that the recent Strasbourg jurisprudence requires some qualification to be placed on the Qazi principle; I cannot, however, agree that it requires, as the minority in Qazi's case suggested, the consideration (even if usually only the most cursory consideration) of an art 8 defence every time it is raised. My opinion is rather, and at this stage I state it very broadly, that although art 8 is clearly engaged in every home repossession case, its requirements are satisfied provided only and always, first, that the substantive domestic law under which the order is sought strikes an acceptable balance between the competing needs and rights at stake and, secondly, that that law is properly applied by the domestic court with the occupier being given a fair opportunity to invoke any defence available to him under it. If either of those two conditions is not satisfied then, I accept, a complaint would properly sound under art 8. But, as I shall seek to show, it by no means follows that art 8 provides the occupier in such cases with a free-standing defence independent of whatever rights he may have under domestic law.

[199] Connors v UK exemplifies a failure of the first condition: the domestic law under which possession was sought and ordered could not be justified: only gipsies (indeed only gipsies living on local authority caravan sites) were excluded from the protection afforded by the Mobile Homes Act 1983 to those living in caravans or mobile homes as their only or main residence. I shall return to Connors v UK in a little more detail later. Blecic v Croatia illustrates the application of both conditions although in the event the European Court of Human Rights found that both were satisfied: Croatia's domestic law, under which a specially-protected tenancy was terminable if the tenant was unjustifiably absent for six months, was held to be within the wide margin of appreciation available to a state in implementing social and economic policy; and the domestic law had been reasonably and fairly applied—'the bodies, judicial amongst others, that are called upon to interpret and apply the laws in force' being afforded the same 'wide margin of appreciation' as 'the domestic legislature' (see 197 (para 65)).

[200] The modest qualification which Connors v UK now requires to be made to the Qazi principle is that a defence to possession proceedings based upon the contention that our domestic law is incompatible with the occupier's art 8 rights is theoretically available to him. I say theoretically available because it seems to me that it will not in fact be open to the trial judge (whether in the High Court or, as will almost invariably be the case, the county court) to decide the case other than in accordance with the domestic law. Take, for example, the case of Connors v UK itself. Because the local authority there, once the defendant had disputed the original ground (essentially nuisance in breach of his licence conditions) on which possession was sought, relied instead on its absolute right to terminate his licence on notice, there was simply no answer to the claim under domestic law. The European Court of Human Rights found this law unjustifiable; the government having failed in its attempt to justify the exclusion of local authority gipsy sites from the protection otherwise available under the 1983 Act. Rather the court concluded (at 663 (para 84)), consistently with its judgment in Chapman v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 48 (a planning case, of course, not a possession case), that, because of 'the vulnerable position of gipsies as a minority', art 8 imposes 'a positive obligation' on the state 'to facilitate the gipsy way of life'. The court therefore concluded (at 666–667 (para 95)) that the eviction—

> 'was not attended by the requisite procedural safeguards, namely the requirement to establish proper justification for the serious interference with his rights and consequently cannot be regarded as justified by a "pressing social need" or proportionate to the legitimate aim being pursued . . .'

and so was in violation of art 8. That this was because of the deficiency in the substantive domestic law, however, is plain from the terms in which the court rejected Mr Connors' further complaint under art 13 (at 668 (para 109)):

> 'Article 13 does not go so far as to guarantee a remedy allowing a contracting state's primary legislation to be challenged before a national authority on grounds that it is contrary to the Convention. The applicant's complaints related in essence to the exemption conferred on local authority gypsy sites by the Mobile Homes Act 1983.'

There is, indeed, a striking resemblance between Connors v UK and the earlier (non-gipsy) case of Larkos v Cyprus (1999) 7 BHRC 244 in which the European Court of Human Rights found a violation of art 14 taken in conjunction with art 8 because Larkos v Cyprus, as a government tenant, did not enjoy the same security of tenure under domestic law as was enjoyed by tenants of private landlords.

[201] Following the decision in Connors v UK the domestic legislation was amended. With effect from 18 January 2005 s 4 of the Caravan Sites Act 1968 was amended by s 211 of the Housing Act 2004 to permit the county court to suspend, for up to 12 months at a time, any possession order in respect of a local authority caravan site which the court would otherwise be bound to make. Now, therefore, the county court would be entitled to suspend the order made against someone in Mr Connors' position; previously, it was not.

[202] By the same token moreover that the county court judge would have been unable, under the pre-existing law, to decline or postpone a possession order in the case of someone in Mr Connors' position, so too in my judgment he is unable in other cases to give greater effect or weight to the occupier's right to respect for his home than is allowed for under domestic law, whether that law is to be found in legislation or under the common law, or indeed a mixture of both. I refer to a mixture of both because there will be many cases where the landlord's contractual or proprietorial rights fall to be determined essentially under the common law but which nevertheless are affected by general statutory provisions. Section 3 of the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, for example, under the heading 'Prohibition of eviction without due process of law', precludes the owner from enforcing his right to recover possession of his premises once the tenancy comes to an end 'otherwise than by proceedings in the court'. And s 89 of the Housing Act 1980, under the heading 'Restriction on discretion of court in making orders for possession of land', prevents the court in certain cases from postponing (whether by the order or any variation, suspension or stay of execution) the giving up of possession of premises for more than 14 days, save where that would cause 'exceptional hardship' when the total permitted postponement is extended to six weeks.

[203] Of course, where the domestic law requires the court to make a judgment (most notably perhaps in those cases under Sch 2 to the Housing Act 1985 where repossession can only be ordered if the court considers it reasonable), or to exercise a discretion, the judge will bear in mind that he is performing this task in the context of the defendant's art 8 right to respect for his home. But where under domestic law the owner's right to possession is plainly made out (whether at common law or, for example, under the legislation providing for assured shorthold tenancies or introductory tenancies), the judge in my opinion has no option but to assume that our domestic law properly strikes the necessary balances between competing interests (as envisaged in [32] and [33] of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham's judgment) and that in applying it properly he is accordingly discharging his duty under s 6 of the 1998 Act. Where s 89 of the 1980 Act applies, the judge will to that extent have a discretion to postpone possession. That apart, however, he has no discretion and the order must be made, leading to the eventual execution of the warrant for possession. Where no statutory protection is afforded to occupiers that should be assumed to be Parliament's will: sometimes that will be clearly evident from the terms of the governing legislation (as in the cases considered by Lord Bingham at [35], above); even, however, where the owner's rights arise at common law, the absence of statutory protection must surely be, as my noble and learned friend Lord Hope suggests, the result of a deliberate decision by Parliament to leave the owner's right to recover possession in these cases unqualified. As Lord Bingham observes at [36], above it is not unrealistic to regard the general law as striking the required balance.

[204] One of the difficulties I have with the appellants' contended for application of art 8 in these cases is in understanding what sort of 'highly exceptional circumstances' (see Lord Bingham's expression at [35] and [36], above) could possibly entitle the county court judge to disregard a clear provision of domestic law so as to deprive the owner (who, according to the logic of the argument, could as well be a private landlord as a public one) of his apparently clear entitlement to possession; another is in understanding what are supposed to be the parties' respective rights and interests in the premises once the judge has felt obliged under art 8 to set aside the dictates of domestic law.

[205] I repeat, and will labour the point no further: if our domestic law is incompatible with art 8 (as it was in Connors v UK) then it is not for the county court judge to remedy it; he is to assume compatibility and simply apply the law as he finds it. That is something which county court judges have been doing for many years (long before the introduction of art 8 into domestic law): residential occupiers have never lightly been dispossessed from their homes. The rights and interests of others too, however, are at stake—and not merely landlords but the many others who also require homes—and the law as a whole has been developed to give effect to these as well.

[206] I doubt whether the legal regimes of many contracting states are more sensitive than ours to the rights of residential occupiers. If, indeed, art 8's impact upon property law is as wide-reaching as the appellants contend it is to my mind surprising that the Strasbourg jurisprudence is not replete with examples of successful claims. In fact, however, these are few and far between and, certainly in Connors v UK (and in Larkos v Cyprus), explicable by reference to unjustifiably discriminatory legislation rather than because of a want of sufficient discretion under domestic law to take account of exceptional circumstances. There is, for example, no possible support to be found in the Strasbourg case law for doubting the justifiability of the clear rule as to squatters established by the Court of Appeal in McPhail v persons, names unknown [1973] 3 All ER 393, [1973] Ch 447 (Mr McPhail himself being, one may note, a private landowner) and I would respectfully disagree with the suggestion to the contrary at [37] of Lord Bingham's opinion.

[207] I too, therefore, would dismiss both these appeals but I would do so for a reason more fundamental than that suggested by certain others of your Lordships. These appellants' defences must fail, not because they disclose no sufficient (highly exceptional) personal merit but because they depend upon establishing a free-standing art 8 right to remain in possession incompatible with the respective claimants' clear entitlement to possession under domestic property law. I would hold that no such free-standing right exists.

[208] I should perhaps just add this. These appeals were brought on the basis that it is for the trial judge, pursuant to his s 6 duty, to consider for himself the issue of justification under art 8(2) in any contested possession action. There is, however, a quite different basis upon which an occupier could challenge a public authority's claim for possession, namely on the conventional public law ground that the decision to bring the claim was itself so unreasonable as to be unlawful. Such a defence can clearly be advanced in the county court: see the decision of the House of Lords in Wandsworth London BC v Winder [1984] 3 All ER 976, [1985] AC 461.

[209] The difficulty with such a defence, however, is that it would be well nigh impossible to make good, the challenge necessarily postulating that under domestic property law the claimant authority was entitled to possession. Accordingly the argument could only be that no reasonable public authority could properly invoke that domestic law right. This would be a more stringent test than would apply were the court, as the appellants assert, under a primary duty to reach its own judgment on the justifiability of making a possession order.

[210] For my part I think that such an argument could perhaps have been mounted successfully in Connors v UK: having regard to the great length of time (most of the preceding 16 years) that that gipsy family had resided on the site, it was unreasonable, indeed grossly unfair, for the local authority to claim possession merely on the basis of a determined licence without the need to make good any underlying reason for taking such precipitate action. That was not, be it noted, the basis of the actual judicial review application for which permission in that case was sought and refused. Indeed the council's decision there to drop the allegations of breach of licence and to assert instead a right to summary possession on the bald ground that the family were trespassers (see 643–644 (para 25)) followed rather than preceded the failed judicial review challenge.

[211] It is difficult to suppose, however, that a defence based on a public law challenge of this character to a public authority's decision to pursue its domestic law rights could properly succeed except in such an infinitely rare case as Connors v UK itself. Manifestly it could not have succeeded in either of the present cases which doubtless explains why defences of this particular character were not advanced.

[212] It follows from all this I am in full agreement with what Lord Hope says at [110], above.

[213] There is nothing which I wish to add on the other issues raised on these appeals: on the question of precedent I agree with all that Lord Bingham says. On the issue as to the appellants' occupation status in the Lambeth appeal I agree with the analysis and conclusions of my noble and learned friend Lord Scott of Foscote.

Appeals dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

R (on the application of N) v Mental Health Review Tribunal (Northern Region)

[2005] EWCA Civ 1605

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SIR ANTHONY CLARKE MR, RIX AND RICHARDS LJJ

7, 8 NOVEMBER, 21 DECEMBER 2005

Mental health – Mental health review tribunal – Discharge of restricted patient – Applicant applying for discharge of restriction order – Medical evidence – Statute requiring tribunal to discharge patient if not satisfied as to statutory criteria – Applicable standard of proof – Mental Health Act 1983, ss 72, 73.

The claimant was detained under the Mental Health Act 1983. He was the subject of a hospital order and a restriction order. Under s 72(1)[a] of the 1983 Act, where an application was made by a patient to a mental health review tribunal, the tribunal was, under sub-para (b), to direct the discharge of the patient if they were not satisfied (i) that he was then suffering from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, or mental impairment, or from any of those forms of disorder of a nature or degree which made it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained for treatment, or (ii) that it was necessary for his health or safety or for the protection of other persons that he should receive such treatment. Section 73(1)[b] applied where the application to the tribunal was made by a patient subject to a restriction order. The tribunal was to direct the absolute discharge of a patient if (a) it was not satisfied as to the matters mentioned in s 72(1)(b)(i) or (ii) and (b) it was satisfied that it was not appropriate for the patient to remain liable to be recalled to hospital for further treatment. As the tribunal had to direct discharge if it was not satisfied as to the specified matters the burden was on the detaining authority to satisfy the tribunal as to those matters. The claimant applied to the tribunal which decided not to direct his discharge. He brought proceedings for judicial review of the decision of the tribunal. He contended that the tribunal had erred in its approach to the required standard of proof. The judge held, inter alia, (i) that the applicable standard of proof was the ordinary civil standard of proof and (ii) that issues under ss 72 and 73 as to the appropriateness and necessity of continuing detention or the appropriateness of the patient remaining liable to be recalled were not susceptible to a defined standard of proof but involved a process of judgment, evaluation and assessment. The judge concluded that the only misdirection by the tribunal in the claimant's case, in applying the criminal standard of proof of 'beyond reasonable doubt', had been favourable to the claimant, and that the application for judicial review had therefore to be dismissed. The claimant appealed. The court considered, inter alia, (i) whether the correct standard of proof, in relation to those issues under ss 72 and 73 that were susceptible to proof to a defined standard, was the ordinary civil standard of proof; and (ii) whether certain issues under ss 72 and 73 were not susceptible to

a Section 72, so far as material, is set out at [6], below

b Section 73, so far as material, is set out at [7], below proof to a defined standard but were to be determined by a process of evaluation and judgment.

Held – (1) The civil standard of proof, namely proof on the balance of probabilities, was flexible in its application and enabled proper account to be taken of the seriousness of the allegations to be proved and the consequences of proving them. But there was no intermediate standard between the civil standard of proof and the criminal standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt, nor was the civil standard to be broken down into sub-categories. The flexibility of the civil standard lay not in any adjustment to the degree of probability required for an allegation to be proved (such that a more serious allegation had to be proved to a higher degree of probability) but in the strength or quality of the evidence that would in practice be required for an allegation to be proved on the balance of probabilities (see [59]–[70], below); Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1 explained.

(2) Evidence of an especially high strength or quality was not required to meet the civil standard of proof in the context of ss 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act although it was axiomatic that cogent evidence would in practice be required to satisfy the tribunal, on the balance of probabilities, that the conditions for continuing detention were met. Demanding an especially high evidential requirement would subvert the obvious purpose of the 1983 Act which sought both to protect the interests of the individual whose ability to act in his own best interest was impaired and at the same time enable a proportionate balance to be struck between individual and public interests. In the instant case the approach of the tribunal could not be faulted; directing itself by reference to the balance of probabilities, it had given a reasoned basis for preferring one group of experts over the other. The body of evidence it preferred had plainly been cogent and it was clear from the tribunal's reasons that its preference had been reasonably clear cut. In the determination of other disputed issues of fact the tribunal had been wrong to adopt a standard of proof akin to the criminal standard, although as the judge had held, that had been an error favourable to the claimant. The tribunal should apply the standard of proof on the balance of probabilities to all the issues it had to determine. Although the concept of a standard of proof was not particularly helpful in relation to the process of judgment and evaluation carried out by the tribunal there was no absurdity in a tribunal having some doubt as to the appropriateness or necessity of continuing detention yet being satisfied on the balance of probabilities that it was appropriate and necessary. Accordingly, the standard of proof had a potential part to play in the decision making process even in relation to issues that were the subject of judgment and evaluation. However, the difference between that approach and the approach of the judge did not have much practical significance, given the limited role that the standard of proof would have in relation to those matters. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [72]–[77], [97]–[99], [103], [104], [108], below).

Notes

For the powers of the mental health review tribunal to direct discharge of restriction order patients, see 30(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 570.

For the Mental Health Act 1983, ss 72, 73, see 28 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 936, 938.

Cases referred to in judgment

Addington v Texas (1979) 441 US 418, US SC.
B v Chief Constable of the Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 All ER 562, [2001] 1 WLR 340, DC.
Bater v Bater [1950] 2 All ER 458, [1951] P 35, CA.
Blyth v Blyth [1966] 1 All ER 524, [1966] AC 643, [1966] 2 WLR 634, HL.
Bramblevale Ltd, Re [1969] 3 All ER 1062, [1970] Ch 128, [1969] 3 WLR 699, CA.
Briginshaw v Briginshaw (1938) 60 CLR 336, Aus HC.
Campbell v Hamlet [2005] UKPC 19, [2005] 3 All ER 1116.
Constanda v M 1997 SC 217, Ct of Sess.
Dellow's Will Trusts, Re, Lloyds Bank Ltd v Institute of Cancer Research [1964] 1 All ER 771, [1964] 1 WLR 451.
Edgington v Fitzmaurice (1885) 29 Ch D 459, [1881–5] All ER Rep 856, CA.
Gough v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary [2002] EWCA Civ 351, [2002] 2 All ER 985, [2002] QB 1213, [2002] 3 WLR 289.
H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof), Re [1996] 1 All ER 1, [1996] AC 563, [1996] 2 WLR 8, HL.
Herczegfalvy v Austria (1992) 18 BMLR 48, ECt HR.
HL v UK (2004) 17 BHRC 418, ECt HR.
Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 970, [1957] 1 QB 247, [1956] 3 WLR 1034, CA.
Hutchison Reid v UK (2003) 14 BHRC 41, ECt HR.
Khawaja v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1983] 1 All ER 765, [1984] AC 74, [1983] 2 WLR 321, HL.
R v Lichniak, R v Pyrah [2002] UKHL 47, [2002] 4 All ER 1122, [2003] 1 AC 903, [2002] 3 WLR 1834.
R (on the application of B) v S [2005] EWHC 1936 (Admin), [2005] All ER (D) 38 (Sep).
R (on the application of Brooks) v Parole Board [2004] EWCA Civ 80, [2004] All ER (D) 142 (Feb).
R (on the application of H) v London North and East Region Mental Health Review Tribunal [2001] EWCA Civ 415, (2001) 61 BMLR 163, [2002] QB 1, [2001] 3 WLR 512.
R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester, Clingham v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London BC [2002] UKHL 39, [2002] 4 All ER 593, [2003] 1 AC 787, [2002] 3 WLR 1313; affg [2001] EWCA Civ 281, [2001] 4 All ER 264, [2001] 1 WLR 1084.
R (on the application of N) v Dr M [2002] EWCA Civ 1789, [2003] 1 FCR 124, [2003] 1 WLR 562.
R (on the application of P) v Mental Health Review Tribunal (East Midlands and North East Region) [2002] EWCA Civ 697, [2002] All ER (D) 84 (Apr).
R (on the application of Sim) v Parole Board [2003] EWCA Civ 1845, [2004] QB 1288, [2004] 2 WLR 1170.
Reid v Secretary of State for Scotland [1999] 1 All ER 481, [1999] 2 AC 512, [1999] 2 WLR 28, HL.
Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman [2001] UKHL 47, [2002] 1 All ER 122, [2003] 1 AC 153, [2001] 3 WLR 877.
Smith v Smith [1952] 2 SCR 312, Can SC.
Winterwerp v Netherlands (1979) 2 EHRR 387, [1979] ECHR 6301/73, ECt HR.
Wright v Wright (1948) 77 CLR 191.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

A-G of Queensland v Kamali [1999] 106 A Crim R 269, Qld SC.
Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Rich [2005] NSWSC 62, NSW SC.
Benjamin v UK (2003) 13 BHRC 287, (2003) 36 EHRR 1, ECt HR.
Bhandari v Advocates Committee [1956] 3 All ER 742, [1956] 1 WLR 1442, PC.
Comerford v UK App No 29193/95 (9 April 1997, unreported), E Com HR.
Davis v Davis [1950] 1 All ER 40, [1950] P 125, CA.
De Wilde v Belgium (1971) 1 EHRR 373, ECt HR.
Enhorn v Sweden [2005] ECHR 56529/00, ECt HR.
Foucha v Louisiana (1992) 504 US 71, US SC.
Francisco v Diedrick (1998) Times, 3 April.
Ginesi v Ginesi [1948] 1 All ER 373, [1948] P 179, CA.
Gower v Gower [1950] 1 All ER 804, CA.
Halford v Brookes [1992] PIQR P 175.
JJB Sports plc v Office of Fair Trading, All Sports Ltd v Office of Fair Trading [2004] CAT 17, [2004] All ER (D) 23 (Oct).
Jones v US (1983) 463 US 354, US SC.
Kay v UK (1994) 40 BMLR 20, E Com HR.
Litwa v Poland (2000) 63 BMLR 199, [2000] ECHR 26629/95, ECt HR.
Loveden v Loveden 161 ER 648, [1803–13] All ER Rep 339.
MacDonald v A-G (1980) 24 SASR 294, SASC.
Miles v Cain (1989) Times, 15 December, CA.
Mordaunt v Moncrieffe [1874–80] All ER Rep 288.
Observer v UK (1991) 14 EHRR 153, [1991] ECHR 13585/88, ECt HR.
R v Oakes [1986] 1 SCR 103, Can SC.
R v Schafferius (1987) Qd R 381, Qld CCA.
R v Brixton Prison Governor, ex p Ahson [1969] 2 All ER 347, [1969] 2 QB 222, [1969] 2 WLR 618, DC.
R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Harry [1998] 3 All ER 360, [1998] 1 WLR 1737
R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p K [1990] 3 All ER 562, [1991] 1 QB 270, [1990] 3 WLR 755, CA.
R (on the application of B) v Dr SS [2005] EWHC 86 (Admin).
R (on the application of Henry) v Parole Board [2004] EWHC 784 (Admin), [2004] All ER (D) 471 (Mar).
R (on the application of the Secretary of State for the Home Department) v Mental Health Tribunal [2002] EWHC 1128 (Admin), [2002] All ER (D) 297 (May).
R (on the application of the Secretary of State for the Home Dept) v Mental Health Review Tribunal [2004] EWHC 1029 (Admin), [2004] All ER (D) 127 (Apr).
Salman v Turkey (2002) 34 EHRR 17, [2000] ECHR 21986/93, ECt HR.
Santosky v Kramer (1982) 455 US 745, US SC.
Secretary, Dept of Health and Community Services v JWB (1992) 175 CLR 218, Aust HC.
Serio v Serio (1983) 4 FLR 756, CA.
Société Colas Est v France (2004) 39 EHRR 17, ECt HR.
Solicitor, Re a [1992] 2 All ER 335, [1993] QB 69, DC.
Speiser v Randall (1958) 357 US 513, US SC.
T (children) (sexual abuse: standard of proof), Re [2004] EWCA Civ 558, [2004] 2 FLR 838, CA.
Thynne v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 666, [1990] ECHR 11787/85, ECt HR.

U (a child) (serious injury: standard of proof), Re, Re B (a child) (serious injury: standard of proof) [2004] EWCA Civ 567, [2004] 2 FCR 257, [2005] Fam 134.

Vasileva v Denmark (2003) 15 BHRC 246, ECt HR.

Winship, Re (1970) 397 US 358, US SC.

Woodby v Immigration & Naturalization Service (1966) 385 US 276, US SC.

X v UK (1981) 4 EHRR 188, [1981] ECHR 7215/75, ECt HR.

Appeal

N, a person detained pursuant to a hospital order under s 37 of the Mental Health Act 1983 and subject to a restriction order under s 41 of the 1983 Act, appealed with permission of the Court of Appeal (Pill, Clarke LJJ and Rimer J) given on 12 July 2005 from the decision of Munby J on 11 April 2005 ([2005] EWHC 587 (Admin), [2005] All ER (D) 71 (Apr)) dismissing his claim for judicial review of the decision of a Mental Health Review Tribunal on 14 August not to direct his discharge under s 73 of the 1983 Act. The Secretary of State for the Home Department appeared as an interested party. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Paul Bowen (instructed by Bindman & Partners) for the appellant.

Angus McCullough (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the tribunal.

Tim Ward (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State.

Cur adv vult

21 December 2005. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

RICHARDS LJ.

[1] This is the judgment of the court. The appellant, N, is detained at Ashworth Hospital pursuant to a hospital order under s 37 of the Mental Health Act 1983. He is also subject to a restriction order under s 41. On 14 August 2004 the Mental Health Review Tribunal decided not to direct his discharge under s 73. N brought judicial review proceedings to challenge that decision, contending that the tribunal had erred in its approach to the standard of proof. The challenge was dismissed by Munby J in a lengthy judgment ([2005] EWHC 587 (Admin), [2005] All ER (D) 71 (Apr)) handed down on 11 April 2005. Permission to appeal to this court was granted on the basis that Munby J's judgment was likely to be applied by tribunals hearing applications around the country and there were compelling reasons why the court should consider whether that judgment was correct.

[2] There were in fact two applications for judicial review before Munby J. The other application was brought by an applicant called J, who was also detained under s 37 of the 1983 Act but who was not the subject of a restriction order under s 41. In his case, because there was no restriction order, the decision not to direct discharge was made under s 72 rather than s 73. Munby J dismissed that application too, for materially identical reasons. J had been discharged from hospital prior to the hearing before Munby J and does not pursue an appeal. It is necessary, however, to consider the position under s 72 as well as s 73, since the two sections are closely related and the relevant principles are common to both.

THE STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

[3] Before the Crown Court or a magistrates' court can make a hospital order under s 37(1) of the 1983 Act, the conditions in s 37(2) must be satisfied. By s 37(2):

> 'The conditions referred to in subsection (1) above are that—(a) the court is satisfied, on the written or oral evidence of two registered medical practitioners, that the offender is suffering from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment and that either—(i) the mental disorder from which the offender is suffering is of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment and, in the case of psychopathic disorder or mental impairment, that such treatment is likely to alleviate or prevent a deterioration of his condition; or (ii) in the case of an offender who has attained the age of 16 years, the mental disorder is of a nature or degree which warrants his reception into guardianship under this Act; and (b) the court is of the opinion, having regard to all the circumstances including the nature of the offence and the character and antecedents of the offender, and to the other available methods of dealing with him, that the most suitable method of disposing of the case is by means of an order under this section.'

[4] A restriction order under s 41 imposes special restrictions upon a patient's release. The circumstances in which such an order can be made are set out in s 41(1):

> 'Where a hospital order is made in respect of an offender by the Crown Court, and it appears to the court, having regard to the nature of the offence, the antecedents of the offender and the risk of his committing further offences if set at large, that it is necessary for the protection of the public from serious harm so to do, the court may, subject to the provisions of this section, further order that the offender shall be subject to the special restrictions set out in this section, either without limit of time or during such period as may be specified in the order; and an order under this section shall be known as "a restriction order".'

[5] Applications for discharge are made to the tribunal. An application by a patient subject to a hospital order but not subject to a restriction order is made under s 66. An application by a patient who is also subject to a restriction order is made under s 70. The relevant powers and duties of the tribunal are set out in ss 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act respectively.

[6] Section 72 provides, so far as material:

> '(1) Where application is made to a Mental Health Review Tribunal by or in respect of a patient who is liable to be detained under this Act, the tribunal may in any case direct that the patient be discharged, and . . . (b) the tribunal shall direct the discharge of a patient liable to be detained otherwise than under section 2 above if they are not satisfied—(i) that he is then suffering from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment or from any of those forms of disorder of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment; or (ii) that it is necessary for the health or safety of the patient or for the protection of other persons that he should receive such treatment . . .' a

[7] Section 73 provides, so far as material:

'(1) Where an application to a Mental Health Review Tribunal is made by a restricted patient who is subject to a restriction order, or where the case of such a patient is referred to such a tribunal, the tribunal shall direct the absolute discharge of the patient if—(a) the tribunal are not satisfied as to the matters mentioned in paragraph (b)(i) or (ii) of section 72(1) above; and (b) the tribunal are satisfied that it is not appropriate for the patient to remain liable to be recalled to hospital for further treatment. b

(2) Where in the case of any such patient as is mentioned in subsection (1) above—(a) paragraph (a) of that subsection applies; but (b) paragraph (b) of that subsection does not apply, the tribunal shall direct the conditional discharge of the patient.' c

[8] Under both s 72 and s 73 the tribunal must direct discharge if it is not satisfied as to the specified matters. Thus the burden is on the detaining authority to satisfy the tribunal as to those matters. Prior to November 2001 there was a burden on the patient to establish that at least one of the criteria for his continued detention was not satisfied, and thus to disprove the lawfulness of his detention. In R (on the application of H) v London North and East Region Mental Health Review Tribunal [2001] EWCA Civ 415, (2001) 61 BMLR 163, [2002] QB 1, the Court of Appeal held that such provisions were contrary to art 5 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) (the convention) and granted a declaration of incompatibility under s 4 of the Human Rights Act 1998. Sections 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act in their present form embody the legislative changes that were made in response to that ruling. d e f

THE TRIBUNAL'S CONSIDERATION OF N'S CASE

[9] The background to N's case was summarised as follows in Munby J's judgment ([2005] All ER (D) 71 (Apr) at [5]):

'In January 1984 N carried out the particularly unpleasant and frenzied killings of a mother and her two children. He was found unfit to plead and admitted in March 1985 to what is now Ashworth Hospital following a direction made under s 5 of the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964. Having subsequently been found fit to plead he was convicted at the Central Criminal Court in November 1987 on three counts of manslaughter on the ground of diminished responsibility. He was made the subject of a hospital order under s 37 and a restriction order under s 41 of the Mental Health Act 1983. He has remained in Ashworth Hospital ever since. Applications to the tribunal for his discharge were refused in 1987 (twice), 1989, 1993, 1997, 1999 and 2001. He made a further application under s 70 of the Act in 2004. The tribunal convened on 27 July 2004 and heard a considerable body of evidence over 5 days. On 14 August 2004 the tribunal decided that N should not be discharged.' g h j

[10] The evidence placed before the tribunal included that of Dr Mulligan, who was N's responsible medical offer and a consultant forensic psychiatrist; Dr McInerney, a consultant forensic psychiatrist instructed by the Home Office; and Dr Ireland, a chartered forensic psychologist employed by Ashworth. All three supported the view that the criteria for detention continued to be met. Evidence in support of N's application for discharge was given by three independent consultant forensic psychiatrists: Dr Williams, Dr Lomax and Professor Sashidharan.

[11] For the purposes of its decision under s 73 of the 1983 Act, and in the light of the evidence before it, the tribunal had to determine the following issues.

(1) Was N suffering from a 'psychopathic disorder' within the meaning of the 1983 Act? Such a disorder is defined in s 1(2) as 'a persistent disorder or disability of mind . . . which results in abnormally aggressive or seriously irresponsible conduct on the part of the person concerned'. On the first limb of that definition the issue was whether N suffered from a personality disorder (which it was accepted would amount to a persistent disorder or disability of mind) or merely had certain personality traits but no personality disorder. On the second limb of the definition, the issue was whether the disorder, if established, had resulted in abnormally aggressive or seriously irresponsible conduct in the past and there was a real risk that, if treatment in hospital were discontinued, it would do so in the future (see R (on the application of P) v Mental Health Review Tribunal (East Midlands and North East Region) [2002] EWCA Civ 697, [2002] All ER (D) 84 (Apr)). In paras 2–7 of its statement of reasons the tribunal gave detailed reasons for preferring the evidence of Dr Mulligan, Dr McInerney and Dr Ireland and for concluding that N was suffering from a psychopathic disorder as defined.

(2) If N suffered from a psychopathic disorder, was the condition 'treatable' in the sense that treatment was available in hospital which was likely to alleviate or prevent a deterioration of the disorder? Although there is no express requirement as to treatability in s 73, the requirement applies to the making of a hospital order in the first place under s 37 and it was not in dispute that, following Reid v Secretary of State for Scotland [1999] 1 All ER 481, [1999] 2 AC 512, it is also imported into s 73. It does not matter for this purpose whether it is treated as a discrete criterion or as an aspect of the appropriateness criterion considered in sub-para (3) below. The case advanced on behalf of N before the tribunal was that further detention in hospital would be counter-productive and that any treatment that might benefit him could only be given in the community. The tribunal rejected that argument, stating in para 8 of its reasons that it had no hesitation in concluding that N was treatable.

(3) If N suffered from a psychopathic disorder, was it 'of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment' (see s 37(2) of the 1983 Act)? In para 9 of its reasons the tribunal stated that N's lack of insight and the amount of work to be done meant that it was not only appropriate but necessary for him to be detained for such treatment. It added in para 10 that N's view of his ability to cope in the community was unrealistic and that it was satisfied that there was a serious risk of relapse should he not receive further treatment in hospital to prepare him to manage relevant risk factors.

(4) Was it 'necessary for the health and safety of the patient or for the protection of other persons' that he should receive such treatment in hospital (see s 72 of the 1983 Act)? The tribunal stated at the end of para 10 of its reasons that it followed from its previous findings that it was satisfied that the criterion was met.

[12] The tribunal's findings on those four issues meant that it was satisfied as to all the criteria for continued detention. That made it unnecessary for it to consider a further issue under s 73(1)(b) as to the appropriateness of N remaining liable to be recalled for further treatment, though it was in fact conceded by N that, if discharged, he should remain so liable and that his discharge should be subject to conditions. A final issue, which is not material for present purposes, was whether, if it did not direct discharge, the tribunal should make a non-statutory recommendation for transfer to conditions of lesser security: at paras 11–12 it recommended a trial move to a medium secure unit.

[13] The tribunal had been addressed by counsel for N on the question of standard of proof, though the submissions were much less elaborate than those now made to this court. In para 1 of its reasons the tribunal set out the approach it had adopted in reaching its decision:

> 'We firstly considered interesting submissions on the standard of proof to be applied to our deliberations and concluded that in relation to an assessment of conflicting expert opinions and diagnoses a balance of probabilities is the realistic standard. However we consider that in accordance with our normal [practice] whenever it is necessary to resolve important issues of fact upon which important consequence[s] flow a much higher standard, akin to the criminal standard, is both fair and reasonable. This has been our approach throughout our consideration of the evidence in this Application.'

[14] The correctness of that approach was the question for determination in the judicial review proceedings.

THE JUDGMENT OF MUNBY J

[15] In addition to submissions from those who have appeared before us, Munby J heard submissions from counsel for MIND. MIND had filed evidence in the form of statements by a number of mental health professionals identifying a variety of concerns. There were said to be uncertainties among practitioners as to the appropriate standard of proof, and a lack of consistency between tribunals. There were also concerns about the basing of decisions on hearsay evidence, linked with a perception on the part of some that tribunals tended to prefer the evidence of professional witnesses over the evidence of the patient even if the patient was the only person present with personal knowledge of the matter in dispute. The more a patient protested that something had been wrongly recorded in his notes, the more he might be faced with the accusation that he was failing to take responsibility for his actions and failing to acknowledge the 'truth'. One of the suggestions was that the imposition of a higher standard of proof was necessary to protect patients from those supposedly undesirable practices.

[16] Having set out the background, Munby J identified two main issues ([2005] All ER (D) 71 (Apr) at [23]). The first related to the standard of proof to be applied by the tribunal, in so far as the concept of 'proof' was relevant. The second related to the question of whether and to what extent the nature of the task upon which the tribunal was engaged involved a standard of proof at all.

[17] On the first issue, the judge started (at [24]–[29]) with what he described as some basic or general principles and with some obiter dicta in existing authorities to the effect that the standard of proof in this statutory context is the balance of probabilities. He then examined and rejected (at [30]–[47]) the primary case advanced before him on behalf of N and MIND, that the relevant standard was the criminal standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt rather than the civil standard of proof on a balance of probabilities. He looked next (at [49]–[71]) at the alternative case advanced by N and MIND that, if the relevant standard of proof was not the criminal standard, it was or ought to be the standard of 'clear and convincing evidence' applied by the United States Supreme Court in Addington v Texas (1979) 441 US 418. It was held in Addington v Texas that to commit an individual to a mental institution in civil proceedings, the state was required by the 'due process' clause of the United States Constitution to prove by clear and convincing evidence the statutory preconditions to commitment. That was an intermediate standard, between proof beyond reasonable doubt and proof on the preponderance of the evidence, which was held to strike a fair balance between the rights of the individual and the legitimate concerns of the state. Whilst quoting extensively from Addington v Texas, Munby J stated that English law did not recognise the intermediate standard and that the case did not assist N or MIND. He also examined various decisions of the English and Strasbourg courts on the application of the convention, and various Commonwealth authorities, all of which he likewise found not to assist.

[18] Following that exegesis of the authorities, the judge expressed his conclusion on the first issue as follows:

> '[71] In my judgment the applicable standard of proof is the ordinary civil standard of proof "on a balance of probability". That is consistent with authority and principle. It accords with the dicta in Reid v Secretary of State for Scotland [1999] 1 All ER 481, [1999] 2 AC 512 and in R (on the application of H) v London North and East Region Mental Health Review Tribunal (2001) 61 BMLR 163, [2002] QB 1. And, as Mr McCullough submits . . . it is confirmed by a purposive construction of the Act and a consideration of the statutory context in which the tribunal operates.'

[19] He added that in the not wholly dissimilar context of the Parole Board the civil standard had been held to apply and he could think of no good reason why the tribunal should adopt a different standard from that applied by the Parole Board: both bodies had to conduct very similar exercises in not very different contexts.

[20] Munby J then moved to consider (at [75]–[116]) the second main issue, namely the extent to which the nature of the task on which the tribunal was engaged involved a standard of proof at all. He referred to the subtlety and complexity of the task faced by doctors and tribunals when considering issues of the kind identified by ss 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act, and to the position of patients who are subject to restriction orders, where it is necessary to balance the interests of the patient against those of public safety. He described the procedure of the tribunal as being to a significant extent inquisitorial, referred to authorities on the proportionality balancing exercise, and observed that in approaching its task the tribunal must use its expertise and look at the reality of the situation. He stated (at [87]):

> 'I have said enough to show that in many aspects of its task the tribunal is not concerned so much with finding facts which are capable of exact demonstration by "hard" science but rather with a process of judgment, evaluation and assessment which involves the appreciation and evaluation of inherently imprecise and often differing or conflicting psychiatric evidence. Moreover the tribunal is necessarily peering into an as yet unknown and unknowable future and, particularly in the case of a restricted patient, seeking to evaluate, assess and minimise future risks—risks of medical relapse and, it may be, risks of re-offending.'

[21] He referred to analogous situations, including the work of the Parole Board and the assessment of danger to national security in deportation cases. He then returned specifically to ss 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act and expressed his conclusions as follows:

> '[100] As Mr Bowen correctly observes, under s 72 the tribunal has to consider a number of issues, including: (i) Does the patient suffer from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment or from any of those forms of disorder? (ii) If so, is it of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment? (iii) Is it necessary for the health or safety of the patient or for the protection of other persons that he should receive such treatment, that is, treatment in hospital? In the case of a restricted patient there is a further issue to be considered under s 73: (iv) Alternatively, is it appropriate for the patient to remain liable to be recalled to hospital for further treatment (and therefore to be conditionally rather than absolutely discharged)? To what extent, if at all, are any of these issues susceptible to proof?
>
> [101] In my judgment issue (i) involves matters which are, in principle, susceptible to proof and which therefore fall to be determined by reference to the civil standard of proof "on a balance of probability". Whether someone is suffering from some (and if so what) form of mental illness or mental disorder is a question of fact—present fact. The nature and degree of a patient's condition, although involving questions of diagnosis and matters of medical opinion, are nonetheless matters of present fact which are, in principle, amenable to proof in the same way as any other matter of past or present fact. Brian CJ in 1477 may have observed (I translate the law French —"le Diable n'ad conusance de l'entent de home") that "the Devil himself knoweth not the thought of man" (see YB 17 EdwIV, Easter, fo 2 pl 2), but it has been trite law ever since 1885, as Bowen LJ famously said in Edgington v Fitzmaurice (1885) 29 Ch D 459 at 483, [1881–5] All ER Rep 856 at 861, that: "the state of a man's mind is as much a fact as the state of his digestion."
>
> [102] Issues (ii), (iii) and (iv), however, of their very nature raise quite different questions. In large measure they are all looking not just to the present but also to the future. More significantly, they are all issues which involve an evaluative judgment and which are not susceptible to a defined standard of proof. They are, in my judgment, issues to be determined not by the application of the civil (or indeed any other) standard of proof but, as I have already indicated, by a process of evaluation and judgment. The tribunal is not here concerned so much with finding facts which are capable of exact demonstration but rather with a process of judgment, evaluation and assessment which involves the appreciation and evaluation of inherently imprecise and often differing or conflicting psychiatric evidence. Moreover the tribunal is necessarily peering into the future and, particularly in the case of a restricted patient, seeking to evaluate, assess and minimise future risks—risks of medical relapse and, it may be, risks of re-offending.'

[22] The judge acknowledged that the burden (which he thought it more accurate and appropriate to describe as the 'onus' or 'persuasive burden') lay on the detaining authority to establish all the relevant criteria, but did not consider this to affect his conclusion. He observed that the fact that an applicant has the burden of persuading the court of something before he can obtain the order he seeks does not of itself mean that he necessarily has to persuade the court of that 'something' to some standard of proof: it all depends upon the particular statutory or other context. Likewise he observed that the mere fact that a statute requires a court to be 'satisfied' of something before it makes an order does not mean that it necessarily has to be satisfied to the civil standard of proof: it all depends upon the nature of the matter about which the court has to be satisfied.

[23] The judge held that if, in relation to the issues that the tribunal has to decide, a specific allegation of past conduct is relied on, the tribunal must decide as a matter of fact, and applying the ordinary civil standard of proof, whether the allegation has been proved: if it is not proved, then it cannot of itself be the basis for any continuing detention of the patient. But however many allegations of past conduct may fail to be proved, this does not mean that the tribunal is bound to order the patient's discharge. For the tribunal is looking to what may happen in the future rather than to what has happened in the past. It must examine the case as a whole, recognising that the range of facts which may properly be taken into account is infinite; it must attach appropriate weight to all the relevant facts when coming to an overall conclusion; and it must reach an assessment or judgment on the particular issue by asking itself whether or not, adopting a global approach and having regard to the cumulative effect of all the relevant facts, it is satisfied.

[24] The judge then set out the questions that the tribunal must ask itself when considering applications under s 72 and s 73 of the 1983 Act, and what he considered to be the 'default position' under each:

> '[117] Under s 72 the tribunal has to ask itself the following questions when considering an application for the discharge of a patient who is subject to a hospital order but is not a restricted patient. (i) Are we satisfied (see s 72(1)(b)(i)) that (a) the patient is now suffering from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment or from any of those forms of disorder (b) of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment? (ii) Are we satisfied (see s 72(1)(b)(ii)) that it is necessary (a) for the health or safety of the patient or (b) for the protection of other persons that he should receive such treatment? The onus of establishing this is on the detaining authority. If the answer to both these questions is "No, we are not satisfied" then the tribunal must discharge the patient (see s 72(1)(b)). If the answer to either question is "Yes, we are satisfied", then the tribunal is not obliged to discharge the patient but may nonetheless decide to do so: see the opening words of s 72(1) . . .
>
> [118] The "default position" under s 72, therefore, is this. If the tribunal is not satisfied of the matters referred to in either s 72(1)(b)(i) or s 72(1)(b)(ii)—if, in other words, the detaining authority fails to establish its case under s 72(1)(b)(i) and fails to establish its case under s 72(1)(b)(ii)—then the tribunal must direct the discharge of the patient. In any other case it may direct his discharge.
>
> [119] Under s 73 the tribunal has to ask itself the following questions when considering an application for the discharge of a restricted patient. (i) Are we satisfied (see ss 73(1)(a) and 72(1)(b)(i)) that (a) the patient is now suffering from mental illness, psychopathic disorder, severe mental impairment or mental impairment or from any of those forms of disorder (b) of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment? (ii) Are we satisfied (see ss 73(1)(a) and 72(1)(b)(ii)) that it is necessary (a) for the health or safety of the patient or (b) for the protection of other persons that he should receive such treatment? (iii) Are we satisfied (see s 73(1)(b)) that it is not appropriate for the patient to remain liable to be recalled to hospital for further treatment? The onus of establishing the matters referred to in questions (i) and (ii) is on the detaining authority. The onus of establishing the matter referred to in question (iii) is on the patient . . . If the answer to both question (i) and question (ii) is "No, we are not satisfied"—if, in other words, the detaining authority fails to establish its case under s 72(1)(b)(i) and fails to establish its case under s 72(1)(b)(ii)—and if the answer to question (iii) is "Yes, we are satisfied"—if, in other words, the patient does establish his case under s 73(1)(b)—then the tribunal must direct the absolute discharge of the patient (see s 73(1)). If the answer to both question (i) and question (ii) is "No, we are not satisfied" but the answer to question (iii) is also "No, we are not satisfied"—if, in other words, the detaining authority fails to establish its case under s 72(1)(b)(i) and fails to establish its case under s 72(1)(b)(ii) but at the same time the patient fails to establish his case under s 73(1)(b)—then the tribunal must direct the conditional discharge of the patient (see s 73(2)). In any other circumstances the tribunal will not direct the discharge of the patient.

[120] The ultimate "default position" under s 73, therefore, is this. If the tribunal is not satisfied of any of the matters referred to in either limb of s 72(1)(b) or in s 73(1)(b), then it must direct the conditional discharge of the patient.'

[25] In the last part of his judgment (from [121]) Munby J considered the concerns expressed by MIND about the approach of tribunals to the assessment of evidence, in particular hearsay evidence, and gave guidance on the approach that should be adopted. He emphasised that a decision under s 72 or s 73 of the 1983 Act is a matter of extreme gravity not merely for the patient but also for the general public. On the one hand are the patient's claims not merely to liberty but also to autonomy and bodily integrity. On the other hand there are powerful interests that may pull in the other direction: not merely the public interest in safety, but also the patient's own interest in treatment which may protect him from the risk of harm or self-harm and may remove or reduce the prospect of future compulsory detention. The judge concluded by saying that bearing in mind the gravity—typically both for the patient and for the public—of the issue with which it is grappling, the tribunal will always want to bring to its task particular care and consideration and will want to scrutinise the evidence with especial care.

[26] The overall conclusion expressed in the judgment (at [137]) was that the only misdirection by the tribunal in the case of N was favourable to the patient and that the application for judicial review must be dismissed.

THE ISSUES ON THE APPEAL

[27] There are three issues on the appeal. (1) Did the judge err in holding that the correct standard of proof, in relation to those issues under ss 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act that are susceptible to proof to a defined standard, is the ordinary civil standard of proof on the balance of probabilities? (2) Did the judge err in holding that certain issues under ss 72 and 73 are not susceptible of proof to a defined standard but are to be determined by a process of evaluation and judgment?

(3) Did the judge err in his formulation of the 'default position' under ss 72 and 73?

[28] To the extent that Munby J's judgment ranged more widely than those issues, it has not been the subject of consideration in argument before us.

Issue 1: standard of proof

The appellant's case

[29] Mr Bowen submits that Munby J was wrong to hold that the applicable standard of proof is 'the ordinary civil standard of proof "on a balance of probability"' (see [2005] All ER (D) 71 (Apr) at [71]). Equally, the obiter dicta in Reid v Secretary of State for Scotland [1999] 1 All ER 481 at 503, [1999] 2 AC 512 at 539 and R (on the application of H) v London North and East Region Mental Health Review Tribunal (2001) 61 BMLR 163 at [32], [2002] QB 1 at [32], to the effect that proof is on a balance of probabilities, are mistaken. The issue of standard of proof in this context has not previously been the subject of a considered decision.

[30] Drawing on an article by Dr Mike Redmayne 'Standards of Proof in Civil Litigation' (1999) 62 MLR 167, and observations of Burger CJ in Addington v Texas (1979) 441 US 418, Mr Bowen submits that the ordinary civil standard of proof on the balance of probabilities represents an equal sharing (50:50) of the litigation risk between the parties, on the basis that the same utility may be ascribed to one party wrongly (ie unjustly) winning a case as to another wrongly losing it. The criminal standard, on the other hand, places almost the entire litigation risk on the state, on the basis that there is an interest of transcending value at stake (the liberty of the accused) and society places a much higher value upon ensuring that the innocent are not convicted than it does upon ensuring that the guilty are convicted.

[31] Mr Bowen submits that there are, however, many circumstances in which an interest of transcending value falls to be determined in a civil context where an equal sharing of the litigation risk is not appropriate. The common law has long recognised that in certain contexts the ordinary civil standard of proof may accordingly require modification, as where serious allegations of a criminal nature are made in civil cases or the consequences of a finding one way or the other will be particularly grave for the individual concerned, for third parties or for the general public. In some cases more than one such feature may exist and the competing utilities of the individual's rights and those of third parties or the wider public interest may have to be balanced.

[32] Mr Bowen suggests that four different solutions have been adopted as regards the standard of proof in such cases.

(1) The 'flexible standard' approach, in which the civil standard, while expressed as the balance of probabilities, is nevertheless capable of a range of differing degrees of probability, from 'more likely than not' to something approaching the criminal standard of 'beyond reasonable doubt'. Cases in this category are said to include Bater v Bater [1950] 2 All ER 458, [1951] P 35, Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 970, [1957] 1 QB 247, Blyth v Blyth [1966] 1 All ER 524, [1966] AC 643 and Khawaja v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1983] 1 All ER 765, [1984] AC 74. A similar approach has been adopted in Australia (see Briginshaw v Briginshaw (1938) 60 CLR 336, which has been the basis of state and federal legislation) and Canada (see Smith v Smith [1952] 2 SCR 312).

(2) The 'fixed civil standard', where the standard of proof remains fixed but the degree of evidence needed to satisfy it varies because events such as serious criminal offences are said to be less probable. Cases in this category are said to include Re Dellow's Will Trusts, Lloyds Bank Ltd v Institute of Cancer Research [1964] 1 All ER 771, [1964] 1 WLR 451, Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1, [1996] AC 563 and Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman [2001] UKHL 47, [2002] 1 All ER 122, [2003] 1 AC 153.

(3) The 'quasi-criminal standard' approach, in which the 'flexible standard' approach is said to be taken to its logical conclusion so as to encompass the criminal standard. Cases placed in this category include B v Chief Constable of the Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 All ER 562, [2001] 1 WLR 340, Gough v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary [2002] EWCA Civ 351, [2002] 2 All ER 985, [2002] QB 1213 and R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester, Clingham v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London BC [2002] UKHL 39, [2002] 4 All ER 593, [2003] 1 AC 787.

(4) The 'single third standard of proof', which rests between a bare civil standard and the criminal standard. This was rejected in this jurisdiction in Re H but has been recognised in the United States of America as the standard of 'clear and convincing evidence' and is applied to cases involving infringements of fundamental rights, including mental health cases (see, for example, Addington v Texas (1979) 441 US 418).

[33] Reference is also made to the 'convincing evidence' standard ('convincingly established') that has been applied by the European Court of Human Rights when determining whether an interference with various qualified rights under the convention is necessary and proportionate. The same approach has been adopted by the European Court of Human Rights, and in this jurisdiction by the Court of Appeal in R (on the application of N) v Dr M [2002] EWCA Civ 1789, [2003] 1 FCR 124, [2003] 1 WLR 562, in determining whether there is a medical necessity for compulsory medical treatment that would otherwise amount to a violation of art 3. It is submitted that, although the question has not been directly answered in the Strasbourg case law, the same standard should apply under art 5 to the justification of a detention in hospital on grounds of unsoundness of mind.

[34] By analogy with those situations where a higher standard of proof has been held to be appropriate (quasi-criminal cases, disciplinary proceedings, contempt proceedings) and by reference to the approach adopted in other common law jurisdictions, it is submitted that the transcending values of liberty and autonomy are such that the social cost of erroneous detentions must be seen as greater than that of erroneous decisions to release. While the potential cost of erroneous decisions to release is that patients so released will harm themselves or others, in the generality of cases that is an extremely small risk.

[35] In these circumstances it is submitted that a higher than ordinary civil standard of proof should be applied to decisions under ss 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act. In the course of his submissions Mr Bowen put forward various formulations of an appropriate self-direction by the tribunal. By the end of his reply he had refined them into four possibilities, all of which were said to meet the requirements of fairness and of art 5, though the first was preferred: (i) the tribunal must be satisfied to a high degree of probability that the criteria for detention are made out; (ii) the tribunal must be so satisfied by convincing evidence; (iii) the tribunal must be so satisfied by clear and convincing evidence; and (iv) the tribunal must be so satisfied to the civil standard of proof with the strictness appropriate to the seriousness of the matters to be proved and the implications of proving them.

The main English authorities

[36] We think it helpful to start by looking at the main English authorities chronologically rather than by reference to the classifications adopted by Mr Bowen, though we leave to one side, for the time being, the cases dealing specifically with the convention.

[37] Bater v Bater [1950] 2 All ER 458, [1951] P 35 concerned a wife's petition for divorce on the ground of cruelty. The Court of Appeal held that it was not a misdirection for the trial judge to have stated that the petitioner must prove her case beyond reasonable doubt. Bucknill LJ, with whom Somervell LJ agreed, considered that 'a high standard of proof' was required because of the importance of such a case to the parties and the community. Denning LJ stated ([1950] 2 All ER 458 at 459, [1951] P 35 at 36–37):

> 'The difference of opinion which has been evoked about the standard of proof in recent cases may well turn out to be more a matter of words than anything else. It is true that by our law there is a higher standard of proof in criminal cases than in civil cases, but this is subject to the qualification that there is no absolute standard in either case. In criminal cases the charge must be proved beyond reasonable doubt, but there may be degrees of proof within that standard. Many great judges have said that in proportion as the crime is enormous, so ought the proof to be clear. So also in civil cases. The case may be proved by a preponderance of probability, but there may be degrees of probability within that standard. The degree depends on the subject-matter. A civil court, when considering a charge of fraud, will naturally require a higher degree of probability than that which it would require if considering whether negligence were established. It does not adopt so high a degree as a criminal court, even when it is considering a charge of a criminal nature, but still it does require a degree of probability which is commensurate with the occasion. Likewise, a divorce court should require a degree of probability which is proportionate to the subject-matter.'

[38] The issue in Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 970, [1957] 1 QB 247 was the standard of proof in a civil claim for fraudulent misrepresentation. The Court of Appeal held that the trial judge had directed himself correctly by reference to the balance of probability. Denning LJ referred back to the views he had expressed in Bater v Bater. Hodson LJ expressed his complete agreement with those views, adding ([1956] 3 All ER 970 at 977, [1957] 1 QB 247 at 264):

> 'Just as in civil cases the balance of probability may be more readily tilted in one case than in another, so in criminal cases proof beyond reasonable doubt may more readily be attained in some cases than in others.'

[39] Morris LJ's observations ([1956] 3 All ER 970 at 978, [1957 1 QB 247 at 266–267) are particularly illuminating:

> 'It is, I think, clear from the authorities that a difference of approach in civil cases has been recognized. Many judicial utterances show this. The phrase "balance of probabilities" is often employed as a convenient phrase to express the basis upon which civil issues are decided. It may well be that no clear-cut logical reconciliation can be formulated in regard to the authorities on these topics. But perhaps they illustrate that "the life of the law is not logic but experience". In some criminal cases liberty may be involved; in some it may not. In some civil cases the issues may involve questions of reputation which can transcend in importance even questions of personal liberty. "Good name in man or woman is . . . the immediate jewel of their souls".

In truth no real mischief results from an acceptance of the fact that there is some difference of approach in civil actions. Particularly is this so if the words which are used to define that approach are the servants but not the masters of meaning. Though no court and no jury would give less careful attention to issues lacking gravity than to those marked by it, the very elements of gravity become a part of the whole range of circumstances which have to be weighed in the scale when deciding as to the balance of probabilities. This view was denoted by Denning LJ when in his judgment in [Bater v Bater [1950] 2 All ER 458 at 459, [1951] P 35 at 36–37] he spoke of a "degree of probability which is commensurate with the occasion" and of "a degree of probability which is proportionate to the subject-matter."

In English law the citizen is regarded as being a free man of good repute. Issues may be raised in a civil action which affect character and reputation, and these will not be forgotten by judges and juries when considering the probabilities in regard to whatever misconduct is alleged.'

[40] The factual background to Re Dellow's Will Trusts, Lloyds Bank Ltd v Institute of Cancer Research [1964] 1 All ER 771, [1964] 1 WLR 451 was that a husband and wife, having made mutual wills each leaving their estate to the other, had been found dead in their home from coal gas poisoning. The husband was presumed to have died first. The question then arose as to whether the wife had feloniously killed him. As regards the standard of proof, Ungoed-Thomas J referred to the observations of Morris LJ in Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd and continued ([1964] 1 WLR 451 at 454–455):

'It seems to me that in civil cases it is not so much that a different standard of proof is required in different circumstances varying according to the gravity of the issue, but, as Morris LJ says, that the gravity of the issue becomes part of the circumstances which the court has to take into consideration in deciding whether or not the burden of proof has been discharged. The more serious the allegation the more cogent is the evidence required to overcome the unlikelihood of what is alleged and thus to prove it. This is perhaps a somewhat academic distinction and the practical result is stated by Denning LJ ([1957] 1 QB 247 at 258): "The more serious the allegation the higher the degree of probability that is required: but it need not, in a civil case, reach the very high standard required by the criminal law." In this case the issue is whether or not the wife feloniously killed the husband. There can hardly be a graver issue than that, and its gravity weighs very heavily against establishing that such a killing took place, even for the purpose of deciding a civil issue.'

[41] The issue in Blyth v Blyth [1966] 1 All ER 524, [1966] AC 643 was the standard of proof applicable to the question whether adultery had been condoned. The House of Lords held by a majority that it was the balance of probability. Lord Denning, referring back to Bater v Bater [1950] 2 All ER 458, [1951] P 35 and to Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 970, [1957] 1 QB 247, said this ([1966] 1 All ER 524 at 536–537, [1966] AC 643 at 669):

'In short it comes to this: so far as the grounds for divorce are concerned, the case, like any civil case, may be proved by a preponderance of probability, but the degree of probability depends on the subject-matter. In proportion as the offence is grave, so ought the proof to be clear. So far as the bars to divorce are concerned, like connivance or condonation, the petitioner need only show that on balance of probability he did not connive or condone as the case may be.'

[42] In Khawaja v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1983] 1 All ER 765, [1984] AC 74 it was held by the House of Lords that, on an application for judicial review of an order detaining a person as an illegal entrant, it was for the executive to prove to the satisfaction of the court, on the balance of probabilities, the facts relied on by the immigration officer as justifying his conclusion that the applicant was an illegal entrant. Lord Scarman dealt at length with the standard of proof. Having cited Bater v Bater, Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd, Re Dellow's Will Trusts and Blyth v Blyth, he continued ([1983] 1 All ER 765 at 784, [1984] AC 74 at 113–114):

'My Lords, I would adopt as appropriate to cases of restraint put by the executive on the liberty of the individual the civil standard flexibly applied in the way set forth in the cases cited; and I would direct particular attention to the words of Morris LJ already quoted. It is not necessary to import into the civil proceedings of judicial review the formula devised by judges for the guidance of juries in criminal cases. Liberty is at stake; that is, as the court recognised in [Bater v Bater [1950] 2 All ER 458, [1951] P 35] and in [Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 970, [1957] 1 QB 247], a grave matter. The reviewing court will therefore require to be satisfied that the facts which are required for the justification of the restraint put on liberty do exist. The flexibility of the civil standard of proof suffices to ensure that the court will require the high degree of probability which is appropriate to what is at stake. "The nature and gravity of an issue necessarily determines the manner of attaining reasonable satisfaction of the truth of the issue" (see Dixon J in Wright v Wright (1948) 77 CLR 191 at 210). I would, therefore, adopt the civil standard flexibly applied in the way described in the case law to which I have referred. And I completely agree with the observation made by my noble and learned friend, Lord Bridge of Harwich, that the difficulties of proof in many immigration cases afford no valid ground for lowering the standard of proof required.

Accordingly, it is enough to say that, where the burden lies on the executive to justify the exercise of a power of detention, the facts relied on as justification must be proved to the satisfaction of the court. A preponderance of probability suffices; but the degree of probability must be such that the court is satisfied. The strictness of the criminal formula is unnecessary to enable justice to be done; and its lack of flexibility in a jurisdiction where the technicalities of the law of evidence must not be allowed to become the master of the court could be a positive disadvantage inhibiting the efficacy of the developing safeguard of judicial review in the field of public law.'

[43] Lord Fraser expressed agreement with Lord Scarman on that issue, stating ([1983] 1 All ER 765 at 772, [1984] AC 74 at 97):

'the appropriate standard is that which applies generally in civil proceedings, namely proof on a balance of probabilities, the degree of probability being proportionate to the nature and gravity of the issue. As cases such as those in the present appeals involve grave issues of personal liberty, the degree of probability required will be high.'

[44] Similarly, Lord Bridge, with whom Lord Templeman expressed agreement, concluded ([1983] 1 All ER 765 at 792, [1984] AC 74 at 124):

'the civil standard of proof by a preponderance of probability will suffice, always provided that, in view of the gravity of the charge of fraud which has to be made out and of the consequences which will follow if it is, the court should not be satisfied with anything less than probability of a high degree.'

[45] The next authority in the chronological sequence is one of central importance. Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1, [1996] AC 563 concerned s 31 of the Children Act 1989 which, in summary, empowers the court to make an order placing a child in the care of the local authority if satisfied that the child (i) is suffering significant harm or (ii) is likely to do so. The mother in that case had four children, all girls. The local authority applied for a care order in respect of the three youngest girls, basing its application solely on allegations of sexual abuse of the eldest girl. The House of Lords held by a majority that, just as there must be facts, properly proved to the court's satisfaction if disputed, on which the court can properly conclude that a child 'is suffering' harm, so too there must be facts from which the court can properly conclude that a child 'is likely to suffer' harm (ie, as was also held, that there is a real possibility that the child will suffer harm in the future); and here too, if the facts are disputed, the court must resolve the dispute so far as necessary to reach a proper conclusion on the issue.

[46] That is the context within which their Lordships considered a further issue, as to the standard of proof required to prove relevant facts, such as the allegations of sexual abuse on which the application was founded. On that issue Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead stated, in a passage ([1996] 1 All ER 1 at 16–17, [1996] AC 563 at 586–587) that we think it necessary to quote almost in full:

'Where the matters in issue are facts the standard of proof required in non-criminal proceedings is the preponderance of probability, usually referred to as the balance of probability. This is the established general principle. There are exceptions such as contempt of court applications, but I can see no reason for thinking that family proceedings are, or should be, an exception . . . Family proceedings often raise very serious issues, but so do other forms of civil proceedings.

The balance of probability standard means that a court is satisfied an event occurred if the court considers that, on the evidence, the occurrence of the event was more likely than not. When assessing the probabilities the court will have in mind as a factor, to whatever extent is appropriate in the particular case, that the more serious the allegation the less likely it is that the event occurred and, hence, the stronger should be the evidence before the court concludes that the allegation is established on the balance of probability. Fraud is usually less likely than negligence. Deliberate physical injury is usually less likely than accidental physical injury. A stepfather is usually less likely to have repeatedly raped and had non-consensual oral sex with his under age stepdaughter than on some occasion to have lost his temper and slapped her. Built into the preponderance of probability standard is a generous degree of flexibility in respect of the seriousness of the allegation.

Although the result is much the same, this does not mean that where a serious allegation is in issue the standard of proof required is higher. It means only that the inherent probability or improbability of an event is itself a matter to be taken into account when weighing the probabilities and deciding whether, on balance, the event occurred. The more improbable the event, the stronger must be the evidence that it did occur before, on the balance of probability, its occurrence will be established. Ungoed-Thomas J expressed this neatly in Re Dellow's Will Trusts, Lloyds Bank Ltd v Institute of Cancer Research [1964] 1 All ER 771 at 773, [1964] 1 WLR 451 at 455: "The more serious the allegation the more cogent is the evidence required to overcome the unlikelihood of what is alleged and thus to prove it."

This substantially accords with the approach adopted in authorities such as the well-known judgment of Morris LJ in Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 970 at 978, [1957] 1 QB 247 at 266. This approach also provides a means by which the balance of probability standard can accommodate one's instinctive feeling that even in civil proceedings a court should be more sure before finding serious allegations proved than when deciding less serious or trivial matters.

No doubt it is this feeling which prompts judicial comment from time to time that grave issues call for proof to a standard higher than the preponderance of probability ... The law looks for probability, not certainty. Certainty is seldom attainable. But probability is an unsatisfactorily vague criterion because there are degrees of probability. In establishing principles regarding the standard of proof, therefore, the law seeks to define the degree of probability appropriate for different types of proceedings. Proof beyond reasonable doubt, in whatever form of words expressed, is one standard. Proof on a preponderance of probability is another, lower standard having the inbuilt flexibility already mentioned. If the balance of probability standard were departed from, and a third standard were substituted in some civil cases, it would be necessary to identify what the standard is and when it applies. Herein lies a difficulty. If the standard were to be higher than the balance of probability but lower than the criminal standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt, what would it be? The only alternative which suggests itself is that the standard should be commensurate with the gravity of the allegation and the seriousness of the consequences. A formula to this effect has its attraction. But I doubt whether in practice it would add much to the present test in civil cases, and it would risk causing confusion and uncertainty. As at present advised I think it is better to stick to the existing, established law on this subject. I can see no compelling need for a change.'

[47] Lord Goff of Chieveley and Lord Mustill agreed with Lord Nicholls. Lord Browne-Wilkinson, although dissenting in part on other issues, agreed with Lord Nicholls that 'the standard of proof is the ordinary civil standard, i e balance of probabilities' (see [1996] 1 All ER 1 at 3, [1996] AC 563 at 572).

[48] Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1, [1996] AC 563 was considered in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman [2002] 1 All ER

122, [2003] 1 AC 153, which concerned the making of a deportation order under s 3(5)(b) of the Immigration Act 1971 on the ground that deportation would be conducive to the public good in the interests of national security. The Special Immigration Appeals Commission held that the Secretary of State had not established to a high degree of probability that the applicant had been or was likely to be a threat to national security. The Court of Appeal allowed the Secretary of State's appeal. The House of Lords, in upholding the Court of Appeal's decision, held that the concept of standard of proof was not applicable to the evaluation of whether the risk to national security was sufficient to justify deportation, but that where past acts were relied on they should be proved to the civil standard of proof. As to that, Lord Hoffmann stated (at [55]):

> 'I turn next to the commission's views on the standard of proof. By way of preliminary I feel bound to say that I think that a "high civil balance of probabilities" is an unfortunate mixed metaphor. The civil standard of proof always means more likely than not. The only higher degree of probability required by the law is the criminal standard. But, as Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead explained in Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1 at 16, [1996] AC 563 at 586, some things are inherently more likely than others. It would need more cogent evidence to satisfy one that the creature seen walking in Regent's Park was more likely than not to have been a lioness than to be satisfied to the same standard of probability that it was an Alsatian. On this basis, cogent evidence is generally required to satisfy a civil tribunal that a person has been fraudulent or behaved in some other reprehensible manner. But the question is always whether the tribunal thinks it more probable than not.'

[49] Lord Clyde and Lord Hutton agreed with Lord Hoffmann. Lord Slynn of Hadley, with whom Lord Steyn and Lord Hutton agreed, referred (at [22]) simply to the need to prove facts 'to the civil standard of proof'.

[50] In view of the submissions made by Mr Bowen, we should note that Khawaja v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1983] 1 All ER 765, [1984] AC 74 was not cited to the House of Lords in Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) (though all the other cases that we have mentioned so far in this chronological survey were), but that it was cited in Secretary of State for the Home Department v Rehman.

[51] The next case to consider is B v Chief Constable of the Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 All ER 562, [2001] 1 WLR 340, which arose out of an application to the magistrates' court for a sex offender order under s 2 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. On such an application it must be proved that the conditions mentioned in s 2(1) are fulfilled, namely:

> '(a) that the person is a sex offender; and (b) that the person has acted, since the relevant date, in such a way as to give reasonable cause to believe that an order under this section is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from him'.

The Divisional Court held that such an application was properly characterised as a civil, not a criminal, proceeding and that the justices were accordingly required to apply the civil standard of proof. As to that standard, however, Lord Bingham CJ, giving the leading judgment, went on to observe:

'[30] It should, however, be clearly recognised, as the justices did expressly recognise, that the civil standard of proof does not invariably mean a bare balance of probability, and does not so mean in the present case. The civil standard is a flexible standard to be applied with greater or lesser strictness according to the seriousness of what has to be proved and the implications of proving those matters (see Bater v Bater [1950] 2 All ER 458, [1951] P 35, Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 970, [1957] 1 QB 247, and R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Khawaja [1983] 1 All ER 765, [1984] AC 74).

[31] In a serious case such as the present the difference between the two standards is, in truth, largely illusory. I have no doubt that, in deciding whether the condition in s 2(1)(a) is fulfilled, a magistrates' court should apply a civil standard of proof which will for all practical purposes be indistinguishable from the criminal standard. In deciding whether the condition in s 2(1)(b) is fulfilled the magistrates' court should apply the civil standard with the strictness appropriate to the seriousness of the matters to be proved and the implications of proving them.'

[52] It should be noted that, although earlier cases were referred to in para [30] of Lord Bingham's judgment, neither Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1, [1996] AC 563 nor Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman [2002] 1 All ER 122, [2003] 1 AC 153 was cited to the court.

[53] The subject matter of Gough v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary [2002] EWCA Civ 351, [2002] 2 All ER 985, [2002] QB 1213 was an application to a magistrates' court for a banning order under s 14B of the Football Spectators Act 1989. The Court of Appeal held that proceedings under that section were civil in character. As regards the standard of proof, however, Lord Philips of Worth Matravers MR, giving the judgment of the court, stated:

'[90] It does not follow from this that a mere balance of probabilities suffices to justify the making of an order. Banning orders under s 14B fall into the same category as antisocial behaviour orders and sex offenders' orders. While made in civil proceedings they impose serious restraints on freedoms that the citizen normally enjoys. While technically the civil standard of proof applies, that standard is flexible and must reflect the consequences that will follow if the case for a banning order is made out. This should lead the magistrates to apply an exacting standard of proof that will, in practice, be hard to distinguish from the criminal standard—see B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 All ER 562 at 573–574, [2001] 1 WLR 340 at 354 and R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester [2001] EWCA Civ 281 at [66], [2001] 4 All ER 264 at [66], [2001] 1 WLR 1084.

[91] Thus the necessity in the individual case to impose a restriction upon a fundamental freedom must be strictly demonstrated. The first thing that has to be proved under s 14B(4)(a) is that the respondent has caused or contributed to violence or disorder in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. Mr Pannick conceded that the standard of proof of this is practically indistinguishable from the criminal standard.

[92] The same is true of the next requirement, that imposed by s 14B(4)(b), though this is less easily derived from the language of the statute. The court must be "satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that making a banning order would help to prevent violence or disorder at or in connection with any regulated football matches". In practice the "reasonable grounds" will almost inevitably consist of evidence of past conduct. That conduct must be such as to make it reasonable to conclude that if the respondent is not made subject to a banning order, he is likely to contribute to football violence or disorder in the future. The past conduct may or may not consist of or include the causing or contributing to violence or disorder that has to be proved under s 14B(4)(a), for that violence or disorder is not required to be football related. It must, however, be proved to the same strict standard of proof. Furthermore it must be conduct that gives rise to the likelihood that, if the respondent is not banned from attending prescribed football matches, he will attend such matches, or the environs of them, and take part in violence or disorder.

[93] These matters are not readily susceptible of proof. We can well understand the practice that is evidenced by this case of using a football intelligence service to build up profiles of "football prominents". Such a practice may well be the only way of assembling evidence sufficiently cogent to satisfy the requirements of s 14B(4)(b). Those requirements, if properly applied in the manner described above, will provide a satisfactory threshold for the making of a banning order . . .'

[54] Lord Phillips MR referred (at [90]) to the decision of the Court of Appeal in R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester. McCann's case was the subject of a further appeal to the House of Lords [2002] UKHL 39, [2002] 4 All ER 593, [2003] 1 AC 787. The case concerned an application to the magistrates' court for anti-social behaviour orders under s 1 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. Again this was held to be a civil proceeding. Nevertheless their Lordships went on to hold that the standard of proof to be applied to allegations about the defendants' past behaviour was the criminal standard. Lord Steyn stated (at [37]):

'Having concluded that the relevant proceedings are civil, in principle it follows that the standard of proof ordinarily applicable in civil proceedings, namely the balance of probabilities, should apply. However, I agree that, given the seriousness of the matters involved, at least some reference to the heightened civil standard would usually be necessary (see Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1 at 16–17, [1996] AC 563 at 586, per Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead). For essentially practical reasons, the Recorder of Manchester decided to apply the criminal standard. The Court of Appeal said that would usually be the right course to adopt. Lord Bingham of Cornhill has observed that the heightened civil standard and the criminal standard are virtually indistinguishable. I do not disagree with any of these views. But in my view pragmatism dictates that the task of magistrates should be made more straightforward by ruling that they must in all cases under s 1 apply the criminal standard . . .'

[55] Lord Hope of Craighead gave the following reasons for indorsing the approach of applying the criminal standard:

'[82] Mr Crow for the Secretary of State said that his preferred position was that the standard to be applied in these proceedings should be the civil standard. His submission, as it was put in his written case, was that although the civil standard was a single, inflexible test, the inherent probability or improbability of an event was a matter to be taken into account when the evidence was being assessed. He maintained that this view was consistent with the position for which he contended, that these were civil proceedings which should be decided according to the civil evidence rules. But it is not an invariable rule that the lower standard of proof must be applied in civil proceedings. I think that there are good reasons, in the interests of fairness, for applying the higher standard when allegations are made of criminal or quasi-criminal conduct which, if proved, would have serious consequences for the person against whom they are made.

[83] This . . . was the view which the Court of Session took in Constanda v M 1997 SC 217 when it decided that proof to the criminal standard was required of allegations that a child had engaged in criminal conduct although the ground of referral to a children's hearing was not that he had committed an offence but that he was exposed to moral danger. There is now a substantial body of opinion that, if the case for an order such as a banning order or a sex offender order is to be made out, account should be taken of the seriousness of the matters to be proved and the implications of proving them. It has also been recognised that if this is done the civil standard of proof will for all practical purposes be indistinguishable from the criminal standard (see B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 All ER 562 at 573–574, [2001] 1 WLR 340 at 354, per Lord Bingham of Cornhill CJ; [Gough v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary [2002] EWCA Civ 351 at [90], [2002] 2 All ER 985 at [90], [2002] QB 1213], per Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR). As Mr Crow pointed out, the condition in s 1(1)(b) of the [Crime and Disorder Act 1998] that a prohibition order is necessary to protect persons in the local government area from further anti-social acts raises a question which is a matter for evaluation and assessment. But the condition in s 1(1)(a) that the defendant has acted in an anti-social manner raises serious questions of fact, and the implications for him of proving that he has acted in this way are also serious. I would hold that the standard of proof that ought to be applied in these cases to allegations about the defendant's conduct is the criminal standard.'

[56] The other members of the House in McCann's case agreed with Lord Steyn and Lord Hope.

[57] Finally in this chronological survey, reference should be made to the decision of the Privy Council in Campbell v Hamlet [2005] UKPC 19, [2005] 3 All ER 1116. In that case there had been a finding of professional misconduct by an attorney. One of the issues on the appeal was the correct standard of proof to apply to such proceedings. Lord Brown of Eaton-under-Heywood stated (at [16]) that their Lordships entertained no doubt that the criminal standard was the correct standard. He continued (at [17]):

> 'It has, of course, long been established that there is flexibility in the civil standard of proof which allows it to be applied with greater or lesser strictness according to the seriousness of what has to be proved and the implications of proving those matters.'

[58] He then referred with evident approval (at [17]–[19]), to passages that we have already cited from B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary, Gough v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary and R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester [2002] 4 All ER 593, [2003] 1 AC 787 in which it was indicated that, in the situations there under consideration, the civil standard of proof would for all practical purposes be indistinguishable from the criminal standard. a

Discussion

[59] We have set out those authorities in chronological order because, in our judgment, it helps to show that Mr Bowen's submissions seek to impose an unwarranted straitjacket of classification upon them. Certainly there are b differences in the language used and the rationalisations given over time; but the essential point that runs through the authorities is that the civil standard of proof is flexible in its application and enables proper account to be taken of the seriousness of the allegations to be proved and of the consequences of proving them.

[60] Whatever differences in expression there have been over time, it was laid c down clearly by the House of Lords in Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1, [1996] AC 563 and Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman [2002] 1 All ER 122, [2003] 1 AC 153 that in English law the civil standard is one single standard, namely proof on the balance of probabilities (or preponderance of probability). The other standard is the criminal standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt. There is no intermediate standard, nor is the d civil standard to be broken down into sub-categories designed to produce one or more intermediate standards. (We leave out of account for the purposes of this analysis the standards applicable in certain specific statutory contexts, such as a 'reasonable likelihood' of persecution in asylum cases. The present case is governed by the general rules.)

e

[61] We reject Mr Bowen's contention that the decision in Re H might have been different if Khawaja v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1983] 1 All ER 765, [1984] AC 74 had been cited in it. Lord Nicholls in Re H considered his approach substantially to accord with that in Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 970, [1957] 1 QB 247, which was approved in Khawaja's case and which Mr Bowen would place in the same category as Khawaja's case. In any event f Khawaja's case was cited in Rehman's case, where Re H was followed. The point might equally be made that Re H, in turn, was not cited in B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 All ER 562, [2001] 1 WLR 340 or Gough v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary [2002] 2 All ER 985, [2002] QB 1213, though it was in R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester [2002] g 4 All ER 593, [2003] 1 AC 787, and that Rehman's case was not cited in any of those three cases. In our view, however, this does not mean that successive cases have been decided per incuriam or that the law has been getting into a state of confusion. Full citation of earlier authorities has not been necessary in these cases, for the very reason that their broad thrust has been the same (albeit that, as we explain below, slightly different language might sometimes have been used if h Re H had been cited in some of the more recent cases).

[62] Although there is a single civil standard of proof on the balance of probabilities, it is flexible in its application. In particular, the more serious the allegation or the more serious the consequences if the allegation is proved, the stronger must be the evidence before a court will find the j allegation proved on the balance of probabilities. Thus the flexibility of the standard lies not in any adjustment to the degree of probability required for an allegation to be proved (such that a more serious allegation has to be proved to a higher degree of probability), but in the strength or quality of the evidence that will in practice be required for an allegation to be proved on the balance of probabilities.

[63] The flexibility that exists in the application of the standard is clear from Re H itself, where Lord Nicholls, whilst affirming the existence of a single civil standard, stressed ([1996] 1 All ER 1 at 16, [1996] AC 563 at 586) that it had 'a generous degree of flexibility' in respect of the seriousness of the allegation (see also his reference ([1996] 1 All ER 1 at 17, [1996] AC 563 at 587) to 'the in-built flexibility already mentioned').

[64] It is true that the rationalisation put forward in Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1, [1996] AC 563 and followed in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman [2002] 1 All ER 122, [2003] 1 AC 153 focused on the seriousness of the allegation rather than on the seriousness of the consequences if the allegation is proved. The reasoning was that the more serious the allegation the less likely it is that the event occurred, and that the inherent probability or improbability of an event is itself a matter to be taken into account when weighing the probabilities and deciding whether, on balance, the event occurred. In general, the seriousness of an allegation is a function of the seriousness of its consequences, and vice versa, so that the rationalisation in Re H and Rehman's case will take due account of the seriousness of the consequences if an allegation is proved. We accept Mr Bowen's submission, however, that there will be cases where proof of an allegation may have serious consequences even though it cannot be said that the matter alleged is inherently improbable. It seems to us that the same general approach must apply in such cases, even though the rationalisation put forward in Re H does not readily accommodate it. The more serious the consequences, the stronger the evidence required in practice to prove the matter on the balance of probabilities.

[65] In terms of outcome, and however difficult it may be to accommodate it within his reasoning, that conclusion accords with the way in which Lord Nicholls evidently thought of the matter in Re H. The alternative, intermediate standard which he formulated for consideration but then rejected was 'commensurate with the gravity of the allegation and the seriousness of the consequences' (see [1996] 1 All ER 1 at 17, [1996] AC 563 at 587) (emphasis added). In rejecting it, however, he doubted whether in practice it would add much to the balance of probbility standard. Moreover Morris LJ in Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd [1956] 3 All ER 970, [1957] 1 QB 247, with whose judgment Lord Nicholls considered his own approach substantially to accord, was plainly of the view that the seriousness of the consequences, whether for liberty or reputation, was a matter to be taken into account when deciding on the balance of probabilities (see the latter part of the passage quoted at [39], above).

[66] The more recent cases provide uniform confirmation of the need to take account of the seriousness of the consequences or implications of what has to be proved when applying the civil standard: (see B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 All ER 562 at [30], [2001] 1 WLR 340, Gough v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary [2002] 2 All ER 985 at [90], [2002] QB 1213 and R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester [2002] 4 All ER 593 at [83], [2003] 1 AC 787. The relevant passages are set out above and we do not need to repeat them.

[67] Some of the language used in those cases might be thought to have the potential for confusion. For example, Lord Bingham CJ said in B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary that the civil standard of proof 'does not invariably mean a bare balance of probability' (see [2001] 1 All ER 562 at [30]), and Lord Steyn referred in McCann's case to 'the heightened civil standard' (see [2002] 4 All ER 593 at [37]). Such observations are an echo of references in some of the earlier cases to higher degrees of probability being required where the allegations are more serious. In Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman [2002] 1 All ER 122, [2003] 1 AC 153, however, Lord Hoffmann took issue with that kind of language, which does not sit comfortably with a single standard of balance of probabilities. If Rehman's case had been cited in the later cases, or indeed if Re H had been cited in B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary, it may well be that different words would have been used. But in our view it is only a matter of words. We do not think that anything said in the later cases affects the substance of the position as set out in Re H and Rehman's case.

[68] In all of this we take comfort from Morris LJ's observations in Hornal v Neuberger Products Ltd, quoted at [39], above, that it may well be that no clear-cut logical reconciliation can be formulated in regard to the authorities, but perhaps they illustrate that 'the life of the law is not logic but experience', and that the words which are used to define the approach must be the servants not the masters of meaning.

[69] Although there remains a distinction in principle between the civil standard and the criminal standard, the practical application of the flexible approach demonstrated in the authorities means that they are likely in certain contexts to produce the same or similar results. Indeed, there are exceptional situations in which, for reasons of policy or pragmatism, the actual criminal standard is used in civil proceedings, as in contempt of court (see Re Bramblevale Ltd [1969] 3 All ER 1062, [1970] Ch 128), the making of anti-social behaviour orders (McCann's case) or certain disciplinary contexts (Campbell v Hamlet [2005] 3 All ER 1116). These are exceptions to the general rule. Mr Bowen has not argued before us that the mental health context constitutes a further exception in which the criminal standard applies, and we are sure he is right not to have done so.

[70] To recapitulate, we do not accept Mr Bowen's submission that the House of Lords in Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1, [1996] AC 563 somehow took a wrong turn, reflecting only one strand in the earlier case law and resulting in the erroneous adoption of a fixed standard instead of a flexible standard, or that there is an irreconcilable conflict between Re H and later cases such as R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester [2002] 4 All ER 593, [2003] 1 AC 787. Re H is in line with the overall thrust of the case law, whilst analysing the matter in terms of a single civil standard (balance of probabilities) which is to be applied flexibly according to the seriousness of the matters to be proved and the consequences of proving them. The reasoning in support of the adoption of a single standard may not provide a complete explanation of that flexibility in its application, but the seriousness of the consequences if a matter is proved is nonetheless a factor to be taken into account when deciding in practice whether the evidence is sufficiently strong to prove that matter on the balance of probabilities.

[71] We have not spent time on the Commonwealth authorities, such as Briginshaw v Briginshaw (1938) 60 CLR 336, to which Mr Bowen referred us, but due account is taken of them in the English cases that we have examined. Although the United States cases are of no direct assistance, since they were decided in the somewhat different context of the 'due process' clause of the United States constitution and they lay down an intermediate standard which, as Re H makes clear, is no part of English law, they do focus on a similar problem and it seems to us that the 'clear and convincing evidence' test in Addington v Texas (1979) 441 US 418, the language of 'reliably shown' or 'convincingly shown' in the convention context, and the flexible application of the balance of probabilities standard may all lead to much the same result in practice.

The application of the standard of proof

[72] Given that the standard of proof is flexible in its application, there remains the question whether evidence of an especially high strength or quality is required to meet the standard in the context of ss 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act (to the extent that the issues arising under those sections are susceptible of proof to a defined standard at all). We take it as axiomatic, and it is not in dispute, that cogent evidence will in practice be required in order to satisfy the tribunal, on the balance of probabilities, that the conditions for continuing detention are met. But we would not put it any higher than that.

[73] As submitted by Mr McCullough on behalf of the tribunal, the mental health context is very different from other situations where individual liberty is at stake. The unwarranted detention of an individual on grounds of mental disorder is a very serious matter, but the unwarranted release from detention of an individual who is suffering from mental disorder is also a very serious matter. The decision of the United States Supreme Court in Addington v Texas, quoted extensively by Munby J in his judgment ([2005] All ER (D) 71 (Apr) at [51]–[57]), is valuable for its discussion of the competing interests of the individual and the state in this area. The court concluded that the individual's interest was of such weight and gravity that clear and convincing evidence was required to justify his involuntary confinement. Although the court dealt with the matter in terms of an intermediate standard of proof, its reasoning is relevant to the strength of the evidence required in the flexible application of the English balance of probabilities standard. In our view it supports a requirement of cogent evidence but does not compel a more demanding evidential requirement than that.

[74] Several considerations weigh against pitching the evidential requirement unduly high. One of the points made by Burger CJ in rejecting the criminal standard of proof was that:

> 'One who is suffering from a debilitating mental illness and in need of treatment is neither wholly at liberty nor free of stigma . . . It cannot be said, therefore, that it is much better for a mentally ill person to "go free" than for a mentally normal person to be committed.'

Furthermore the consequences that may flow from the release of a person suffering from mental disorder include not only a risk to the individual's own health and safety (eg self-harm, even suicide), but also a risk of harm to other members of the public. It is not to be forgotten that a person whose case is being considered under s 73 of the 1983 Act was detained in the first place pursuant to a hospital order under s 37 following conviction for a criminal offence, often an offence of violence: the appalling facts of N's own case are very much in point. Some of those whose cases are considered under s 72 will also have been detained pursuant to s 37. All those factors are taken into account in the operation of the statutory machinery under the 1983 Act.

[75] The matter is expressed very well by Munby J (at [71]). In the continuation of the passage quoted at [18], above, the judge said:

> 'I agree with [Mr McCullough] that to raise the standard of proof above the ordinary civil standard of proof would subvert the obvious purpose of the Act, which seeks both to protect the interests of the individual whose ability to act in his own best interests is impaired and at the same time enable a proportionate balance ... to be struck between individual and public interests. It would, as Mr McCullough submits, relegate the interests of the patient, as objectively ascertained, and of the public, to a position subsidiary to the principle of personal autonomy—an approach for which there is no principled basis. And it would thereby create a heightened risk to patients and the public—contrary, as it seems to me, to the very scheme and purpose of the Act.'

That was said in support of the judge's conclusion that the applicable standard of proof is the ordinary civil standard of proof on the balance of probabilities; but it also tells against demanding an especially high evidential requirement in order to meet that standard.

[76] Turning to the actual decision in the present case, the tribunal was faced with competing expert opinions as to whether N was suffering from a psychopathic disorder within the meaning of the 1983 Act. Directing itself by reference to the balance of probabilities, it gave a reasoned basis for preferring one group of experts over the other, concluding in effect that the diagnosis of psychopathic disorder was more likely than not to be the correct one. The body of evidence it preferred was plainly cogent and it is clear from the tribunal's reasons that its preference was reasonably clear cut. The tribunal's approach cannot be faulted. The position would have been the same, however, even if both sets of competing opinions could fairly have been described as cogent and the decision between them had been a finely balanced one. We do not think that more is required than that the decision is based on cogent evidence which is accepted as correct on the balance of probabilities. It is not necessary, for example, for one body of evidence to have a much higher degree of cogency before it can be accepted on the balance of probabilities.

[77] The same general considerations apply to the determination of other disputed issues of fact such as whether the patient has behaved in a particular way or said a particular thing in the past. The tribunal was wrong to adopt a standard of proof 'akin to the criminal standard' (though, as Munby J held, it was an error favourable to N and cannot help him in these proceedings). The tribunal's approach not only expresses the standard of proof incorrectly, but also suggests an evidential requirement higher than is appropriate for the proper application, in the present context, of the correct standard of proof. As regards the cogency of evidence required, we see no reason to disagree with the guidance given by Munby J at [121] et seq of his judgment, where he dealt in particular with the evaluation of hearsay evidence; though we should stress that the detail of the points covered in that part of the judgment has not been the subject of argument before us.

Conformity with the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950

[78] In our judgment, the conclusion we have expressed above is in full conformity with the requirements of the convention.

[79] In determining whether a detention on grounds of mental illness complies with art 5, the European Court of Human Rights has consistently applied the test laid down in Winterwerp v Netherlands (1979) 2 EHRR 387. For example, in HL v UK (2004) 17 BHRC 418 at 450 (para 98), the court stated:

'It is recalled that an individual cannot be deprived of his liberty on the basis of unsoundness of mind unless three minimum conditions are satisfied: he must reliably be shown to be of unsound mind; the mental disorder must be of a kind or degree warranting compulsory confinement; and the validity of continued confinement depends upon the persistence of such a disorder (Winterwerp v Netherlands [1979] ECHR 6301/73 at para 39 . . .).'

The court examined the material on which the applicant's detention had been based, and found ((2004) 17 BHRC 418 at 451 (para 101)) that 'the applicant has been reliably shown to have been suffering from a mental disorder of a kind or degree warranting compulsory confinement . . .'

[80] It seems to us that full effect is given to the Winterwerp test by the application of a standard of proof on the balance of probabilities and a recognition that cogent evidence will in practice be required to meet that standard. We note, too, that in Hutchison Reid v UK (2003) 14 BHRC 41 at 58 (para 70), where the court repeated the Winterwerp test, there was no suggestion that the standard of proof on the balance of probabilities was inappropriate or incompatible with the requirements of the convention, even though the court gave specific consideration to the two cases containing obiter dicta in support of that standard, namely Reid v Secretary of State for Scotland [1999] 1 All ER 481, [1999] 2 AC 512 and R (on the application of H) v London North and East Region Mental Health Review Tribunal (2001) 61 BMLR 163, [2002] QB 1.

[81] Mr Bowen has cited cases concerning the standard of proof required in other convention contexts. For example, in R (on the application of N) v Dr M [2003] 1 FCR 124, [2003] 1 WLR 562 it was common ground, in the light of the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Herczegfalvy v Austria (1992) 18 BMLR 48, that the standard of proof for the purposes of determining whether medical treatment to which the patient does not consent is compatible with art 3 is that the medical necessity has been 'convincingly shown' (see the judgment of the Court of Appeal [2003] 1 FCR 124 at [17]). The court rejected (at [18]) a contention that the test was in effect the same as the criminal standard of proof, stating that no useful purpose is served by importing the language of the criminal law, that the phrase 'convincingly shown' is easily understood and that the standard is a high one but it does not need elaboration or further explanation. In R (on the application of B) v S [2005] EWHC 1936 (Admin), [2005] All ER (D) 38 (Sep), Charles J considered, but left open, the relationship between the 'convincingly shown' standard adopted in R (on the application of N) v Dr M and the decision of the House of Lords in Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1, [1996] AC 563 as to the civil standard of proof in English law. He proceeded on the basis of the 'convincingly shown' standard, treating it (as the parties had apparently agreed) as lying between the English civil standard and criminal standard.

[82] Although the 'convincingly shown' standard is arguably different from 'reliably shown' and it is not necessary to decide whether that is so or not for the purposes of this appeal, it seems to us, as indicated above, that they are not likely to produce materially different results from each other or from the 'clear and convincing evidence' test in Addington v Texas (1979) 441 US 418. Indeed, it seems to us to be desirable, so far as possible, for one single (though flexible) approach to be adopted for these different problems in the civil law.

[83] However that may be, the language of 'reliably shown' has been consistently applied under the convention for many years in the context of detention on grounds of mental health. It must be taken as the correct test, and the application of the standard of proof on the balance of probabilities in the way we have described is capable of meeting it.

Issue 2: issues susceptible to proof to the defined standard

[84] All parties accept that Munby J was right to hold that, whatever standard of proof is determined under issue 1 to be the correct standard in this context, it can and should be applied to the question whether a person is suffering from a mental disorder within s 72(1)(b)(i) of the 1983 Act (including, as we understand the concessions, the nature and degree of that disorder) and to any issue of past conduct that the tribunal may have to determine.

[85] Mr Bowen submits, however, that the judge was wrong to hold that the remaining issues under ss 72 and 73 are not susceptible to proof to a defined standard but are to be determined by a process of evaluation and judgment. His case is that the same standard of proof is applicable to the tribunal's determination of all the issues that arise under those sections.

[86] This question is not governed by any binding authority, though Mr Bowen draws support from obiter dicta in two cases. In Reid v Secretary of State for Scotland [1999] 1 All ER 481 at 503, [1999] 2 AC 512 at 539, Lord Clyde evidently considered there to be a burden on the patient to satisfy the decision maker on the balance of probabilities as to each of the conditions contained in the Scottish equivalent of s 72. The case pre-dated the amendment to the 1983 Act which placed the burden of proof on the detaining authority; but whether an issue is susceptible to proof to a particular standard should not depend on where the burden of proof lies. There was, however, no argument on the standard of proof or its scope. Similarly, in R (on the application of H) v London North and East Region Mental Health Review Tribunal (2001) 61 BMLR 163 at [32], [2002] QB 1 the Court of Appeal referred in general terms to the relevant conditions being demonstrated on a balance of probability, but again this was obiter and there was no argument on the point.

[87] In developing his submissions, Mr Bowen takes as his starting-point the proposition that there is a burden on the detaining authority to satisfy the tribunal that the conditions for detention are met. The existence of that burden is common ground and is supported by R (on the application of H) v London North and East Region Mental Health Review Tribunal and by the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Hutchison Reid v UK (2003) 14 BHRC 41 (at least to the extent that the issues that arise under ss 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act are also within the scope of art 5 of the convention). The existence of the burden is unaffected by the fact that aspects of the tribunal's procedures are inquisitorial in nature (for example, the requirement of a medical examination by the medical member of the tribunal and the power to require the attendance of witnesses and to call for further information).

[88] Mr Bowen's essential argument is that where there is a burden of proof, there must be a corresponding standard of proof. If no standard applies, then there is in truth no burden of proof. It makes no sense to talk in terms of a burden of proof unless there is a standard by reference to which the matter must be proved; and if a standard does apply, it must be the same standard as that held to apply to the determination of issues of fact.

[89] We are not persuaded by the logic of that argument. It is inherent in the statutory language that the detaining authority has to satisfy the tribunal that the relevant conditions are met: 'the tribunal shall direct the discharge of a patient . . . if they are not satisfied' as to the appropriateness and necessity, etc, of continuing detention (see s 72 of the 1983 Act). If the authority fails to satisfy the tribunal as to any of the conditions, the tribunal must order discharge. Thus the authority has the burden of persuading the tribunal to form the requisite judgments. Munby J preferred to describe this as an onus or persuasive burden (see [2005] All ER (D) 71 (Apr) at [106]). Whether or not one prefers that language, the point of substance is the same. The existence of a burden does not mean that there must be a particular standard of proof in play.

[90] The point can be illustrated by reference to R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester [2002] 4 All ER 593, [2003] 1 AC 787, upon which the judge relied as authority at the highest level against Mr Bowen's argument. We have already explained that McCann's case concerned applications for anti-social behaviour orders. Such an application is made by a local authority to a magistrates' court. Section 1(4) of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 provides that: 'If, on such an application, it is proved that the conditions mentioned in subsection (1) . . . are fulfilled', the court may make an order. The conditions in sub-s (1) are '(a) that the person has acted . . . in an anti-social manner . . . ; and (b) that such an order is necessary to protect . . . persons from further anti-social acts by him'. Having held that pragmatism favoured the adoption of the criminal standard of proof under s 1, Lord Steyn continued (at [37]):

> 'If the House takes this view it will be sufficient for the magistrates, when applying s 1(1)(a) to be sure that the defendant has acted in an anti-social manner . . . The inquiry under s 1(1)(b), namely that such an order is necessary to protect persons from further anti-social acts by him, does not involve a standard of proof: it is an exercise of judgment or evaluation.'

We have set out previously the passage (at [83]) where Lord Hope expressed a similar view (see [55], above). We have also pointed out that the rest of their Lordships expressed agreement with both Lord Steyn and Lord Hope.

[91] Mr Bowen seeks to deflect the force of McCann's case by submitting, as a matter of inference, that their Lordships considered that neither a burden nor a standard of proof was applicable under s 1(1)(b). That cannot be right. It is plain from the terms of s 1(4) that there is a burden on the local authority to prove that the conditions in s 1(1) are met. The effect of McCann's case is that, in order to prove that the condition in s 1(1)(b) is met, the local authority must persuade the court to form a judgment that an order is 'necessary'. Standard of proof does not come into it, but there is still a burden of proof.

[92] There are other statutory contexts in which it has been held that the concept of standard of proof is inapplicable or unhelpful in relation to questions of judgment or evaluation, especially as regards the assessment of future risk.

[93] Munby J (at [91]–[93]) cited passages from the decisions of the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman. A sufficient flavour is given by this passage from the speech of Lord Hoffmann ([2002] 1 All ER 122 at [56], [2003] 1 AC 153):

> 'In any case, I agree with the Court of Appeal that the whole concept of a standard of proof is not particularly helpful in a case such as the present. In a criminal or civil trial in which the issue is whether a given event happened, it is sensible to say that one is sure that it did, or that one thinks it more likely than not that it did. But the question in the present case is not whether a given event happened but the extent of future risk. This depends upon an evaluation of the evidence of the appellant's conduct against a broad range of facts with which they may interact. The question of whether the risk to national security is sufficient to justify the appellant's deportation cannot be answered by taking each allegation seriatim and deciding whether it has been established to some standard of proof. It is a question of evaluation and judgment, in which it is necessary to take into account not only the degree of probability of prejudice to national security but also the importance of the security interest at stake and the serious consequences of deportation for the deportee.'

[94] It must be borne in mind that in Rehman's case the primary decision-maker was the Secretary of State, who had to form an executive judgment as to whether there was a danger to national security, and that the House of Lords was considering the correct approach of the Special Immigration Appeals Commission when reviewing the Secretary of State's decision. So there is not a precise parallel with the present situation, where the detaining authority has the burden of satisfying the primary decision-maker, the tribunal, that certain conditions are met. Nevertheless, Rehman's case is important for the contrast it draws between matters of fact, which the Secretary of State had to establish to the civil standard of proof (see also [2002] 1 All ER 122 at [22] per Lord Slynn), and matters of judgment and evaluation, in relation to which the concept of standard of proof was considered to be not particularly helpful.

[95] Munby J also referred to a number of cases concerning the approach of the Parole Board in determining whether it is safe to release a prisoner. In R v Lichniak, R v Pyrah [2002] UKHL 47 at [16], [2002] 4 All ER 1122 at [16], [2003] 1 AC 903, Lord Bingham doubted—

'whether there is in truth a burden on the prisoner to persuade the Parole Board that it is safe to recommend release, since this is an administrative process requiring the board to consider all the available material and form a judgment'.

In R (on the application of Sim) v Parole Board [2003] EWCA Civ 1845 at [42], [2004] QB 1288 at [42], [2004] 2 WLR 1170, Keene LJ accepted that 'the concept of a burden of proof is inappropriate when one is involved in risk evaluation'. That was followed in R (on the application of Brooks) v Parole Board [2004] EWCA Civ 80 at [28], [2004] All ER (D) 142 (Feb) at [28], where Kennedy LJ stated that what the Parole Board must do is to decide in the light of all the relevant material placed before it whether, in the terms of s 28(6)(b) of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997, it 'is satisfied that it is no longer necessary for the protection of the public that the prisoner should be confined'. Although Munby J considered this to be the most obvious analogy with the present case, we accept Mr Bowen's point that the relevant function of the Parole Board is treated as an administrative decision-making process in which the burden of proof has no part to play, so that it does not help directly with the question whether a standard of proof applies where there is a burden on the detaining authority. Nevertheless, it seems to us that the reasoning in such cases provides support also for the view that a risk evaluation of the kind engaged in by the Parole Board is not susceptible to proof to a defined standard.

[96] On the other hand, it would seem that in B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 All ER 562 at [31], [2001] 1 WLR 340 Lord Bingham CJ considered that the magistrates' court could apply the civil standard of proof (with appropriate strictness) in deciding whether the defendant 'has acted . . . in such a way as to give reasonable cause to believe that an order . . . is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from him' (see para [51], above). A similar point may be made in relation to Gough v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary [2002] 2 All ER 985 at [90]–[93], [2002] QB 1213 (quoted at [53], above), where the magistrates' court had to be satisfied inter alia 'that there are reasonable grounds to believe that making a banning order would help to prevent violence or disorder . . .' In each case, as Gough's case (at [92]) brings out, the focus is on evidence of past conduct, in relation to which there is no difficulty in applying a standard of proof. But in each case there is also an additional element of judgment and evaluation of risk. Yet no distinction was drawn in either case between that element and the fact-finding element as regards the applicability of the civil standard of proof.

[97] Against that background we turn to consider the conclusion reached by Munby J at [101], [102]) to the effect that issues under ss 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act as to the appropriateness and necessity of continuing detention (as well as the alternative question under s 73 as to the appropriateness of the patient remaining liable to be recalled) are not susceptible to a defined standard of proof.

[98] We agree with the judge that, in relation to those issues, the tribunal 'is not . . . concerned so much with finding facts which are capable of exact demonstration but rather with a process of judgment, evaluation and assessment' (see para [102]). We also agree that this is very similar in nature to the process of judgment or evaluation referred to in cases such as R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester, Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman and the Parole Board cases.

[99] We would accept that the concept of a standard of proof is 'not particularly helpful' (per Lord Hoffmann in Rehman's case, with emphasis added) in relation to such a process. But we would not go so far as to hold that there is no room for its application at all. An opinion on the appropriateness or necessity of continuing detention may in principle be held with different degrees of certainty, and it may be important for the tribunal to know what degree of certainty is called for. Under ss 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act the tribunal has to be 'satisfied' as to the relevant matters. As Lord Lloyd of Berwick observed in Re H (minors) (sexual abuse: standard of proof) [1996] 1 All ER 1 at 7, [1996] AC 563 at 576, 'is satisfied' is an expression with a range of meanings covering the criminal standard of proof ('satisfied so as to be sure'), through the civil standard ('satisfied on a balance of probabilities') to being a synonym for 'concludes' or 'determines' and therefore having an entirely neutral function. We see no absurdity in a tribunal having some doubt as to the appropriateness or necessity of continuing detention, yet being satisfied on the balance of probabilities that it is appropriate and necessary. Accordingly, as it seems to us, the standard of proof has a potential part to play in the decision-making process even in relation to issues that are the subject of judgment and evaluation. In practice, we would expect the tribunal generally either to form the requisite judgment or not to form it, without needing to have specific regard to any standard of proof. But the standard of proof provides a backdrop to the decision-making process and may have an important role in some cases.

[100] Analysis of this issue is not helped by the fact that 'proof' in the phrase 'standard of proof' and 'probabilities' in the phrase 'balance of probabilities' are words which go naturally with the concept of evidence relating to fact, but are less than perfect with evaluative assessments. That is why the courts have started to speak of the 'burden of persuasion'. Where a court has to be satisfied

'on balance' in evaluative matters, it needs to be satisfied on the balance of the argument, where the argument depends in part on evidence (there is always going to be some factual substratum) and in part on evaluation. Since the evidence cannot be divorced from the argument, and since there is also argument on pure issues of fact, it is perfectly acceptable to refer to the whole process as one in which the court has to be satisfied on the balance of probabilities. In relation to the evaluative part of the process that may involve an element of shorthand, but it gives rise to no conceptual or practical difficulty.

[101] A related consideration is that one of the issues arising for determination in the present context, namely the question under s 72(1)(b)(i) of the 1983 Act whether the person is suffering from a mental disorder 'of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be liable to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment', is a mixed question of fact and judgment or evaluation. The nature and degree of the mental disorder is a question of fact and is accepted to be susceptible to proof on the balance of probabilities. There is a certain artificiality in applying a standard of proof to that question but not to the related question whether the nature and degree of the disorder make detention appropriate. For example, a modest parallel can be drawn with the apparent view of the court in B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 All ER 562, [2001] 1 WLR 340 that a standard of proof should be applied to the entire question whether the defendant 'has acted . . . in such a way as to give reasonable cause to believe that an order . . . is necessary to protect the public from serious harm from him'.

[102] We bear in mind too that, although the observations about the standard of proof in Reid v Secretary of State for Scotland [1999] 1 All ER 481, [1999] 2 AC 512 and R (on the application of H) v London North and East Region Mental Health Review Tribunal (2001) 61 BMLR 163, [2002] QB 1 were obiter, in each case the court evidently saw no difficulty in applying the standard of proof to the full range of issues to be decided by the tribunal.

[103] We also think it likely that the tribunal's task will be made easier if, instead of dividing up the issues into matters that are susceptible to proof to a defined standard and those that are not, it approaches the entire range of issues by reference to the standard of proof on the balance of probabilities, whilst recognising that in practice the standard of proof will have a much more important part to play in the determination of disputed issues of fact than it will generally have in matters of judgment as to appropriateness and necessity.

[104] For all those reasons, we respectfully differ from the conclusion reached by Munby J on this issue. We would hold that the tribunal should apply the standard of proof on the balance of probabilities to all the issues it has to determine. We would not, however, expect the difference between that approach and the approach favoured by Munby J to have much practical significance, given the limited role that the standard of proof will have in relation to matters of judgment and evaluation. Nor does the difference affect the outcome of the present appeal, since the tribunal appears to have applied the standard of proof on the balance of probabilities to all issues save the factual issues to which it applied a standard akin to the criminal standard.

Issue 3: the default position under ss 72 and 73 of the 1983 Act

[105] This issue arises out of the passage in Munby J's judgment (at [117]–[120]) which we have quoted fully at [24], above. In effect, the judge states in that passage that the tribunal is obliged to discharge a patient under s 72 or s 73 only when the detaining authority fails to satisfy it both as to the s 72(1)(b)(i) criterion and as to the s 72(1)(b)(ii) criterion.

[106] As all parties before us accept, that is an error. The correct position is that those two criteria are cumulative and the tribunal is obliged to discharge a patient if the detaining authority fails to satisfy it as to either of them (see Reid v Secretary of State for Scotland [1999] 1 All ER 481 at 503–504, [1999] 2 AC 512 at 539–540).

[107] Nothing, however, turns on this slip. The judge's observations about the default position were unnecessary for his decision and do not impact on the reasoning in the main part of the judgment. All that is needed, therefore, is to note the error so as ensure that it does not give rise to any confusion in the future.

CONCLUSION

[108] Although our reasoning differs in some respects from that of Munby J, we are in agreement with his conclusion that the only misdirection by the tribunal in the case of N was favourable to the patient and that N's judicial review application fell to be dismissed. It follows that this appeal must also be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Melanie Martyn Barrister.

R (on the application of Amoako) v Director of Public Prosecutions

[2006] EWHC 1572 (Admin)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (ADMINISTRATIVE COURT)

OUSELEY J

24 FEBRUARY 2006

Extradition – Extradition order – Appeal – Notice of appeal – Permitted period for lodging notice of appeal being seven days starting with day on which order made – Extradition hearing in which extradition ordered concluding after six pm – Whether extradition order made on next business day – Extradition Act 2003, s 26(4).

The hearing of the application in the magistrates' court for the claimant's extradition ended at about quarter past six on a Friday evening. The district judge ordered the claimant's extradition. Section 26(4)[a] of the Extradition Act 2003 provided that notice of an appeal had to be given 'before the end of the permitted period, which is 7 days starting with the day on which the order is made'. The notice of appeal was lodged on the Monday week and the court office rejected it on the grounds that it was out of time. The claimant applied for judicial review. He submitted that because the magistrates' court had concluded its hearing after business hours on the Friday the order should have been treated as having been made on the next business day, which was the following Monday, and that therefore the notice of appeal had been given before the end of the permitted period.

Held – The day on which an extradition order was made was the actual day on which the district judge pronounced that the order for extradition was being made. The extension of a court's sitting hours beyond normal business hours for the court's offices did not alter the day on which the court made its order. There was nothing in any statute or procedural provisions to displace the normal meaning of 'day'. Accordingly, in the instant case, the extradition order had been made on the Friday. It followed that the notice of appeal had been lodged out of time (see [5], [6], [7], [11], below).

Notes

For appeal against extradition order, see Supp to 17(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1419.

For the Extradition Act 2003, s 26, see 18 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2005 reissue) 825.

Application

The claimant, Kofi Amoako, lodged a notice of appeal under s 26 of the Extradition Act 2003 on 24 February 2006. The court office rejected the notice on the grounds that it was out of time. The claimant applied for judicial review. The facts are set out in the judgment.

a Section 26, so far as material, is set out at [2], below

Paul Spreadborough (instructed by Charles Allotey & Co) for the claimant.
Adina Ezekiel (instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service) for the defendant.

OUSELEY J.

[1] This is a procedural application in which the claimant, Mr Amoako, has had his notice of appeal rejected by the court office on the grounds that it is out of time. It is contended on his behalf that it is in time.

[2] The way the matter arises is this: in the course of extradition proceedings before the district judge at Bow Street Magistrates' Court, adjourned to 17 February 2006, the judge, who had a heavy list, concluded the hearing of the application for extradition at about a quarter past six in the evening. The provisions of s 26 of the Extradition Act 2003 say in sub-s (4): 'Notice of an appeal under this section must be given in accordance with the rules of court before the end of the permitted period, which is 7 days starting with the day on which the order is made.'

[3] The notice of appeal was sought to be lodged today, in the morning of 24 February 2006. It follows therefore that if Friday, 17 February was the day on which the order was made, then the notice of appeal was lodged out of time and it is agreed that there is no power in this court to extend time.

[4] The argument that has been put forward by Mr Spreadborough, on behalf of the person whose extradition is sought, is that because the magistrates' court concluded its hearing after business hours on 17 February, the order should be treated as having been made on the Monday and accordingly he was not out of time making his application, lodging his notice of appeal today, 24 February. I say the Monday, because it is clear that if the order was not made on Friday because of business hours, the next business day would have been the Monday. It would also follow in accordance with that argument that if the seven days started on the Monday, they would not expire until the following Monday. The argument therefore turns on what is meant by the day on which the order is made.

[5] It is important, in my judgment, that there be legal certainty over when the order is made. In any normal use of language, the day on which the order is made is the day when the district judge pronounces that the order for extradition was being made. That, in this case, was the Friday. That means that the time expired on Thursday at the close of business hours in this court.

[6] It is a commonplace amongst magistrates' courts, and sometimes it happens indeed in these courts, that sitting hours extend beyond the normal business hours for the court's offices, but that in my judgment does not alter at all the day on which the court makes its order.

[7] Accordingly, I considered whether there is anything to displace what would be the normal conclusion that the order was made on Friday. There are no indications in the 2003 Act. There is nothing in the Interpretation Act 1978 either and the CPR contain nothing which suggests that the 'business day' interpretation of 'day', upon which Mr Spreadborough relies is right. Part 2 does not define 'day' as 'business day'. Rule 2.8 contains no definition of 'day'.

[8] What it says in r 2.8(5) is that:

> 'When the period specified—(a) by these Rules or a practice direction; or (b) by any judgment or court order, for doing any act at the court office ends on a day on which the office is closed, that act shall be in time if done on the next day on which the court office is open.'

[9] That does not advance the matter at all. The office was open on Thursday, the last lodging day, and in any event that is dealing with the rules and not the 2003 Act.

[10] Mr Spreadborough is right to point out that business hours for the courts are set in the practice direction as between 10.00 am and 4.30 pm, subject to exceptions. But all that that means is that if the act has to be done within the seven days, starting with the day on which the order was made, it is too late if, on the last day of the period, it is sought to be done after 4.30 pm.

[11] Accordingly, I see nothing in any statute or procedural provisions to displace the normal meaning of 'day'. Nor do I see any disadvantage to a would-be appellant. Seven days starting with the day on which the order is made is a perfectly adequate period for the modest endeavour required to lodge a notice of appeal.

[12] The provision of seven days, starting with the day on which the order is made, will always include a period of a weekend, but it would be very strange if the length of period available could be so adventitiously extended even up to a matter of four days, it seems to me, if an order is made late on Friday by the fact that it might have exceeded by a few minutes the normal business hours.

[13] Far from it being a fair position that Mr Spreadborough contends for, it would in fact introduce considerable uncertainty, looking at the clock to see at precisely what moment the district judge uttered the words of extradition and the extent to which he uttered them before he gave his reasons or after he gave his reasons and whether he completed what he had to say by 4.30 pm or 4.31 pm. This, in my judgment, is perfectly clear.

[14] Mr Spreadborough suggests that this is a matter which could merit the attention of the House of Lords. I think not.

Application dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Days Healthcare UK Ltd v Pihsiang Machinery Manufacturing Co Ltd and others

[2006] EWHC 1444 (QB)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

LANGLEY J

15, 16 JUNE 2006

Costs – Assessment – Detailed assessment – Paying party refusing to comply with order for interim payment of costs on account – Whether court having jurisdiction to debar paying party from taking part in detailed assessment unless interim payment made.

The claimant brought proceedings against the defendants for damages for breach of a distribution agreement. The agreement provided for English jurisdiction and the defendants submitted to that jurisdiction. The result was that the claimant was awarded damages in excess of £10m and costs to be assessed if not agreed. The defendants were ordered to make an interim payment on account of costs of £2m. The defendants were granted permission to appeal on condition that they paid the claimant both the principal and interest due on the judgment sum, made the interim payment on account of costs and paid the sum of £150,000 into court as security for the costs of the appeal. The defendants paid nothing and the appeal was struck out. Following the application of the claimant that the defendants give evidence as to their means the second and third defendants were ordered to attend court. They failed to do so and were committed for contempt. The claimant also brought enforcement proceedings in Taiwan. It obtained security by way of a bank guarantee which would only be available if and when, and to the extent that, the claimant finally succeeded in the proceedings in Taiwan. Meanwhile, in the costs assessment proceedings in England, the claimant served its bill of costs. The defendant served lengthy points of dispute, estimating that the costs hearing would itself take some 30 to 40 days with costs in excess of £350,000. Against that background, the claimant applied to the costs judge for an order that unless the defendants paid the interim costs order plus interest, a final costs certificate should be issued in the amount claimed. The costs judge refused the application, emphasising the enforcement proceedings in Taiwan and doubting his jurisdiction to make the order sought. The claimant sought permission to appeal, with the substantive appeal to follow if permission were granted.

Held – In the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction to control its own processes the court had the power to make an order which would have the effect of debarring the defendants from taking part in a detailed costs assessment because of their failure to obey a court order. The jurisdiction of the court was not itself in issue and it would be a matter of concern if the court were unable to impose appropriate sanctions on those who chose to ignore its orders and yet continued to seek its processes for their own ends. It was to be emphasised that the order sought would only preclude the defendants from pursuing their arguments on assessment if they failed to make the payment which they had been ordered to make. There was, moreover, a general power of the court to debar a party in contempt from being heard, which was also a proper basis for the order sought, as the defendants' contempt derived from a failure to meet an order which directly related to the very assessment in which they sought to participate and they did so not intending to abide by the outcome of the assessment whatever it might be. Permission to appeal would, accordingly, be granted and the appeal would be allowed. However, it would not be right, even if there were jurisdiction to do so, simply to permit the claimant to have the costs in effect rubber-stamped in the amount claimed. There would be an assessment but the defendants would not be permitted to participate further in that assessment unless they made the required interim payment together with the agreed amount of accrued interest (see [18]–[20], [23], [25]–[27], [30], below).

Notes

For interim and final costs certificates, see 10 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 168, 169.

Cases referred to in judgment

Hammond Suddard Solicitors v Agrichem International Holdings Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 2065, [2001] All ER (D) 258 (Dec).

Motorola Credit Corp v Uzan [2003] EWCA Civ 752, [2004] 1 WLR 113.

Applications and appeal

The claimant, Days Healthcare Ltd (formerly Days Medical Aid Ltd) (Days), applied (i) for permission for further evidence to be adduced on its application for permission to appeal the judgment of Costs Judge Wright given on 23 March 2006 refusing its application for an order that a final costs certificate should be issued in the amount claimed unless the defendants, Pihsiang Machinery Manufacturing Co Ltd, Pihsiang Wu and Chiang Ching Ming Wu, paid the interim costs order of £2m plus interest made by Langley J on 16 February 2004 following judgment given on 29 January 2004 ([2004] EWHC 44 (Comm), [2004] 1 All ER (Comm) 991) in proceedings brought by Days against the defendants; and (ii) for permission to appeal the judgment of Costs Judge Wright with appeal to follow if permission were granted. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Stephen Auld QC (instructed by Lovells) for Days.

Robert Marven (instructed by Hammonds) for the defendants.

LANGLEY J.

THE APPLICATIONS

[1] There are two applications before the court. The first is by the claimant (to whom I shall refer as Days) to permit further evidence to be adduced on Days' application for permission to appeal a judgment of Costs Judge Wright given on 23 March this year; the second application is for that permission to be granted. I ordered that both applications and, if permission were granted, the appeal itself should be heard together today. I did so partly because the applications relate to and may affect an assessment of costs due to commence by way of a hearing of certain preliminary issues over three days commencing on 19 July, and partly because the application for permission itself seemed to me at first blush to raise potentially important questions and so would itself involve consideration of the merits.

[2] The costs judge refused permission to appeal on the basis that his decision was a case management decision and he saw no real prospect of an appeal succeeding. As will be seen, I do not agree.

BACKGROUND/FACTS

[3] The essential background and facts, sufficient to address the applications, are as follows.

[4] Days claimed against the defendants (as I shall call Pihsiang and Mr and Mrs Wu) for damages for repudiation of a distribution agreement. The claim was tried before me in late 2003. The agreement in issue was subject to English law and contained a non-exclusive English jurisdiction clause. I handed down my judgment on 29 January 2004 ([2004] EWHC 44 (Comm), [2004] 1 All ER (Comm) 991). Days succeeded (in part) on their claim. I was very critical of the conduct and evidence of the defendants. On 16 February 2004 I ordered the defendants to pay Days a sum in excess of £10m by way of damages and to pay the costs of the action to be assessed if not agreed. I also ordered the defendants to pay Days an interim payment on account of costs of £2m pursuant to CPR 44.3(8). That rule provides that where the court has ordered a party to pay costs it may order an amount to be paid on account before the costs are assessed. The salutary object of the rule is to enable a party to recover at least a substantial part of his expenditure on costs before (and to an extent in the hope of avoiding) what can be a protracted and expensive process in carrying out a detailed assessment. It also is intended to provide a useful sanction and discipline generally in the context of the costs of litigation. In this case I said that the total figure for Days' costs, then put at some £3·9m, did not surprise me and expressed the now seen to be forlorn hope that an order in the sum of £2m would enable the parties to settle the final figure without the need for a detailed assessment. The bill of costs, I am now informed, is in fact in a sum approaching £4·7m.

[5] I refused the defendants permission to appeal. On 13 July 2004 the Court of Appeal did grant permission but only on conditions that the defendants paid Days itself both the principal and interest due on the judgment sum and the interim payment costs order and also paid into court £150,000 security for the costs of the appeal. Each payment was ordered to be made by no later than 24 August 2004. The defendants paid nothing. In accordance with the Court of Appeal's order the appeal was therefore struck out on 13 September 2004.

[6] That remains the position today. Nothing has been paid. Nor is it a case of want of means. The defendants have the means but refuse to pay. They choose not to pay and challenge not just Days but the court to make them do so. Days applied under CPR Pt 71 for Mr Wu to give evidence as to his means. Mr Wu failed to attend when ordered to do so. He was found to be in contempt and committed to prison for 28 days by Wakerly J in an order dated 23 July 2004. Both Mr and Mrs Wu were ordered to attend court on 7 October 2004 and both failed to do so. A final order of committal was then made against Mr Wu by Gibbs J and a suspended order against Mrs Wu. She failed to attend again on 18 January 2005 and a final 28-day committal order was then made against her by Field J.

[7] The costs of Days associated with the applications to the Court of Appeal and the Pt 71 applications are said to be slightly in excess of £350,000.

THE FURTHER EVIDENCE

[8] I cannot sensibly refer to the steps taken by Days to enforce the court's orders against the defendants in Taiwan without referring to the witness statement of Sonya Hsu which is one of the statements the subject of Days' (opposed) application to rely on further evidence. Each party in effect accuses the other of being economical with the truth about the proceedings in Taiwan. There can be no argument that some of the events in those proceedings played a part in the submissions to and decision of the costs judge. The defendants' evidence in the proceedings before the costs judge came in very late albeit they blame Days for being late with their evidence to which it was responsive. I can see no good reason why this court should not have before it the accurate information so far as it is material and which is largely incontrovertible and I therefore propose to grant the application. I would add that the defendants have responded to the new evidence and I have also taken that response into account. The other witness statement sought to be relied upon by Days does no more than exhibit a transcript of the hearing before the costs judge and a copy of his approved judgment. It also makes the point that certain interim costs orders made by the costs judge against the defendants in an amount of £31,600 plus interest which should have been paid on 13 April have also not been paid. Again, I can see no reason not to admit this evidence and indeed every reason why it should be before the court and I propose to allow the application in relation to it also.

TAIWAN

[9] To return, then, to Taiwan, but with this introduction. In the course of imposing the conditions which he did upon the permission granted to the defendants to appeal to the Court of Appeal, Dyson LJ said:

> 'To put the matter more broadly, the defendants' conduct in refusing to comply with court orders that have been made, without explanation, and their behaviour in relation to the Pt 71 matter, strongly suggest that they will place every obstacle they can in the path of an attempt by the claimants to enforce the judgment.'

[10] That 'strong suggestion' is more than borne out by subsequent events here and in Taiwan. I have no doubt at all that the defendants will not honour any orders which involve payment or of which they otherwise disapprove made by any court in this country and will pay nothing unless and until the legal machinery in a country where they have assets successfully executes an order against those assets. They have, in contrast, paid and no doubt will continue to pay the legal and other costs incurred on their own behalf in this country and in Taiwan in whatever proceedings seem to them to be of benefit to them or damaging to Days.

[11] At the end of November 2004, Days sought to enforce this court's order in Taiwan. The procedure is by way of a recognition lawsuit—in effect seeking recognition of the order of the English courts by the courts of Taiwan. Days has been required in the course of the procedure to deposit the substantial sum of £4·5m as a bond. On 25 November 2005, and despite opposition from the defendants on a number of grounds, the District Court in Hsinchu found in favour of Days. But in late December the defendants appealed as of right to the High Court. At about the same time Days attached assets of Pihsiang which were only released when a bond by way of bank guarantee was provided by the defendants in the sum of about £14m representing the damages and costs and interest. There has also been a flurry of applications by the defendants seeking to challenge the attachment and other court orders. There have been three hearings to date of the substantive appeal and a fourth is currently scheduled for 19 June. In summary, I think the evidence shows plainly enough that the defendants will pursue every avenue they think open to them to prevent or delay a final enforceable order being made against them in Taiwan and the system of appeals and likely lapse of time before decisions can be reached is such that it cannot be predicted when any final conclusion may be arrived at. But it can be predicted with certainty that the defendants are prepared not only to incur whatever expense may be involved but also to see to it that Days are exposed to equal if not greater expense.

[12] The bank guarantee lodged by the defendants in Taiwan will only be available if and when, and to the extent that, Days finally succeed in the proceedings in Taiwan. That, as stated, is unpredictable in its timing, could be several years away and cannot be certain. I should add that Days' evidence is that should the defendants make any payment in the English proceedings, credit would be given for it in the Taiwanese proceedings and in the amount of the guarantee given on behalf of the defendants. Whilst it seems the defendants do not accept that evidence, it must at least be the case that enforcement against the guarantee could only be for whatever sum would be outstanding at the time.

[13] I would make this further comment. What was at issue before the costs judge and is at issue on these applications is what if any sanction the English courts can and should impose for the defendants' conduct towards this court and its orders in a context in which the defendants are seeking to engage the court in an exercise estimated by Days to require some 30 to 40 days of court time (the defendants' estimate is 23 days) for an assessment of costs which the defendants have been ordered to pay but which on the evidence it is reasonable to infer they will not pay even when they are assessed. The defendants have of course been ordered to pay £2m towards those very costs in advance of that assessment and have refused to do so. In that context I agree with Mr Auld QC, for Days, that the fact that in Taiwan security has been provided which would, subject to any further challenges, be available in the event the courts in Taiwan finally decide that Days may execute against it, is of little relevance. It is this court's powers and orders which the defendants seek to use in so far as they may suit their purposes but to ignore when they do not. That is not just holding Days to ransom but making this court and its orders look impotent and pointless.

THE ASSESSMENT PROCEEDINGS

[14] I will now turn to the costs assessment proceedings themselves which led to the judgment in issue. Days served their bill of costs on 13 April 2005. Points of dispute were served by the defendants, after several extensions of time, on 15 September 2005. Reply points were served on 30 November. The points of dispute, I am told, fill a lever arch file and challenge 'virtually every minute worked on the case' by Days' advisers and experts. The costs of a hearing over 30 to 40 days are said to be likely to exceed £350,000.

[15] On 21 February 2006 Days' solicitors wrote to the defendants' solicitors with draft directions for the detailed assessment and included application for the orders the subject of the judgment of the costs judge which is now sought to be appealed, namely that unless the defendants paid the interim costs order of £2m plus interest a final costs certificate should be issued in the amount claimed. They also sought, upon compliance by the defendants with that condition, a hearing of certain preliminary matters arising on the assessment. The defendants' solicitors had not responded, despite a chaser, by 15 March when Days issued their application notice seeking the order and served it the next day.

THE DECISION OF THE COSTS JUDGE

[16] The costs judge described the decision he had to make as 'extremely difficult'. In para 11 of his judgment, he said he had 'serious reservations' about whether he could make an order debarring the defendants from taking part in a detailed assessment because of their failure to obey a court order. He said in the following paragraph that the proper and usual approach to an order for payment was to enforce it and that was what was going on in Taiwan and the defendants should not be shut out from participating in a detailed assessment of large bills of costs as a method of enforcement.

[17] As I have already said, I do not think the emphasis on enforcement in Taiwan was appropriate. What was in issue was the defendants' defiance of and yet wish to use the courts of this country. I also think the costs judge was wrong to question his jurisdiction to make an order of the nature sought.

JURISDICTION

[18] Mr Auld submits that there are several bases on which jurisdiction can be founded to make an order of the nature of that sought by Days. As he submitted, this is not a case where the jurisdiction of the court is itself in issue: the relevant agreement provided for English jurisdiction and the defendants submitted to that jurisdiction.

[19] In those circumstances it would, indeed, be concerning if the court was unable to impose appropriate sanctions on those who choose to ignore its orders and yet continue to seek its processes for their own ends. It is commonplace for orders to be made debarring parties from defending claims where justice and fairness require such a course. It should also be emphasised that the order sought would not preclude the defendants from pursuing their arguments on the assessment, it would only have that consequence should they fail to make the payment the court ordered them to make towards the costs the subject of the assessment. Indeed, and I am sure rightly, in the course of his well-presented submissions, Mr Marven for the defendants accepted that the court did have jurisdiction to debar the defendants from participating in the assessment. His submission was that there was no jurisdiction, because of the wording of CPR 47.16, to order the issue of a final costs certificate which was the primary application of Days.

[20] In my judgment, quite apart from any specific rule, the court has an inherent jurisdiction to control its own processes sufficient to enable it to make an order of the nature sought here. CPR 3.1(1) expressly preserves the inherent powers of the court. Further r 3.1(3)(a) provides that where the court makes an order in the course of its general powers of management it may do so subject to conditions, including a condition to pay a sum of money into court. Mr Marven submitted that this power was limited to the attachment of a condition to a direction the court was being asked to make, such as a condition of a grant of permission to appeal. I do not agree. The wording of the rule is quite general and there are no applicable specific rules which could be said to limit its scope.

[21] Mr Auld referred me to a dictum of Clarke LJ in Hammond Suddard Solicitors v Agrichem International Holdings Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 2065 at [48], [2001] All ER (D) 258 (Dec) at [48] where, in the context of CPR 52.9, he said:

> 'We do, however, take the view that the new regime of the CPR, with its emphasis on the timely payment of costs, and the use of costs as a sanction, warrants a robust approach to appellants who fail to obey orders for the payment of a judgment debt and costs when they can afford to pay them . . .'

[22] The context was, of course, different. But the principle, in my judgment, applies generally and is apposite.

[23] Mr Auld also submitted that the general power of the court to debar a party in contempt from being heard was also a proper basis for the order sought by Days. He referred me to the judgment of Potter LJ in Motorola Credit Corp v Uzan [2003] EWCA Civ 752, [2004] 1 WLR 113, in particular at [45]–[58]. This is not a case (as that was) in which the defendants are seeking to be heard on a challenge to the orders which constituted or underlay the contempt. Nor is it a case in which the defendants seek to challenge their obligation to pay the costs which will be assessed, but only their amount. It is a case in which their contempt derives from a failure to meet an order which directly relates to the very assessment in which they seek to participate and they do so, as I think it fair to conclude, not intending to abide by the outcome of the assessment whatever it may be. That is not sensibly to be characterised as 'defensive' litigation. In those circumstances I also think that the contempt of the defendants provides a proper basis for an order of the nature of that which is sought by Days.

THE BASIS OF AN APPEAL/PERMISSION

[24] An appeal from a costs judge is governed by CPR 52.11. It is limited to 'a review' of the decision of the lower court unless the court 'considers that in the circumstances of an individual appeal it would be in the interests of justice to hold a re-hearing'. An appeal will be allowed where the decision of the lower court was 'wrong' or 'unjust because of a serious procedural or other irregularity in the proceedings . . .'

[25] It will be apparent from the foregoing that, in my judgment, the costs judge was wrong to doubt his jurisdiction to make an order debarring the defendants and wrong to place the emphasis he did on the attempts by Days to enforce the orders in Taiwan. Nor do I think his decision can realistically be characterised as a case management decision, granted the consequences at stake, and in so far as it was an exercise of discretion it was, I think, based on the two erroneous premises to which I have referred. Moreover I can think of few cases of greater injustice than a case in which a party for no legitimate reason seeks to contest issues, to put his opponent to great expense, and yet to defy the outcome.

[26] For those reasons I think it right to grant Days permission to appeal.

THE APPEAL

[27] For the same reasons I think the appeal should be allowed subject to Mr Marven's further submission that the application by Days was made too late. Mr Marven points to the fact that the defendants have indeed served substantial points of dispute and did so in September 2005, before the present issues were raised. He also points to the fact that the preliminary issues are due to be heard in mid-July, in May Days served evidence in support of them, and, in accordance with the order of the costs judge, the defendants are due to serve any evidence they may wish to rely upon by 23 June.

[28] The nature of Days' application has, however, been known to the defendants since February 2006. At that time, no date for the assessment had been set and it was only on the hearing of the application itself that a three-day hearing for preliminary issues was established upon the rejection by the costs judge of the application.

[29] In those circumstances I do not think the application was made so late as to preclude the relief sought. Nor do I think it was so late as to require the hearing of the preliminary issues to go ahead in any event. But I do think the fact that points of dispute have been served and were served before the present matter was raised should not be ignored in considering the form of order to be made.

THE ORDER

[30] I do not think (as he did not think) that the costs judge can ignore the contents of the points of dispute. They have been properly served. Nor do I think, at least on the present hearing, it would be right, even if there is jurisdiction to do so (which Mr Marven submits there is not) simply to permit Days to have the costs in effect rubber-stamped in the amount claimed. There should be an assessment. But the defendants must not be permitted to participate further in that assessment unless they make payment to Days of the interim payment I ordered in the sum of £2m together with accrued interest to today's date. That figure, it is agreed, is £2·373m. If that payment is not made by 12 noon on Tuesday, 27 June then the sanction will apply. No doubt, in that event, the costs judge and Days will wish to review the timing and nature of the assessment itself and it should be expected to take up only a small fraction of the estimates to which I have referred. If payment is made then the defendants' time for serving any evidence will be extended to 4pm on Friday, 30 June. I will also hear the parties on the wording of the order and any ancillary matters which cannot be agreed on a date to be agreed.

Order accordingly.

Aaron Turpin Barrister.

Re G (children) (residence: same-sex partner)

[2006] UKHL 43

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE, LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY, LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE AND BARONESS HALE OF RICHMOND

6, 10, 26 JULY 2006

Family proceedings – Orders in family proceedings – Residence order – Shared residence order – Same sex couple – Children born to one partner by anonymous donor insemination – Significance of fact of parentage – Children Act 1989, s 1(1).

G and W lived together in a lesbian relationship from 1995 until 2002. They wanted to have a family together and arranged for G to be inseminated using sperm from an anonymous donor at a clinic abroad. G gave birth to two daughters, born in 1999 and 2001. W had a son, who regarded the girls as his sisters. The relationship between G and W broke down in 2002 when W began a relationship with her present partner. G and the children moved into a property nearby. G began a relationship with a new partner and she and the children moved to the partner's home in Leicester. W's application for a shared residence order, which would have conferred parental responsibility on her, was refused, but the judge made an order that G, who wished to move with her partner and the children to Cornwall, should continue to live in the Leicester area. W's appeal against the refusal of a shared residence order was allowed and an order was made. While the children were on holiday with W, G and her partner completed the sale of their home in Leicester and the purchase of a house in Cornwall. They collected the children at the regular handover point and went to their new home, in breach of the court's order. W issued applications under the Family Law Act 1986 in order to locate the children. The contact arrangements were reinstated and G abided by them. G applied for the residence restriction to be lifted and W applied for the residential arrangements to be changed, so that the children's primary home would be with her. The judge granted W's application for primary care and that decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal. G appealed. G contended that whatever the test to be adopted, it had been wrong of the courts below, having regard to s 1(1)[a] of the Children Act 1989 under which the child's welfare was to be the court's paramount consideration, to attach no significance whatever to the fact that she was the children's mother. Further, the judge had allowed herself to be distracted, by her disapproval of G and her behaviour, from a full consideration of the evidence relating to the children's welfare, which would have led her to a different conclusion. In particular, when concluding that she had no confidence that the mother would not seek to marginalise W in the future, she had given no weight to the fact that regular and good quality contact had been continuing since it had been re-established after the move.

a Section 1, so far as material, is set out at [25], below

Held – The fact of parentage was to be regarded as an important and significant factor in considering which proposals better advanced the welfare of the child. In the instant case the unusual context had distracted the courts below from principles of universal application. The fact that G was the natural mother of the children, while raising no presumption in her favour, was an important and significant factor in determining what would be best for them at the present time and in the future. But that factor had not been explored. Moreover, while it might well be in the best interests of children to change their living arrangements if one of their parents was frustrating their relationship with the other parent who was able to offer them a good and loving home, that was unlikely to be in their best interests while that relationship was in fact being maintained in accordance with the order of the court. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [1], [3]–[5], [31], [38], [44], [45], below).

Notes

For persons entitled to exercise parental responsibility and for residence orders, see 5(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 138–142, 406.

Cases referred to in opinions

C (MA) (an infant), Re [1966] 1 All ER 838, [1966] 1 WLR 646, CA.

D (contact and parental responsibility: lesbian mothers and known father), Re [2006] EWHC 2 (Fam), [2006] 1 FCR 556.

E (minors) (residence: conditions), Re [1997] 3 FCR 245, CA.

Evelyn, Re [1998] FamCA 55, Aus Fam Ct.

H (a minor) (interim custody), Re [1991] FCR 985, CA.

Hodak v Newman (1993) 17 Fam LR 1, Aus Fam Ct.

J v C [1969] 1 All ER 788, [1970] AC 668, [1969] 2 WLR 540, HL.

K (a minor) (ward: care and control), Re [1990] 3 All ER 795, [1990] 1 WLR 431, CA.

KD (a minor) (ward: termination of access), Re [1988] 1 All ER 577, [1988] AC 806, [1988] 2 WLR 398, HL.

O'Hara, Re [1900] 2 IR 232, Ir CA.

Rice v Miller (1993) 16 Fam LR 970, Aus Fam Ct.

V-P v V-P (access to child) (1978) 1 FLR 336, CA.

W (a minor) (residence order), Re [1993] 2 FCR 589, CA.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

A (a minor) (care order: significant harm), Re [1994] 2 FCR 125, CA.

Brixey v Lynas [1997] 1 FCR 220, HL.

C (a minor) (wardship and adoption), Re (1979) 2 FLR 177, CA.

C v C (custody of child) [1991] FCR 254, CA.

Dudgeon v UK (1981) 4 EHRR 149, [1981] ECHR 7525/76, ECt HR.

Fitzpatrick v Sterling Housing Association Ltd [1999] 4 All ER 705, [2001] 1 AC 27, [1999] 3 WLR 1113, HL.

G v F (shared residence: parental responsibility) [1998] 3 FCR 1.

Ghaidan v Mendoza [2004] UKHL 30, [2004] 3 All ER 411, [2004] 2 AC 557, [2004] 3 WLR 113.

H (a child: residence), Re [2002] 3 FCR 277, CA.

H (a minor) (child's circumstances: direction to investigate), Re [1993] 2 FCR 277.

H v H (residence order: leave to remove from jurisdiction) [1995] 2 FCR 469, CA.

J (a child) (return to foreign jurisdiction: convention rights), Re [2005] UKHL 40, [2005] 3 All ER 291, [2006] 1 AC 80, [2005] 3 WLR 14.

N (residence: appointment of solicitor: placement with extended family), Re [2001] 1 FLR 1028, CA.
O (a minor) (contact: imposition of conditions), Re [1996] 1 FCR 317, CA.
P (a minor), Re (1983) 4 FLR 401, CA.
S v M (access order) [1997] 1 FLR 980, sub nom Sanderson v McManus 1997 SC (HL) 55, Scot HL.
Secretary of State for Work and Pensions v M [2006] UKHL 11, [2006] 1 FCR 497, [2006] 2 WLR 637.
SM (a minor) (access), Re [1991] FCR 492.
W (a minor) (adoption: homosexual adopter), Re [1997] 3 All ER 620, [1998] Fam 58, [1997] 3 WLR 768.
W (a minor), Re [1989] 1 FLR 163.

Appeal

CG appealed with permission of the House of Lords Appeal Committee given on 15 May 2006 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Thorpe, Laws and Hallett LJJ) on 6 April 2006 ([2006] EWCA Civ 372, [2006] 1 FCR 681) dismissing her appeal from the decision of Bracewell J on 15 February 2006 making a shared residence order in respect of A and B in favour of CW and CG, with the household of CW being their primary home. The facts are set out in the opinion of Baroness Hale of Richmond.

Peter Jackson QC (instructed by Family Law in Partnership acting as agents for Ashtons, Truro) for CG.
Stephen Cobb QC and Lorna Meyer (instructed by Bindman & Partners) for CW.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

26 July 2006. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[1] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Baroness Hale of Richmond. I agree that, for the reasons she gives, this appeal should be allowed.

[2] I wish to emphasise one point. In this case the dispute is not between two biological parents. The present unhappy dispute is between the children's mother and her former partner Ms CW. In this case, as in all cases concerning the upbringing of children, the court seeks to identify the course which is in the best interests of the children. Their welfare is the court's paramount consideration. In reaching its decision the court should always have in mind that in the ordinary way the rearing of a child by his or her biological parent can be expected to be in the child's best interests, both in the short term and also, and importantly, in the longer term. I decry any tendency to diminish the significance of this factor. A child should not be removed from the primary care of his or her biological parents without compelling reason. Where such a reason exists the judge should spell this out explicitly.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

[3] My Lords, I had intended to write an opinion in this case but having had the advantage of reading in advance the opinion of my noble and learned friend Baroness Hale of Richmond I find myself so completely in agreement with the conclusion she has reached and her reasons for reaching it that an opinion from me would be otiose. I would simply say that in my opinion both Bracewell J and, in the Court of Appeal, Thorpe LJ failed to give the gestational, biological and psychological relationship between CG and the girls the weight that that relationship deserved. Mothers are special and, even after account is taken of CG's breach of the 'residence' order (the justification for which I, for my part, doubt) and her reprehensible attitude towards the important relationship between the girls and CW, their other parent, CG was, on the evidence, a good and loving mother. I find myself unable to accept that the circumstances of this case came even close to justifying the judge's and the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the welfare of the girls required their primary home to be changed from that of their mother to that of CW. I concur in my noble and learned friend's opinion that this appeal must be allowed and that the order referred to in [45], below, should be made.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[4] My Lords, I have had the advantage of considering the speech which my noble and learned friend, Baroness Hale of Richmond, is to deliver. I agree with it and with the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead. For the reasons which they give I too would allow the appeal and make the order proposed.

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

[5] My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Baroness Hale of Richmond. I agree with it and for the reasons that she gives I would allow this appeal.

BARONESS HALE OF RICHMOND.

[6] My Lords, the issues in this case arise in a novel context but they are issues which may arise whenever there are disputes about the future care and upbringing of children. The context is that of a lesbian couple who made the conscious decision to have children together, who together arranged for anonymous donor insemination at a clinic abroad, and who brought up the children together until their relationship broke down. Now, sadly, they are locked in a dispute about the future of those children which is just as bitter as the disputes which arise between heterosexual couples. And the issues arising are just the same as those which may arise between heterosexual couples. The legal principles are also the same.

[7] There are two issues of principle. The first is the weight to be attached to the fact that one party is both the natural and legal parent of the child and the other is not. This will require us to explore the concept of 'natural' parenthood and its significance both for the adults and for the child. The second is the approach to be adopted by the court where the party with whom the child has her principal home is reluctant to acknowledge the importance of the other party in the child's life.

THE HISTORY

[8] CG and CW lived together in a lesbian relationship from 1995 until 2002. They wanted to have a family together. When the relationship began CG was aged about 21 and CW about 36. They arranged for CG to be inseminated using sperm from an anonymous donor at a clinic abroad. (Many might see this as the more responsible choice, not only for safety reasons, but also to avoid the sort of confusion and conflict which arose in Re D (contact and parental responsibility: lesbian mothers and known father) [2006] EWHC 2 (Fam), [2006] 1 FCR 556. It does mean that the couple and their wider families are the only family that the child can at that stage have and in most cases this must be what they both intend.)

[9] CG gave birth to two children, both girls. Child A was born [in] February 1999 and is now aged seven. Child B was born [in] June 2001 and is now aged five. Both were breast fed. CW has a son, C, who is now aged 17, born as a result of anonymous donor insemination during a previous relationship. It was agreed at an early stage in the proceedings that the girls have a positive relationship with him and regard him as their brother, and that he regards them as his sisters.

[10] The relationship between CG and CW broke down in 2002 when CW began a relationship with her present partner, LP. They plan to enter into a civil partnership next month. But the family continued to live together in the family home in Shropshire until May 2003. Then CG and the girls moved into a property nearby. In July 2003, CW and LP began living together in the former family home. Also in the summer of 2003, CG began a relationship with a new partner, MG, who lived in Leicester. They have already registered their civil partnership, in December last year.

[11] Proceedings began in September 2003, when CW applied for contact and a shared residence order. She was entitled to make such an application in relation to child A, who had lived with her for more than three years: see s 10(5)(b) of the Children Act 1989. But she required leave to apply in relation to child B, who was then only two years old. Leave was swiftly granted and an order made for interim contact two evenings a week and every other weekend. A CAFCASS officer, Mrs Barrow, was appointed to make a report.

[12] At that stage, CG was training to be a teacher and had a placement at a school in Shropshire. The girls attended a nursery in the same town. But in November or December 2003 CG decided to move to MG's home in Leicester. She obtained a placement at a school in Leicester for the New Year and enrolled the girls in a nursery and school there. CW was not told or consulted about the move in advance.

[13] In January 2004, in accordance with Mrs Barrow's recommendations, it was ordered that alternate weekend contact continue, with CW collecting the children from school and nursery on Friday afternoon and returning them on Monday morning, so that they could spend the whole of Sunday with C.

[14] CW's applications were heard by Judge Hughes over three days in June and November 2004. By that time, CG had qualified as a teacher but her partner MG was working from home and playing a major part in the children's care. Mrs Barrow's report confirmed that CG questioned CW's right to be involved in the children's lives and was opposed to a shared residence order which would confer parental responsibility upon CW. CW was now proposing that the children live with her in Shropshire. The girls clearly enjoyed life in both homes. Mrs Barrow recommended the continuation of the current arrangements, together with a move towards the equal sharing of school holidays. She also recommended a shared residence order:

> 'I would suggest that the importance and value of [CW's] role in their lives needs to be acknowledged . . . I would suggest that such a move would help to ensure that [A] and [B] grow up with a better chance of understanding the > complexity of their own identity and should not be seen as detracting from [CG's] role, as their main carer.'

[15] During the hearing in November, CG gave evidence that she wanted to move with MG and the children to Cornwall. Mrs Barrow's view was that this was not in the children's interests, as they were happy and settled with the present situation, which met their needs. The judge agreed with Mrs Barrow on this point and concluded that the proposed move was in part deliberately designed to frustrate the current contact arrangements. Accordingly she ordered that CG continue to live with the children in the Leicester area until further order. Such orders are only made in exceptional cases, as the courts generally regard them as 'an unwarranted imposition upon the right of the parent to choose where he/she will live within the United Kingdom'; but where the children will live is one of the relevant factors in deciding with whom they should live: see Re E (minors) (residence: conditions) [1997] 3 FCR 245 at 249.

[16] The judge rejected the proposal for a shared residence order, largely because of the hostility between the parties. Nevertheless, she had no doubt that the children had developed a good and close relationship with CW and with C and that this relationship should be maintained throughout their minority. But CW's important place both historically and in the future could be maintained and reinforced by good quality frequent contact. She therefore continued the alternate weekend contact from Friday to Monday and defined holiday contact on a roughly equal basis. She also provided for CW to be informed about the children's education and medical treatment.

[17] CW appealed to the Court of Appeal against the refusal of a shared residence order. On 6 April 2005, her appeal was allowed: Re G (residence: same sex partner) [2005] EWCA Civ 462, [2006] 1 FCR 436. Thorpe LJ explained at [27]:

> 'But perhaps more crucial for me was the judge's finding that between the first and second days of the hearing the mother had been developing plans to marginalise Miss W . . . The CAFCASS officer had expressed a clear fear that unless a parental responsibility order was made there was a real danger that Miss W would be marginalised in the children's future. I am in no doubt at all that, on the judge's finding, the logical consequence was the conclusion that the children required firm measures to safeguard them from diminution in or loss of a vital side of family life—not only their relationship with Miss W, but also with her son . . . The judge's finding required a clear and strong message to the mother that she could not achieve the elimination of Miss W, or even the reduction of Miss W from the other parent into some undefined family connection.'

Hence a shared residence order was made defining the time which the children would spend in each household (as provided for in s 11(4) of the 1989 Act). The order requiring CG to continue to live in Leicester (which she had not appealed) was expressly affirmed. (CG later described the Court of Appeal's decision as 'appalling' and she would not be the first person to be appalled by an adverse decision in court.)

[18] Only one month later, CG's solicitors wrote requesting CW's agreement to a move to Cornwall. This was refused. Correspondence between solicitors continued and a letter from CG's solicitors in August 2005 indicated that she intended to apply to the court for the restriction to be lifted. However, while the children were on holiday with CW, CG and MG completed the sale of their home in Leicester and the purchase of a house in Cornwall. They collected the children at the regular handover point in Leicester and drove them through the night to their new home. Both CW and the girls had been kept in ignorance of the plan. This was not only a clear breach of the court's order. As the children's guardian was later to say in evidence:

> '. . . from a child care perspective whether that order existed or not, to move the children in that way, in secret, without them having the opportunity to say goodbye to their friends and their school friends, I think . . . was an appalling thing to do to them . . . the flouting of the order was bad, but the way in which it was achieved and the emotional impact it had upon those children, was a terrible thing to do to them.'

[19] CW had to issue applications under the Family Law Act 1986 in order to locate the girls. The proceedings were transferred to the High Court and the children joined as parties. Mr Martin was appointed as the children's guardian. CG applied for the residence restriction to be lifted and CW applied for the residential arrangements to be changed, so that the children's primary home would be with her and they would attend schools in Shropshire. On 30 September, detailed arrangements for contact were made, pending the hearing fixed for February 2006. Over the intervening period, the children spent roughly every other weekend, the whole half-term week and nine days of the Christmas holidays with CW.

[20] The applications were heard by Bracewell J. By that time, Mr Martin had spent a considerable amount of time in both homes and got to know the children and the parties well. Of CG and the children he said this in his report:

> 'She is clearly devoted to her children and they are to her. Observation of her interaction with them displays two very confident and happy children. There is a lot of laughter in the household and even when tired from work CG's interaction with them is positive and child-need led.'

Of CW and the children he said this:

> 'CW is an impressive woman who has clear and well thought out ideas. I did not gain the impression that she was seeking control via her children. I believe that she is genuinely driven by a desire to protect her children and that she has tried always to act in their best interests.'

He also reported favourably, in different ways, of both MG and LP. Of C and the girls he said this:

> '[C] impressed as an articulate and intelligent young man . . . His observed interaction with them was excellent. He joins in all the games, constructs games for them and is there for the rough and tumble. He is also good at spotting and deflecting situations. [C] obviously has a deep love for his sisters and this was demonstrably reciprocated.'

[21] He concluded that CG had been extremely foolish in defying court orders and exposing her children to the risk of emotional harm by moving to Cornwall and thereby reducing the level of involvement of CW. Nevertheless, he did not believe that removing them from CG's care and uprooting them to Shropshire would be in their best interests. There should be no further moves to marginalise CW, who was a highly significant person in their lives. He did not believe that fortnightly contact was likely to be harmful and recommended that contact be reinstated at the level ordered by Judge Hughes. He also recommended a family assistance order, as he believed that he had established a good relationship with the family and could be of further help in improving communication between them.

[22] His oral evidence was given after he had heard CG and MG give their evidence. He found their attitudes disturbing. It undermined his confidence in CG obeying court orders in future. He still believed that on balance the children should remain with her 'but I would stress now that I see that as a fine balance, and I believe that the court would have to be confident that in future any orders would be complied with'. This was because CG 'has provided the majority of the care for these children since they were born and I think that the emotional trauma of being removed from their mother's care at this stage would be extremely harmful to them'. He later said that it would also 'be extremely emotionally harmful for these children if [CW] was marginalised'. Under cross-examination he conceded that each would be 'equally emotionally harmful'. Nevertheless he maintained his recommendations.

[23] Bracewell J reached a different conclusion. She found the balance of the risks of emotional harm of moving the girls to the principal care of CW, on the one hand, and of maintaining the present placement with the risk of their being deprived of their relationship with CW, on the other, to be the crux of the case. She gave ten reasons for rejecting the guardian's assessment. Her first, and the one which was emphasised by the Court of Appeal, was that she had no confidence that if the children remained in Cornwall CG would promote the children's essential close relationship with CW and her family. Accordingly, she preserved the shared residence order but reversed the times allocated to each home. She also made a family assistance order which is due to expire next month.

[24] CG appealed to the Court of Appeal on the same two grounds as she appealed to this House and to which I shall shortly turn. On 6 April 2006 her appeal was dismissed: [2006] EWCA Civ 372, [2006] 1 FCR 681. Thorpe LJ rejected Mr Jackson's submission on behalf of CG that 'cogent reasons must exist if a court is to prefer the claims of a person who is not a child's natural parent to one who is', although he accepted the propositions that 'the identity of a child's natural (biological) parents is always a matter of significance' and that 'in each case the weight to be given to the blood relationship will depend upon the matter in issue, the identity of the parties and the court's assessment of all other factors in the welfare checklist'. Given that the guardian's recommendation was conditional on the court being satisfied that CG would obey court orders in future, the judge was fully entitled to conclude that she was not so satisfied. Hallett LJ, however, agreed only with a degree of hesitation (at [58]):

> 'I am very concerned at the prospect of removing these children from the primary care of their only identifiable biological parent who has been their primary carer for most of their young lives and in whose care they appear to be happy and thriving. She is both a biological parent and a "psychological" parent. Mindful as I am of the changing social and legal climate, on the facts of this case, I would attach greater significance perhaps than some to the biological link between the appellant and her children.'

It is this point which Mr Peter Jackson QC has put at the forefront of his submissions on behalf of the mother. He argues that, whatever the test to be adopted, it was wrong for the courts below to attach no significance whatever to the fact that CG is the child's mother. He also argues that the judge allowed herself to be distracted, by her disapproval of the mother and her behaviour, from a full consideration of the evidence relating to the children's welfare, which would have led her to a different conclusion.

THE WELFARE PRINCIPLE AND THE NATURAL PARENT

[25] Section 1(1) of the 1989 Act is clear:

> 'When a court determines any question with respect to—(a) the upbringing of a child; or (b) the administration of a child's property or the application of any income arising from it, the child's welfare shall be the court's paramount consideration.'

Section 1(3) supplements this by a list of factors to be considered in contested cases:

> '... (a) the ascertainable wishes and feelings of the child concerned (considered in the light of his age and understanding); (b) his physical, emotional and educational needs; (c) the likely effect on him of any change in his circumstances; (d) his age, sex, background and any characteristics of his which the court considers relevant; (e) any harm which he has suffered or is at risk of suffering; (f) how capable each of his parents, and any other person in relation to whom the court considers the question to be relevant, is of meeting his needs; (g) the range of powers available to the court under this Act in the proceedings in question.'

[26] The statutory ancestor of this principle was s 1 of the Guardianship of Infants Act 1925 (later consolidated with minor changes of terminology in s 1 of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971) which read:

> 'Where in any proceeding before any court ... the custody or upbringing of an infant, or the administration of any property belonging to or held on trust for an infant, or the application of the income thereof, is in question, the court, in deciding that question, shall regard the welfare of the infant as the first and paramount consideration, and shall not take into consideration whether from any other point of view the claim of the father, or any right at common law possessed by the father, in respect of such custody, upbringing, administration or application is superior to that of the mother, or the claim of the mother is superior to that of the father.'

[27] The 1925 Act was passed at a time when the father was sole guardian of his legitimate children and the mother the only person with parental rights over her illegitimate child. Section 1 clearly meant that, in future, such legal claims were to be ignored and the child's welfare was to prevail. In the landmark case of J v C [1969] 1 All ER 788, [1970] AC 668, this House held that this was equally applicable to disputes between parents and non-parents. In an oft-quoted passage Lord MacDermott explained the meaning of the words 'shall regard the welfare of the infant as the first and paramount consideration' thus:

> '... it seems to me that they must mean more than that the child's welfare is to be treated as the top item in a list of items relevant to the matter in question. I think they connote a process whereby, when all the relevant facts, relationships, claims and wishes of parents, risks, choices and other circumstances are taken into account and weighed, the course to be followed will be that which is most in the interests of the child's welfare as that term has now to be understood. That is the first consideration because it is of first importance and the paramount consideration because it rules on or determines the course to be followed.' (See [1969] 1 All ER 788 at 820–821, [1970] AC 668 at 710–711; my emphasis.)

The House therefore rejected the proposition that there was any presumption in favour of the natural parents of the child. Lord MacDermott put their position in this way:

'2. In applying s 1, the rights and wishes of parents, whether unimpeachable or otherwise, must be assessed and weighed in their bearing on the welfare of the child in conjunction with all other factors relevant to that issue.

3. While there is now no rule of law that the rights and wishes of unimpeachable parents must prevail over other considerations, such rights and wishes, recognised as they are by nature and society, can be capable of ministering to the total welfare of the child in a special way, and must therefore preponderate in many cases . . .' (See [1969] 1 All ER 788 at 824, [1970] AC 668 at 715; my emphasis.)

Lord MacDermott also referred, as did Lord Oliver of Aylmerton in Re KD (a minor) (ward: termination of access) [1988] 1 All ER 577 at 590, [1988] AC 806 at 828, to a proposition of FitzGibbon LJ in the Irish case of Re O'Hara [1900] 2 IR 232 at 240, decided before the enactment of the paramountcy principle in 1925:

'In exercising the jurisdiction to control or to ignore the parental right the court must act cautiously, not as if it were a private person acting with regard to his own child, and acting in opposition to the parent only when judicially satisfied that the welfare of the child requires that the parental right should be suspended or superseded.'

[28] Since then, the position has been put in a variety of ways in the Court of Appeal. Some have repeated the reference to the parental right: see, for example, Fox LJ in Re K (a minor) (ward: care and control) [1990] 3 All ER 795 at 798, [1990] 1 WLR 431 at 434; and Butler-Sloss LJ in Re H (a minor) (interim custody) [1991] FCR 985 at 987. In Re K, however, Waite J pointed out:

'The speeches in the House of Lords make it plain that the term "parental right" is not there used in a proprietary sense, but rather as describing the right of every child, as part of its general welfare, to have the ties of nature maintained, wherever possible, with the parents who gave it life.' (See [1990] 3 All ER 795 at 800, [1990] 1 WLR 431 at 437.)

But he went on to say that the question was: 'Are there any compelling factors which require me to override the prima facie right of this child to an upbringing by its surviving natural parent?'

[29] In Re H [1991] FCR 985 at 988–989, Lord Donaldson of Lymington MR explained matters this way:

'So it is not a case of parental right opposed to the interests of the child, with an assumption that parental right prevails unless there are strong reasons in terms of the interests of the child. It is the same test which is being applied, the welfare of the child. And all that Re K is saying, as I understand it, is that of course, there is a strong supposition that, other things being equal, a it is in the interests of the child that it shall remain with its natural parents. But that has to give way to particular needs in particular situations.'

That was the last word before the 1989 Act came into force. In Re W (a minor) (residence order) [1993] 2 FCR 589 at 599, Balcombe LJ agreed 'wholeheartedly' with Lord Donaldson and hoped that 'this divergence of views, if such it really is, can finally be stilled'. Waite LJ also agreed with Lord Donaldson's formulation b at 605, and remarked that—

> '[t]he authorities which have been cited by Balcombe LJ illustrate the difficulty of finding, within the infinite variety of circumstances in which the welfare of a child may fall to be applied as the paramount consideration, some principle which does precise justice to the element in c every child's welfare represented by the advantage of maintaining the ties of nature with its own parent.'

[30] My Lords, the 1989 Act brought together the government's proposals in relation to child care law and the Law Commission's recommendations in relation to the private law. In its working paper Family Law: Review of Child d Law: Custody (working paper no 96 (1986)) para 6.22, having discussed whether there should be some form of presumption in favour of natural parents, the commission said this:

> 'We conclude, therefore, that the welfare of each child in the family should continue to be the paramount consideration whenever their custody or e upbringing is in question between private individuals. The welfare test itself is well able to encompass any special contribution which natural parents can make to the emotional needs of their child, in particular to his sense of identity and self-esteem, as well as the added commitment which knowledge of their parenthood may bring. We have already said that the indications are f that the priority given to the welfare of the child needs to be strengthened rather than undermined. We could not contemplate making any recommendation which might have the effect of weakening the protection given to children under the present law.'

Nor should we. The statutory position is plain: the welfare of the child is the g paramount consideration. As Lord MacDermott explained, this means that it 'rules upon or determines the course to be followed'. There is no question of a parental right. As the Law Commission explained, 'the welfare test itself is well able to encompass any special contribution which natural parents can make to the emotional needs of their child' or, as Lord MacDermott put it, the claims and h wishes of parents 'can be capable of ministering to the total welfare of the child in a special way'.

[31] None of this means that the fact of parentage is irrelevant. The position in English law is akin to that in Australian law, as explained by Lindenmayer J in Hodak v Newman (1993) 17 Fam LR 1, and subsequently approved by the Full Court of the Family Court of Australia in Rice v Miller (1993) 16 Fam LR 970 and j Re Evelyn [1998] FamCA 55:

> 'I am of the opinion that the fact of parenthood is to be regarded as an important and significant factor in considering which proposals better advance the welfare of the child. Such fact does not, however, establish a presumption in favour of the natural parent, nor generate a preferential position in favour of the natural parent from which the court commences its decision making process

> . . . Each case should be determined upon an examination of its own merits and of the individuals there involved.' (My emphasis.)

[32] So what is the significance of the fact of parenthood? It is worthwhile picking apart what we mean by 'natural parent' in this context. There is a difference between natural and legal parents. Thus, the father of a child born to unmarried parents was not legally a 'parent' until the Family Law Reform Act 1987 but he was always a natural parent. The anonymous donor who donates his sperm or her egg under the terms of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 is the natural progenitor of the child but not his legal parent: see ss 27 and 28 of the 1990 Act. The husband or unmarried partner of a mother who gives birth as a result of donor insemination in a licensed clinic in this country is for virtually all purposes a legal parent, but may not be any kind of natural parent: see s 28 of the 1990 Act. To be the legal parent of a child gives a person legal standing to bring and defend proceedings about the child and makes the child a member of that person's family, but it does not necessarily tell us much about the importance of that person to the child's welfare.

[33] There are at least three ways in which a person may be or become a natural parent of a child, each of which may be a very significant factor in the child's welfare, depending upon the circumstances of the particular case. The first is genetic parenthood: the provision of the gametes which produce the child. This can be of deep significance on many levels. For the parent, perhaps particularly for a father, the knowledge that this is 'his' child can bring a very special sense of love for and commitment to that child which will be of great benefit to the child (see, for example, the psychiatric evidence in Re C (MA) (an infant) [1966] 1 All ER 838, [1966] 1 WLR 646). For the child, he reaps the benefit not only of that love and commitment, but also of knowing his own origins and lineage, which is an important component in finding an individual sense of self as one grows up. The knowledge of that genetic link may also be an important (although certainly not an essential) component in the love and commitment felt by the wider family, perhaps especially grandparents, from which the child has so much to gain.

[34] The second is gestational parenthood: the conceiving and bearing of the child. The mother who bears the child is legally the child's mother, whereas the mother who provided the egg is not: see s 27 of the 1990 Act. While this may be partly for reasons of certainty and convenience, it also recognises a deeper truth: that the process of carrying a child and giving him birth (which may well be followed by breast-feeding for some months) brings with it, in the vast majority of cases, a very special relationship between mother and child, a relationship which is different from any other.

[35] The third is social and psychological parenthood: the relationship which develops through the child demanding and the parent providing for the child's needs, initially at the most basic level of feeding, nurturing, comforting and loving, and later at the more sophisticated level of guiding, socialising, educating and protecting. The phrase 'psychological parent' gained most currency from the influential work of Goldstein, Freud and Solnit Beyond the Best Interests of the Child (1973), who defined it thus:

> 'A psychological parent is one who, on a continuous, day-to-day basis, through interaction, companionship, interplay, and mutuality, fulfils the child's psychological needs for a parent, as well as the child's physical needs.

a The psychological parent may be a biological, adoptive, foster or common law parent.'

[36] Of course, in the great majority of cases, the natural mother combines all three. She is the genetic, gestational and psychological parent. Her contribution to the welfare of the child is unique. The natural father combines genetic and b psychological parenthood. His contribution is also unique. In these days when more parents share the tasks of child rearing and breadwinning, his contribution is often much closer to that of the mother than it used to be; but there are still families which divide their tasks on more traditional lines, in which case his contribution will be different and its importance will often increase with the age of the child.

c [37] But there are also parents who are neither genetic nor gestational, but who have become the psychological parents of the child and thus have an important contribution to make to their welfare. Adoptive parents are the most obvious example, but there are many others. This is the position of CW in this case. Whatever may have been the mother's stance in the past, Mr Jackson on d her behalf has not in any way sought to diminish the importance of CW's place in these children's lives or to challenge the legal arrangements put in place as a result of the first proceedings. Indeed, he asks us to restore those orders.

[38] What Mr Jackson challenges is the reversal in the parties' positions in response to the mother's removal of the children to Cornwall. He points out that, with one exception at the beginning of Bracewell J's judgment, there was no e reference to the important fact that CG is these children's mother. While CW is their psychological parent, CG is, as Hallett LJ pointed out, both their biological and their psychological parent. In the overall welfare judgment, that must count for something in the vast majority of cases. Its significance must be considered and assessed. Furthermore, the evidence shows that it clearly did count for f something in this case. These children were happy and doing very well in their mother's home. That should not have been changed without a very good reason.

THE CHILDREN'S WELFARE

[39] Mr Jackson argues that there was not a very good reason to change the children's primary home. The judge over-emphasised what she saw as the 'crux' g of the case at the expense of the overall picture of what would be best for these children. Although she twice referred to the 'checklist' of relevant factors in s 1(3) of the 1989 Act, had she gone through the evidence relating to each of those factors systematically, giving proper weight to the children's relationship with their mother, she could not have reached the conclusion which she did. In h particular, when concluding that she had no confidence that the mother would not seek to marginalise CW in the future, she gave no weight to the fact that regular and good quality contact had been continuing since it was re-established after the move.

[40] My Lords, it is of course the case that any experienced family judge is well j aware of the contents of the statutory checklist and can be assumed to have had regard to it whether or not this is spelled out in a judgment. However, in any difficult or finely balanced case, as this undoubtedly was, it is a great help to address each of the factors in the list, along with any others which may be relevant, so as to ensure that no particular feature of the case is given more weight than it should properly bear. This is perhaps particularly important in any case where the real concern is that the children's primary carer is reluctant or unwilling to acknowledge the importance of another parent in the children's lives.

[41] Making contact happen and, even more importantly, making contact work is one of the most difficult and contentious challenges in the whole of family law. It has recently received a great deal of public attention. Courts understandably regard the conventional methods of enforcing court orders as a last resort: fining the primary carer will only mean that she has even less to spend upon the children; sending her to prison will deprive them of their primary carer and give them a reason to resent the other parent who invited this. Nor does punishment address the real sources of the problem, which may range from a simple failure to understand what the children need, to more complex fears resulting from the parents' own relationship. That is why the assistance of a professional such as Mr Martin in this case can be so valuable. It is also why more constructive measures are to be introduced under the Children and Adoption Act 2006. The court will be able to direct either parent to engage in activities which will help them to understand and work through the difficulties. The range of penalties for breach of court orders will include an order to engage in unpaid work, thus reducing the risk that punishing the parent will also punish the child.

[42] However, at least as long ago as V-P v V-P (access to child) (1978) 1 FLR 336, it was realised that a more potent encouragement to comply with court orders may be to contemplate changing the child's living arrangements. Ormrod LJ put it very directly (at 339, 340):

> '. . . I do not want to issue threats, but the mother should, I think, realize this: the father has a home with the half brother in it, he is unemployed, he is available to look after both these children full time. The mother is fully occupied, so that the grandmother is playing a very important part in this child's life . . .
>
> That being so, it would be a mistake on the part of the mother, in my judgment, to assume that the order for custody in her favour is inevitable; it is not and if the situation goes on as it is at present then it may be necessary to reconsider the question of custody.'

It is, I believe, becoming more common for family judges not only to issue such warnings but also to implement them. However, the object is to ensure that the arrangements which the court has made in the best interests of the child are actually observed. Only if this is not happening will the court conclude that other arrangements will be better for the child.

[43] In this particular case, the mother had behaved very badly. She, together with MG, had deliberately disobeyed the court's order. This had required considerable planning and the deception of her own solicitor. More importantly, it had been a terrible thing to do to the children. The aim had been to frustrate the contact arrangements ordered by the court. However, once she had been located and contact arrangements reinstated, she had abided by them. Had this been the usual case of a similar dispute between mother and father, I find it impossible to believe that a court would have contemplated changing the children's primary home and schooling while contact was continuing in accordance with the court's order. Of course, were the contact itself to be further frustrated, that would be a different matter.

CONCLUSION

[44] My Lords, I am driven to the conclusion that the courts below have allowed the unusual context of this case to distract them from principles which are of universal application. First, the fact that CG is the natural mother of these children in every sense of that term, while raising no presumption in her favour, is undoubtedly an important and significant factor in determining what will be best for them now and in the future. Yet nowhere is that factor explored in the judgment below. Secondly, while it may well be in the best interests of children to change their living arrangements if one of their parents is frustrating their relationship with the other parent who is able to offer them a good and loving home, this is unlikely to be in their best interests while that relationship is in fact being maintained in accordance with the court's order.

[45] I would therefore allow the appeal and make the order which Mr Jackson invites us to make. This is simply to reverse the names in the current allocation of time between the two households. I would also make a fresh family assistance order so that Mr Martin may continue his excellent work with this family for a further six months from today's date. That order may, of course, be repeated in due course and Mr Martin may refer the case back to court if the arrangements are not working: see s 16(6) of the 1989 Act. I am very conscious, as was Dr Sturge, the child psychiatrist who gave evidence in the case of Re D (contact and parental responsibility: lesbian mothers and known father) [2006] 1 FCR 556, of the vulnerability of someone in CW's position. Her importance in these children's lives has been stressed by both the professionals and all the judges who have decided this case. The mother should now be in no doubt about that or about the possible consequences should she not adhere to the arrangements which we have ordered. It is, however, always possible for parents to modify their arrangements by agreement. Modifications become inevitable as children grow older and develop lives of their own. Agreed arrangements are almost always preferable to those imposed by a court. I am sad to see these two women, who deliberately brought these children into the world for them to share, and who both love and want the best for them, locking themselves into the same sort of battles that, sadly, we so often see between mothers and fathers. I hope that they can now move on from this dispute into a happier and more co-operative future for the sake of their children.

Appeal allowed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Customs and Excise Commissioners v Barclays Bank plc

[2006] UKHL 28

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY, LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE AND LORD MANCE

10, 11 MAY, 21 JUNE 2006

Bank – Duty of care – Freezing order – Claimant serving on bank freezing orders prohibiting disposals from clients' accounts – Clients transferring money from accounts after claimant serving orders on bank – Whether bank owing duty of care to claimant to prevent payment of money from accounts.

The claimant commissioners obtained freezing orders in respect of outstanding value added tax against two companies, both of which held current accounts with the defendant bank. The orders specifically prohibited disposal of or dealing with assets up to a stated amount, including in particular any money in specified accounts at the bank. The bank was served with copies of the orders. Several hours later the bank authorised payments to be made out of the companies' respective accounts. The claimants claimed damages against the bank in the sums paid out in breach of the injunctions, alleging that the bank had been negligent in permitting the payments to be made after being notified of the freezing orders. The bank denied that it owed any duty of care to the claimants to prevent the payments and that question was ordered to be tried as a preliminary issue. The judge held that the bank did not owe a duty of care to the claimants but the Court of Appeal reversed his decision. The bank appealed.

Held – A bank, notified by a third party of a freezing injunction granted to the third party against one of the bank's customers affecting an account held by the customer with the bank owed no duty to the third party to take reasonable care to comply with the terms of the injunction. It would not be fair, just and reasonable to impose such a duty of care. The freezing order jurisdiction had developed as one exercised by court order enforceable only by the court's power to punish those who broke its orders. The only duty owed by a notified party was to the court. The freezing order carried its own remedies and its reach did not extend any further. As it could not be suggested that the customer owed a duty to the party which obtained an order it would be strange and anomalous if an action in negligence lay against a notified party. To hold that a non-consensual court order, without more, gave rise to a duty of care owed to the party obtaining the order involved a radical innovation. It was unjust and unreasonable that the bank should on being notified of an order which it had had no opportunity to resist become exposed to a liability. The duty was not alleged to arise from anything which the bank was doing. Its involvement with the commissioners was involuntary. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [15]–[19], [23]–[25], [38], [39], [41], [64]–[68], [77], [94], [109], [113], [114], below).

Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575, Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 and Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hallam-Eames v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hughes v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Arbuthnott v

Feltrim Underwriting Agencies Ltd, Deeny v Gooda Walker Ltd (in liq) [1994] 3 All ER 506 considered.

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2005] 3 All ER 852 reversed.

Notes

For the test for determining notional duty of care and for pure economic loss, see 33 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 604, 613.

Cases referred to in opinions

A v C [1980] 2 All ER 347, [1981] QB 956n, [1981] 2 WLR 629.

A-G v Leveller Magazine Ltd [1979] 1 All ER 745, [1979] AC 440, [1979] 2 WLR 247, HL.

A-G v Punch Ltd [2002] UKHL 50, [2003] 1 All ER 289, [2003] 1 AC 1046, [2003] 2 WLR 49.

A-G v Times Newspapers Ltd [1991] 2 All ER 398, [1992] 1 AC 191, [1991] 2 WLR 994, HL.

Al-Kandari v JR Brown & Co [1988] 1 All ER 833, [1988] QB 665, [1988] 2 WLR 671, CA; rvsg [1987] 2 All ER 302, [1987] QB 514, [1987] 2 WLR 469.

Anns v London Borough of Merton [1977] 2 All ER 492, [1978] AC 728, [1977] 2 WLR 1024, HL.

Brooks v Metropolitan Police Comr [2005] UKHL 24, [2005] 2 All ER 489, [2005] 1 WLR 1495.

Business Computers International Ltd v Registrar of Companies [1987] 3 All ER 465, [1988] Ch 229, [1987] 3 WLR 1134.

Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605, [1990] 2 WLR 358, HL.

Chapman v Honig [1963] 2 All ER 513, [1963] 2 QB 502, [1963] 3 WLR 19, CA.

Coggs v Bernard (1703) 2 Ld Raym 909, 91 ER 25.

Dean v Allin & Watts (a firm) [2001] EWCA Civ 758, [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep 249.

Digital Equipment Corp v Darkcrest Ltd [1984] 3 All ER 381, [1984] Ch 512, [1984] 3 WLR 617.

Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1, HL.

Elguzouli-Daf v Metropolitan Police Comr, McBrearty v Ministry of Defence [1995] 1 All ER 833, [1995] QB 335, [1995] 2 WLR 173, CA.

Gangway Ltd v Caledonian Park Investments (Jersey) Ltd [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep 715.

Gorringe v Calderdale Metropolitan BC [2004] UKHL 15, [2004] 2 All ER 326, [2004] 1 WLR 1057.

Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465, [1963] 3 WLR 101, HL.

Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hallam-Eames v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hughes v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Arbuthnott v Feltrim Underwriting Agencies Ltd, Deeny v Gooda Walker Ltd (in liq) [1994] 3 All ER 506, [1995] 2 AC 145, [1994] 3 WLR 761, HL.

Hudson (decd), Re, Hudson v Hudson [1966] 1 All ER 110, [1966] Ch 209, [1966] 2 WLR 398.

Mercantile Group (Europe) AG v Aiyela [1994] 1 All ER 110, [1994] QB 366, [1993] 3 WLR 1116, CA.

Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp [1970] 1 All ER 1009, [1970] 2 QB 223, [1970] 2 WLR 802, CA.

Morgan Crucible Co plc v Hill Samuel Bank Ltd [1990] 3 All ER 330, sub nom Morgan Crucible Co plc v Hill Samuel & Co Ltd [1991] Ch 295, [1991] 2 WLR 655; rvsd [1991] 1 All ER 148, [1991] Ch 295, [1991] 2 WLR 655, CA.

Murphy v Brentwood DC [1990] 2 All ER 908, [1991] 1 AC 398, [1990] 3 WLR 414, HL.
Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932, [1914–15] All ER Rep 45, HL.
Norwich Pharmacal Co v Comrs of Customs and Excise [1973] 2 All ER 943, [1974] AC 133, [1973] 3 WLR 164, HL.
Perre v Apand Pty Ltd (1999) 164 ALR 606, (1999) 198 CLR 180, [1999] HCA 36.
Phelps v London Borough of Hillingdon, Anderton v Clwyd CC, Jarvis v Hampshire CC, Re G (a minor) [2000] 4 All ER 504, [2001] 2 AC 619, [2000] 3 WLR 776, HL.
Private Bank International (TSB) SA v Chabra [1992] 2 All ER 245, [1992] 1 WLR 231.
Searose Ltd v Seatrain (UK) Ltd [1981] 1 All ER 806, [1981] 1 WLR 894.
Smith v Eric S Bush (a firm), Harris v Wyre Forest DC [1989] 2 All ER 514, [1990] 1 AC 831, [1989] 2 WLR 790, HL.
Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129, [1995] 2 AC 296, [1994] 3 WLR 354, HL.
Stovin v Wise [1996] 3 All ER 801, [1996] AC 923, [1996] 3 WLR 388, HL.
Sutherland Shire Council v Heyman (1985) 60 ALR 1, (1985) 157 CLR 424, Aus HC.
Ultramares Corp v Touche (1931) 174 NE 441, NY CA.
White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691, [1995] 2 AC 207, [1995] 2 WLR 187, HL.
Williams v Natural Life Health Foods Ltd [1998] 2 All ER 577, [1998] 1 WLR 830, HL.
X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633, [1995] 3 WLR 152, HL.
Z Bank v D1 [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep 656.
Z Ltd v A [1982] 1 All ER 556, [1982] QB 558, [1982] 2 WLR 288, CA.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Abou-Rahmah v Abacha [2005] EWHC 2662 (QB), [2006] 1 All ER (Comm) 247.
Adam Phones Ltd v Goldschmidt [1999] 4 All ER 486.
ADT Ltd v BDO Binder Hamlyn [1996] BCC 808.
Bank of China v NBM LLC [2001] EWCA Civ 1933, [2002] 1 All ER 717, [2002] 1 WLR 844.
Bank of Credit and Commerce International (Overseas) Ltd (in liq) v Price Waterhouse (a firm) [1998] BCC 617, CA.
Bankers Trust Co v Shapira [1980] 3 All ER 353, [1980] 1 WLR 1274, CA.
BP plc v AON Ltd [2006] EWHC 424 (Comm), [2006] 1 All ER (Comm) 789.
Cheltenham and Gloucester Building Society v Ricketts [1993] 4 All ER 276, [1993] 1 WLR 1545, CA.
Connell v Odlum [1993] 2 NZLR 257, NZ CA.
Connolly-Martin v Davis [1999] PNLR 826, CA.
D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust, K v Dewsbury Healthcare NHS Trust, K v Oldham NHS Trust [2005] UKHL 23, [2005] 2 All ER 443, [2005] 2 AC 373, [2005] 2 WLR 993.
Digital Equipment Corp v Darkcrest Ltd [1984] 3 All ER 381, [1984] Ch 512, [1984] 3 WLR 617.
Electra Private Equity Partners v KPMG Peat Marwick (a firm) [2001] BCLC 589, CA.
Hall (Arthur JS) & Co (a firm) v Simons, Barratt v Ansell (t/a Woolf Seddon (a firm)), Harris v Scholfield Roberts [2000] 3 All ER 673, [2002] 1 AC 615, [2000] 3 WLR 543, HL.
Heron II, The, Koufos v C Czarnikow Ltd [1967] 3 All ER 686, [1969] 1 AC 350, [1967] 3 WLR 1491, HL.
Hill (t/a RF Hill & Associates) v Van Erp (1997) 142 ALR 687, (1995) 188 CLR 159, Aus HC.

Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd [1970] 2 All ER 294, [1970] AC 1004, [1970] 2 WLR 1140, HL.

Islington London BC v University College London Hospital NHS Trust [2005] EWCA Civ 596, [2006] LGR 50.

Kent v Griffiths [2000] 2 All ER 474, [2001] QB 36, [2000] 2 WLR 1158, CA.

Merrett v Babb [2001] EWCA Civ 214, (2001) 80 ConLR 43, [2001] QB 1174, [2001] 3 WLR 1.

Michaud v Jackson (2003) 262 NBR (2d) 344, NB QBD.

R (on the application of A) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Kanidagli) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] EWHC 1585 (Admin), [2004] NLJR 1141.

Reeves v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1999] 3 All ER 897, [2000] 1 AC 360, [1999] 3 WLR 363, HL.

Smith v Littlewoods Organisation Ltd [1987] 1 All ER 710, [1987] AC 241, [1987] 2 WLR 480, HL.

Stansbie v Troman [1948] 1 All ER 599, [1948] 2 KB 48, CA.

Welsh v Chief Constable of the Merseyside Police [1993] 1 All ER 692.

Appeal

The defendant Barclays Bank plc appealed with permission of the House of Lords Appeal Committee given on 8 March 2005 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Peter Gibson, Longmore LJJ and Lindsay J) on 22 November 2004 ([2004] EWCA Civ 1555, [2005] 3 All ER 852) allowing the appeal of the claimant Customs and Excise Commissioners from the decision of Colman J on 3 February 2004 ([2004] EWHC 122 (Comm), [2004] 2 All ER 789) determining, as a preliminary issue in proceedings brought by the commissioners against the bank, that the bank, which had been notified of freezing orders relating to current accounts of certain of the bank's customers and had failed to prevent transfers of funds out of those accounts, did not owe the commissioners a duty of care. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

Michael Brindle QC and Richard Handyside (instructed by Lovells) for the bank.

Philip Sales and Daniel Stilitz (instructed by the Solicitor for Revenue and Customs) for the commissioners.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

21 June 2006. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, the important question raised by this appeal is whether a bank, notified by a third party of a freezing injunction granted to the third party against one of the bank's customers, affecting an account held by the customer with the bank, owes a duty to the third party to take reasonable care to comply with the terms of the injunction. The question arises in these proceedings brought by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise against Barclays Bank plc (the bank), and has been resolved as a preliminary issue on facts assumed to be true but not proved. Colman J at first instance resolved the issue in favour of the bank (see [2004] EWHC 122 (Comm), [2004] 2 All ER 789, [2004] 1 WLR 2027). The Court of Appeal (Peter Gibson and Longmore LJJ and Lindsay J) reversed his decision and ruled in favour of the commissioners (see [2004] EWCA Civ 1555, [2005] 3 All ER 852, [2005] 1 WLR 2082). The bank challenges that ruling.

[2] In January 2001 Brightstar Systems Ltd (Brightstar) and Doveblue Ltd (Doveblue) held current accounts with the bank. Both accounts were substantially in credit, but both companies owed the commissioners large sums of unpaid VAT. The commissioners believed that both companies would dissipate their assets in order to defeat judgments which the commissioners were likely to obtain. They accordingly applied for freezing injunctions against each of the companies, which were granted on 26 and 30 January 2001 respectively. The value of the assets restrained was £1,800,000 in the first case and £3,928,130 in the second. In each order a numbered account held by the company at the bank was specified, and in the second order the branch also. The first order was served on the bank by fax at about 12.33 pm on 29 January, the second (also by fax) at about 11.38 am on 30 January 2001. At about 2.30 pm on 29 January 2001 the bank authorised payments totalling £1,240,570 to be made out of the Brightstar account, and at about 2.00 pm on 30 January it permitted payments totalling £1,064,289 out of the Doveblue account. In due course the commissioners entered judgment against Brightstar for £2,285,788·98 and against Doveblue for £3,944,095·85. Neither company paid any part of the judgment, although the commissioners obtained and enforced garnishee orders absolute against residual sums remaining in the accounts of the companies. In these proceedings the commissioners claim damages against the bank in the sums paid out in breach of the respective injunctions plus interest for the appropriate periods. It is alleged (and for present purposes assumed) that the bank was negligent to permit the payments to be made.

[3] On being notified of each injunction the bank sent to the commissioners a standard letter confirming that the bank would abide by the terms of the order and notifying the commissioners of their duty to reimburse the bank for its costs incurred in complying with the order. Neither letter reached the commissioners before the respective payments were made, and neither influenced the conduct of the commissioners in any way. Had the letters reached the commissioners before release of the funds, the judge would have attached significance to them (see [2004] 2 All ER 789 at [76]–[81], [2004] 1 WLR 2027). But in my respectful opinion they were of no significance. The bank was bound to comply with the order of the court irrespective of any confirmation on its part. The letters did not affect the factual or the legal position. Their purpose was to pave the way to reimbursement of the costs of compliance incurred by the bank.

THE TEST OF TORTIOUS LIABILITY IN NEGLIGENCE FOR PURE FINANCIAL LOSS

[4] The parties were agreed that the authorities disclose three tests which have been used in deciding whether a defendant sued as causing pure economic loss to a claimant owed him a duty of care in tort. The first is whether the defendant assumed responsibility for what he said and did vis-à-vis the claimant, or is to be treated by the law as having done so. The second is commonly known as the threefold test: whether loss to the claimant was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of what the defendant did or failed to do; whether the relationship between the parties was one of sufficient proximity; and whether in all the circumstances it is fair, just and reasonable to impose a duty of care on the defendant towards the claimant (what Kirby J in Perre v Apand Pty Ltd (1999) 164 ALR 606 at 676, (1999) 198 CLR 180 at 275 (para 259), succinctly labelled 'policy'). Third is the incremental test, based on the observation of Brennan J in Sutherland Shire Council v Heyman (1985) 60 ALR 1 at 43–44, (1985) 157 CLR 424 at 481, approved by Lord Bridge of Harwich in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 576, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 618, that:

> 'It is preferable in my view, that the law should develop novel categories of negligence incrementally and by analogy with established categories, rather than by a massive extension of a prima facie duty of care restrained only by indefinable "considerations which ought to negative, or to reduce or limit the scope of the duty or the class of person to whom it is owed".'

Mr Brindle QC for the bank contended that the assumption of responsibility test was most appropriately applied to this case, and that if applied it showed that the bank owed no duty of care to the commissioners on the present facts. But if it was appropriate to apply either of the other tests the same result was achieved. Mr Sales for the commissioners submitted that the threefold test was appropriate here, and that if applied it showed that a duty of care was owed. But if it was appropriate to apply either of the other tests they showed the same thing. In support of their competing submissions counsel made detailed reference to the leading authorities including Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465; Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp [1970] 1 All ER 1009, [1970] 2 QB 223; Smith v Eric S Bush (a firm), Harris v Wyre Forest DC [1989] 2 All ER 514, [1990] 1 AC 831; Caparo Industries Plc v Dickman; Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hallam-Eames v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hughes v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Arbuthnott v Feltrim Underwriting Agencies Ltd, Deeny v Gooda Walker Ltd (in liq) [1994] 3 All ER 506, [1995] 2 AC 145; White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691, [1995] 2 AC 207; Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129, [1995] 2 AC 296; Williams v Natural Life Health Foods Ltd [1998] 2 All ER 577, [1998] 1 WLR 830; and Phelps v London Borough of Hillingdon, Anderton v Clwyd CC, Jarvis v Hampshire CC, Re G (a minor) [2000] 4 All ER 504, [2001] 2 AC 619. These authorities yield many valuable insights, but they contain statements which cannot readily be reconciled. I intend no discourtesy to counsel in declining to embark on yet another exegesis of these well-known texts. I content myself at this stage with five general observations. First, there are cases in which one party can accurately be said to have assumed responsibility for what is said or done to another, the paradigm situation being a relationship having all the indicia of contract save consideration. Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd would, but for the express disclaimer, have been such a case. White v Jones and Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, although the relationship was more remote, can be seen as analogous. Thus, like Colman J (whose methodology was commended by Paul Mitchell and Charles Mitchell, 'Negligence Liability for Pure Economic Loss' (2005) 121 LQR 194, 199), I think it is correct to regard an assumption of responsibility as a sufficient but not a necessary condition of liability, a first test which, if answered positively, may obviate the need for further inquiry. If answered negatively, further consideration is called for.

[5] Secondly, however, it is clear that the assumption of responsibility test is to be applied objectively (see Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1994] 3 All ER 506 at 521, [1995] 2 AC 145 at 181) and is not answered by consideration of what the defendant thought or intended. Thus Lord Griffiths said in Smith v Eric S Bush [1989] 2 All ER 514 at 534, [1990] 1 AC 831 at 862, that—

> 'The phrase "assumption of responsibility" can only have any real meaning if it is understood as referring to the circumstances in which the law will deem the maker of the statement to have assumed responsibility to the person who acts on the advice.'

Lord Oliver of Aylmerton, in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 589, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 637, thought 'voluntary assumption of responsibility'— a

> 'a convenient phrase but it is clear that it was not intended to be a test for the existence of the duty for, on analysis, it means no more than that the act of the defendant in making the statement or tendering the advice was voluntary and that the law attributes to it an assumption of responsibility if the statement or advice is inaccurate and is acted on. It tells us nothing about the circumstances from which such attribution arises.' b

In similar vein, Lord Slynn of Hadley in Phelps v London Borough of Hillingdon [2000] 4 All ER 504 at 518, [2001] 2 AC 619 at 654, observed:

> 'It is sometimes said that there has to be an assumption of responsibility by the person concerned. That phrase can be misleading in that it can suggest that the professional person must knowingly and deliberately accept responsibility. It is, however, clear that the test is an objective one (Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1994] 3 All ER 506 at 521, [1995] 2 AC 145 at 181). The phrase means simply that the law recognises that there is a duty of care. It is not so much that responsibility is assumed as that it is recognised or imposed by the law.' c d

The problem here is, as I see it, that the further this test is removed from the actions and intentions of the actual defendant, and the more notional the assumption of responsibility becomes, the less difference there is between this test and the threefold test. e

[6] Thirdly, the threefold test itself provides no straightforward answer to the vexed question whether or not, in a novel situation, a party owes a duty of care. In Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 574, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 618, Lord Bridge, having set out the ingredients of the threefold test, acknowledged as much: f

> 'But it is implicit in the passages referred to that the concepts of proximity and fairness embodied in these additional ingredients are not susceptible of any such precise definition as would be necessary to give them utility as practical tests, but amount in effect to little more than convenient labels to attach to the features of different specific situations which, on a detailed examination of all the circumstances, the law recognises pragmatically as giving rise to a duty of care of a given scope. Whilst recognising, of course, the importance of the underlying general principles common to the whole field of negligence, I think the law has now moved in the direction of attaching greater significance to the more traditional categorisation of distinct and recognisable situations as guides to the existence, the scope and the limits of the varied duties of care which the law imposes.' g h

Lord Roskill made the same point in the same case ([1990] 1 All ER 568 at 581–582, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 628): j

> 'I agree with your Lordships that it has now to be accepted that there is no simple formula or touchstone to which recourse can be had in order to provide in every case a ready answer to the questions whether, given certain facts, the law will or will not impose liability for negligence or, in cases where such liability can be shown to exist, determine the extent of that liability. Phrases such as "foreseeability", "proximity", "neighbourhood", "just and reasonable", a "fairness", "voluntary acceptance of risk", or "voluntary assumption of responsibility" will be found used from time to time in the different cases. But, as your Lordships have said, such phrases are not precise definitions. At best they are but labels or phrases descriptive of the very different factual situations which can exist in particular cases and which must be carefully examined in each case before it can be pragmatically determined whether a duty of care b exists and, if so, what is the scope and extent of that duty. If this conclusion involves a return to the traditional categorisation of cases as pointing to the existence and scope of any duty of care, as my noble and learned friend Lord Bridge, suggests, I think this is infinitely preferable to recourse to somewhat wide generalisations which leave their practical application matters of difficulty and uncertainty.'

c

[7] Fourthly, I incline to agree with the view expressed by the Messrs Mitchell in their article cited above ('Negligence Liability for Pure Economic Loss' (2005) 121 LQR 194, 199) that the incremental test is of little value as a test in itself, and is only helpful when used in combination with a test or principle which identifies the legally significant features of a situation. The closer the facts of the case in issue to d those of a case in which a duty of care has been held to exist, the readier a court will be, on the approach of Brennan J adopted in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman, to find that there has been an assumption of responsibility or that the proximity and policy conditions of the threefold test are satisfied. The converse is also true.

[8] Fifthly, it seems to me that the outcomes (or majority outcomes) of the e leading cases cited above are in every or almost every instance sensible and just, irrespective of the test applied to achieve that outcome. This is not to disparage the value of and need for a test of liability in tortious negligence, which any law of tort must propound if it is not to become a morass of single instances. But it does in my opinion concentrate attention on the detailed circumstances of the particular case and the particular relationship between the parties in the context of their legal and f factual situation as a whole.

FREEZING INJUNCTIONS

[9] The jurisdiction to grant Mareva injunctions, to give freezing injunctions their original and better-known name, was developed by judicial decision from the g late 1970s onwards. It was recognised in s 37(3) of the Supreme Court Act 1981, and is now governed by CPR 25.1(f) as an order which may be made—

> '(i) restraining a party from removing from the jurisdiction assets located there; or (ii) restraining a party from dealing with any assets whether located within the jurisdiction or not . . .'

h

A standard form of injunction (which may be modified to meet the needs of the particular case) is annexed to the practice direction on interim injunctions (CPR 25 PD). The prescribed standard form contains a penal notice:

> 'IF YOU [ ] DISOBEY THIS ORDER YOU MAY BE HELD TO BE IN j CONTEMPT OF COURT AND MAY BE IMPRISONED, FINED OR HAVE YOUR ASSETS SEIZED.
>
> ANY OTHER PERSON WHO KNOWS OF THIS ORDER AND DOES ANYTHING WHICH HELPS OR PERMITS THE RESPONDENT TO BREACH THE TERMS OF THIS ORDER MAY ALSO BE HELD TO BE IN CONTEMPT OF COURT AND MAY BE IMPRISONED, FINED OR HAVE THEIR ASSETS SEIZED.'

The first of these warnings is addressed to the subject of the order, the second to any party (such as a bank) who knows of it. The form provides that anyone served with or notified of the order may apply to the court to vary or discharge it on notice to the applicant's solicitor. The effect of the order as it affects parties other than the applicant and the subject of the order is again stated (para 16):

> 'It is a contempt of court for any person notified of this order knowingly to assist in or permit a breach of this order. Any person doing so may be imprisoned, fined or have their assets seized.'

The form records an undertaking by the applicant (see para (7) of Sch B) to pay the reasonable costs of any person other than the subject of the order—

> 'which have been incurred as a result of this order including the costs of finding out whether that person holds any of the Respondent's assets and if the court later finds that this order has caused such person loss, and decides that such person should be compensated for that loss, the Applicant will comply with any order the court may make.'

In the present case, the second sentence of the penal notice (addressed to notified parties) was not included, but the effect of the notice was stated as in the standard form (subject to an immaterial change of wording) and both the notice concerning variation or discharge and the commissioners' undertaking as to costs of notified parties followed the text quoted.

[10] It is very well established that the purpose of a freezing injunction is to restrain a defendant or prospective defendant from disposing of or dealing with assets so as to defeat, wholly or in part, a likely judgment against it. The purpose is not to give a claimant security for his claim or give him any proprietary interest in the assets restrained: Gangway Ltd v Caledonian Park Investments (Jersey) Ltd [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep 715 at 717 (para 14) per Colman J. The ownership of the assets does not change. All that changes is the right to deal with them.

[11] The court will punish a party who breaches one of its orders if the breach is sufficiently serious and the required standard of knowledge and intention is sufficiently proved. This rule applies to freezing injunctions, as the prescribed form and the notices given to the bank in this case make clear. The leading authority on Mareva injunctions leaves no room for doubt. In Z Ltd v A [1982] 1 All ER 556 at 562, [1982] QB 558 at 572, Lord Denning MR said:

> 'Every person who has knowledge of [the order] must do what he reasonably can to preserve the asset. He must not assist in any way in the disposal of it. Otherwise he is guilty of a contempt of court.'

He repeated this point (see [1982] 1 All ER 556 at 563, 564, [1982] QB 558 at 573–574, 575). Eveleigh LJ devoted his judgment in the case wholly to the requirements of contempt in this context. That the power to punish for contempt is not a mere paper tiger is well illustrated by the judgment of Colman J in Z Bank v D1 [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep 656.

[12] There was discussion in argument whether the relationship of the commissioners and the bank as a notified party, was adverse or antagonistic, like that of opposing parties to litigation. The commissioners contended that it was not. The bank carried on banking business, and it is now a routine feature of such business that freezing injunctions are notified to it and are given effect. The substantial relief the commissioners were seeking was against the bank's customers, not it. The bank answered that this analysis did not fully reflect the reality of the situation.

[13] In 1981 Robert Goff J observed that 'the banks in this country have received numerous notices of [Mareva] injunctions which have been granted' (Searose Ltd v Seatrain (UK) Ltd [1981] 1 All ER 806 at 807, [1981] 1 WLR 894 at 895), and there is no reason to think that the pace has slackened since. Thus receiving notice of such injunctions is, literally, an everyday event. And the commissioners are right that they were not claiming substantive relief against the bank as a claimant seeks it against a defendant. But I think the bank is right to say that that is not the whole story, for three main reasons. First, the effect of notification of the order is to override the ordinary contractual duties which govern the relationship of banker and customer. This is not something of which a bank can complain or of which the bank does complain. A bank's relationship with its customers is subject to the law of the land, which provides for the grant of freezing injunctions. But the effect is none the less to oblige the bank to act in a way which but for the order would be a gross breach of contract. Such a situation must necessarily be very unwelcome to any bank which values its relationship with its customer. Secondly, the order exposes the bank to the risk that its employees may be imprisoned, the bank fined and its assets sequestrated. Of course, this is only a risk if the bank breaches the order in a sufficiently culpable way. But it is not a risk which exists independently of the order, and not a risk to which anyone would wish to be exposed. Thirdly, I think that the notice informing a bank of its right to set aside or discharge the order, addressed to both the customer and to the notified party, recognises its potentially prejudicial nature. If an order were neutral in its effect on the notified party, there would be no need to inform it of its right to vary or discharge it. While, therefore, the relationship of the commissioners and the bank was not, on notification of the order, that of hostile litigating parties, I think the bank is right to describe the relationship as adverse.

[14] I do not think that the notion of assumption of responsibility, even on an objective approach, can aptly be applied to the situation which arose between the commissioners and the bank on notification to it of the orders. Of course it was bound by law to comply. But it had no choice. It did not assume any responsibility towards the commissioners as the giver of references in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd (but for the disclaimer) and Spring v Guardian Assurance plc, the valuers in Smith v Eric S Bush, the solicitors in White v Jones and the agents in Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd may plausibly be said to have done towards the recipient or subject of the references, the purchasers, the beneficiaries and the Lloyd's Names. Save for the notification of the order (and treating as irrelevant the letters written by the bank: see [3], above) nothing crossed the line between the comissioners and the bank (see Williams v Natural Life Health Foods Ltd [1998] 2 All ER 577 at 582, [1998] 1 WLR 830 at 835). Nor do I think that the commissioners can be said in any meaningful sense to have relied on the bank. The commissioners, having obtained their orders and notified them to the bank, were no doubt confident that the bank would act promptly and effectively to comply. But reliance in the law is usually taken to mean that if A had not relied on B he would have acted differently. Here the commissioners could not have acted differently, since they had availed themselves of the only remedy which the law provided. Mr Sales suggested, although only as a fall-back argument, that the relationship between the commissioners and the bank was, in Lord Shaw's words adopted by Lord Devlin in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575 at 610, [1964] AC

465 at 529, 'equivalent to contract'. But the essence of any contract is voluntariness, and the bank's position was wholly involuntary.

[15] It is common ground that the foreseeability element of the threefold test is satisfied here. The bank obviously appreciated that, since risk of dissipation has to be shown to obtain a freezing injunction, the commissioners were liable to suffer loss if the injunction were not given effect. It was not contended otherwise. The concept of proximity in the context of pure economic loss is notoriously elusive. But it seems to me that the parties were proximate only in the sense that one served a court order on the other and that other appreciated the risk of loss to the first party if it was not obeyed. I think it is the third, policy, ingredient of the threefold test which must be determinative.

[16] In urging that a duty of care should be imposed on the bank the commissioners submitted that the orders were made by the court and notified to the bank to protect their interests; that recognition of a duty would in practical terms impose no new or burdensome obligation on the bank; that the rule of public policy which has first claim on the loyalty of the law is that wrongs should be remedied (see X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353 at 380, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 663, 749); that, since there are no facts here which would found a claim for effective redress in contempt, the commissioners will otherwise be left without any remedy; that a duty of care to the commissioners would not be inconsistent with the bank's duty to the court; and that there would, in such a case, be no indeterminacy as to those to whom the duty would be owed. These are formidable arguments and I am not surprised that the Court of Appeal accepted them. But I have difficulty in doing so, for six main and closely associated reasons.

[17] First, as already shown, the Mareva jurisdiction has developed as one exercised by court order enforceable only by the court's power to punish those who break its orders. The documentation issued by the court does not hint at the existence of any other remedy. This regime makes perfect sense on the assumption that the only duty owed by a notified party is to the court.

[18] Secondly, it cannot be suggested that the customer owes a duty to the party which obtains an order, since they are opposing parties in litigation and no duty is owed by a litigating party to its opponent (see Digital Equipment Corp v Darkcrest Ltd [1984] 3 All ER 381, [1984] Ch 512; Business Computers International Ltd v Registrar of Companies [1987] 3 All ER 465, [1988] Ch 229; Al-Kandari v JR Brown & Co [1988] 1 All ER 833, [1988] QB 665). It would be a strange and anomalous outcome if an action in negligence lay against a notified party who allowed the horse to escape from the stable but not against the owner who rode it out.

[19] It is clear, thirdly, that a duty of care in tort may co-exist with a similar duty in contract or a statutory duty, and I would accept in principle that a tortious duty of care to the commissioners could co-exist with a duty of compliance owed to the court. But I know of no instance in which a non-consensual court order, without more, has been held to give rise to a duty of care owed to the party obtaining the order, and one would have to ask whether a similar duty is owed by the subject of a search order, or a Norwich Pharmacal order (see Norwich Pharmacal Co v Comrs of Customs and Excise [1973] 2 All ER 943, [1974] AC 133), or a witness summons, in any case where economic loss is a foreseeable consequence of breach. It would seem that the commissioners' argument involves a radical innovation.

[20] Fourthly, it is a notable feature of this appeal that the commissioners adduce no comparative jurisprudence to support their argument. The House was referred to no material from any Commonwealth jurisdiction to show recognition of a duty such as that for which the commissioners contend. One learned author has ventilated the suggestion that a third party with knowledge of a Mareva injunction may owe a duty of care to the party in whose favour the order is made (see Mark Hoyle The Mareva Injunction and Related Orders (3rd edn, 1997) pp 138–139), but the same author recognises (p 131) that there is no right to sue a contemnor for the contempt alone and acknowledges that there is no civil right to damages and no power for the court to award compensation to the other party for the contemnor's actions, citing Re Hudson (decd), Hudson v Hudson [1966] 1 All ER 110, [1966] Ch 209 and Chapman v Honig [1963] 2 All ER 513, [1963] 2 QB 502.

[21] Fifthly, the cases relied on by the commissioners as providing the closest analogy with the present case do not in my opinion, on examination, reveal any real similarity. The first case relied on is Al-Kandari v JR Brown & Co. A defendant husband had on a previous occasion kidnapped two children whose custody was the subject of proceedings before the English court. The plaintiff mother was anxious that the same thing should not happen again. To reassure her the husband deposited his passport (on which the children were entered) with his solicitor, who negligently allowed him to regain possession of the passport and again remove the children. The wife sued her husband's solicitor in negligence, and it was held at first instance ([1987] 2 All ER 302, [1987] QB 514) and on appeal that the solicitor owed the wife a duty of care. The judge found ([1987] 2 All ER 302 at 308, [1987] QB 514 at 523) that the solicitor had given the wife an implied undertaking. The Court of Appeal held that the solicitor had accepted responsibilities towards the wife ([1988] 1 All ER 833 at 836, 838, [1988] QB 665 at 672, 675) and had acted as an independent custodian of the passport subject to the joint directions of both parties as well as the court (see [1988] 1 All ER 833 at 839, 838, [1988] QB 665 at 676, 675). There was in that case a very clear and entirely voluntary assumption of responsibility by the solicitor towards the wife.

[22] The facts of the second case relied on, Dean v Allin & Watts (a firm) [2001] EWCA Civ 758, [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep 249, are a little more complicated. An unsophisticated lender running the business of a car mechanic wanted to lend money to borrowers on the security of real property owned by an associate of the borrowers. The borrowers instructed the defendant solicitors to give effect to this transaction. The solicitors knew that the lender had no solicitor of his own, and there was a meeting between the solicitors and the lender. The solicitors' instructions from the borrower were to provide the lender with effective security, which was for his benefit and was fundamental to the transaction (see the judgment of Lightman J giving the leading judgment in the Court of Appeal: [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep 249 at [40]). There was, as the solicitors at all times knew, an identity of interest between borrower and lender. In this situation there was, again, a voluntary assumption of responsibility by the solicitors towards the lender and the trial judge's decision that no duty arose was, I respectfully think, rightly reversed. But I do not think this authority bears any close analogy with the present case.

[23] Lastly, it seems to me in the final analysis unjust and unreasonable that the bank should, on being notified of an order which it had no opportunity to resist, become exposed to a liability which was in this case for a few million pounds only, but might in another case be for very much more. For this exposure it had not been in any way rewarded, its only protection being the commissioners' undertaking to make good (if ordered to do so) any loss which the order might cause it, protection scarcely consistent with a duty of care owed to the commissioners but in any event valueless in a situation such as this.

[24] I would allow the appeal and dismiss the commissioners' claim with costs in the House and below.

LORD HOFFMANN.

[25] My Lords, the question in this case is whether a bank served with a freezing order (ci-devant Mareva injunction) upon a customer's account owes a duty to the claimant to take reasonable care to ensure that no payments are made out of the account. The Court of Appeal held that it did (see [2004] EWCA Civ 1555, [2005] 3 All ER 852, [2005] 1 WLR 2082) but in my opinion it does not.

[26] The claimants are the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs, who, in one of their former incarnations as the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, were owed a total of over £6m of value added tax by two companies called Brightstar Systems Ltd (Brightstar) and Doveblue Ltd (Doveblue). How these debts were allowed to accumulate is unknown, but the commissioners, apprehensive that the companies might remove their assets from the jurisdiction, applied for freezing orders against Brightstar on 26 January 2001 and against Doveblue on 30 January 2001. In both cases the orders restrained the companies from dealing with their assets and in particular with specified accounts with Barclays Bank plc (Barclays).

[27] The Brightstar order was served on Barclays by fax at 12.33 pm on 29 January. At 2.30 pm Brightstar made an application by fax to transfer £1,240,570 out of the account and although Barclays had taken routine steps to freeze the account, by an 'operator error' the payment was authorised and made. The Doveblue order was served on Barclays by fax at 11.38 am on 30 January but a payment of £1,064,289 out of the account was authorised at 2.00 pm, before the arrangements to freeze the account had taken effect. In both cases, the money paid out of the accounts has not been recovered and the judgments subsequently obtained by the commissioners remain unsatisfied.

[28] On these facts, alleged by the commissioners and assumed to be true, a preliminary issue in the nature of a demurrer was tried by Colman J. Barclays submitted that the action was bound to fail because they owed the commissioners no duty of care. The judge agreed but the Court of Appeal reversed his decision and allowed the action to proceed. Barclays appeal to your Lordships' House.

[29] A freezing order is an injunction made against the putative debtor to which the bank is not a party. But the existence of the injunction may have an effect upon third parties in two ways. First, it is a contempt of court to aid and abet a breach of an injunction by the party against whom the order was made. Secondly, it is an independent contempt of court to do an act which deliberately interferes with the course of justice by frustrating the purpose for which the order was made: see A-G v Times Newspapers Ltd [1991] 2 All ER 398, [1992] 1 AC 191 and A-G v Punch Ltd [2002] UKHL 50, [2003] 1 All ER 289, [2003] 1 AC 1046 for the general principle and Z Ltd v A [1982] 1 All ER 556 at 566–567, [1982] QB 558 at 578 for an explanation by Eveleigh LJ of its application to Mareva injunctions. The purpose of serving the bank with the order is therefore to give the bank notice that payment out of the account will frustrate its purpose and, if done deliberately, will be a contempt of court. However, as Lord Hope of Craighead said in A-G v Punch Ltd [2003] 1 All ER 289 at [87], [2003] 1 AC 1046, for the third party to be liable for contempt—

> 'it has . . . to be shown there was an intention on his part to interfere with or impede the administration of justice. This is an essential ingredient, and it has to be established to the criminal standard of proof.'

a [30] In the present case, there is no suggestion that anyone at Barclays intended deliberately to flout the order. The allegation is that they failed to take reasonable care to ensure that money was not paid out of the account.

[31] How does one determine whether a duty of care is owed? In cases of pure economic loss such as this, it is not sufficient that the bank ought reasonably to have foreseen that unless they had proper systems in place and their employees took b reasonable care to give effect to any freezing orders which came along, the beneficiaries of those orders might suffer loss. In the case of personal or physical injury, reasonable foreseeability of harm is usually enough, in accordance with the principle in Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1, to generate a duty of care. In the case of economic loss, something more is needed.

c [32] The Court of Appeal applied what it called the 'threefold test' proposed by Lord Bridge in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 573–574, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 617–618:

> '... in addition to foreseeability of damage, necessary ingredients in any situation giving rise to a duty of care are that there should exist between the d party owing the duty and the party to whom it is owed a relationship characterised by the law as one of "proximity" or "neighbourhood" and that the situation should be one in which the court considers it fair, just and reasonable that the law should impose a duty of a given scope on the one party for the benefit of the other.'

e [33] Longmore LJ held that this test was satisfied (see [2005] 3 All ER 852, [2005] 1 WLR 2082). Foreseeability was conceded; service of the order created proximity (even though the bank 'may not be particularly willing to have a relationship to the commissioners': see [30]) and it was 'eminently fair, reasonable and just' that a bank should take care not to allow a defendant to flout the order (see [31]). The order placed a burden on the bank but provided for the bank to be paid its reasonable f charges for compliance. Peter Gibson LJ agreed (at [63]): 'Practical justice requires the recognition of such a duty'. So did Lindsay J.

[34] Mr Brindle QC, who appeared for Barclays, said that this was the wrong approach. One should ask whether the bank had assumed responsibility for monitoring the account. As authority for applying this test, he relied upon g Lord Goff of Chieveley's analysis in Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hallam-Eames v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hughes v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Arbuthnott v Feltrim Underwriting Agencies Ltd, Deeny v Gooda Walker Ltd (in liq) [1994] 3 All ER 506 at 520–521, [1995] 2 AC 145 at 180–181. In this case, he said, the bank never assumed responsibility. If anything, it had responsibility thrust upon it.

h [35] There is a tendency, which has been remarked upon by many judges, for phrases like 'proximate', 'fair, just and reasonable' and 'assumption of responsibility' to be used as slogans rather than practical guides to whether a duty should exist or not. These phrases are often illuminating but discrimination is needed to identify the factual situations in which they provide useful guidance. For example, in a case in which A provides information to C which he knows will be j relied upon by D, it is useful to ask whether A assumed responsibility to D (see Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465; Smith v Eric S Bush (a firm), Harris v Wyre Forest DC [1989] 2 All ER 514, [1990] 1 AC 831). Likewise, in a case in which A provides information on behalf of B to C for the purpose of being relied upon by C, it is useful to ask whether A assumed responsibility to C for the information or was only discharging his duty to B (see Williams v Natural Life Health Foods Ltd [1998] 2 All ER 577, [1998] 1 WLR 830).

Or in a case in which A provided information to B for the purpose of enabling him to make one kind of decision, it may be useful to ask whether he assumed responsibility for its use for a different kind of decision (see Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605). In these cases in which the loss has been caused by the claimant's reliance on information provided by the defendant, it is critical to decide whether the defendant (rather than someone else) assumed responsibility for the accuracy of the information to the claimant (rather than to someone else) or for its use by the claimant for one purpose (rather than another). The answer does not depend upon what the defendant intended but, as in the case of contractual liability, upon what would reasonably be inferred from his conduct against the background of all the circumstances of the case. The purpose of the inquiry is to establish whether there was, in relation to the loss in question, the necessary relationship (or 'proximity') between the parties and, as Lord Goff of Chieveley pointed out in Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1994] 3 All ER 506 at 521, [1995] 2 AC 145 at 181, the existence of that relationship and the foreseeability of economic loss will make it unnecessary to undertake any further inquiry into whether it would be fair, just and reasonable to impose liability. In truth, the case is one in which, but for the alleged absence of the necessary relationship, there would be no dispute that a duty to take care existed and the relationship is what makes it fair, just and reasonable to impose the duty.

[36] It is equally true to say that a sufficient relationship will be held to exist when it is fair, just and reasonable to do so. Because the question of whether a defendant has assumed responsibility is a legal inference to be drawn from his conduct against the background of all the circumstances of the case, it is by no means a simple question of fact. Questions of fairness and policy will enter into the decision and it may be more useful to try to identify these questions than simply to bandy terms like 'assumption of responsibility' and 'fair, just and reasonable'. In Morgan Crucible Co plc v Hill Samuel Bank Ltd [1990] 3 All ER 330 at 333–335, sub nom Morgan Crucible Co plc v Hill Samuel & Co Ltd [1991] Ch 295 at 300–303 I tried to identify some of these considerations in order to encourage the evolution of lower-level principles which could be more useful than the high abstractions commonly used in such debates.

[37] In Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd itself, the House used the concept of assumption of responsibility in a situation which did not involve reliance upon information but where, once again, the issue was whether the necessary relationship between claimant and defendant existed. The issues in that case were whether the managing agents of a Lloyd's syndicate owed a duty of care in respect of their underwriting to Names with whom they had no contractual relationship and whether they owed a separate duty in tort to Names with whom they did have a contractual relationship. In fact, the arguments in Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd were a re-run of Donoghue v Stevenson in a claim for economic loss. In that case, as it seems to me, the use of the concept of assumption of responsibility, while perfectly legitimate, was less illuminating. The question was not whether the defendant had assumed responsibility for the accuracy of a particular statement but a much more general responsibility for the consequences of their conduct of the underwriting. To say that the managing agents assumed a responsibility to the Names to take care not to accept unreasonable risks is little different from saying that a manufacturer of ginger beer assumes a responsibility to consumers to take care to keep snails out of his bottles.

[38] Even in this context, however, the notion of assumption of responsibility serves a different, weaker, but nevertheless useful purpose in drawing attention to the fact that a duty of care is ordinarily generated by something which the defendant has decided to do: giving a reference, supplying a report, managing a syndicate, making ginger beer. It does not much matter why he decided to do it; it may be that he thought it would be profitable or it may be that he was providing a service pursuant to some statutory duty, as in Phelps v London Borough of Hillingdon, Anderton v Clwyd CC, Jarvis v Hampshire CC, Re G (a minor) [2000] 4 All ER 504, [2001] 2 AC 619 and Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp [1970] 1 All ER 1009, [1970] 2 QB 223. In the present case, however, the duty is not alleged to arise from anything which the bank was doing. It is true that the bank was carrying on the business of banking, handling money on behalf of its customers. But that is not alleged to have been either necessary or sufficient to generate the duty in this case. Not necessary, because if such a duty is created by notice of the freezing order, it must apply to anyone who has possession or control of the defendant's assets: the garage holding his car, the stockbroker nominee company holding his shares, his grandmother holding a drawer-full of his bank notes. On being given notice of the order, they would all be under an obligation to take reasonable care to ensure that the defendant did not get his hands on the assets. Not sufficient, because there is no suggestion that, apart from the freezing order, the bank in carrying on its ordinary business would be under any duty to protect the position of the commissioners.

[39] There is, in my opinion, a compelling analogy with the general principle that, for the reasons which I discussed in Stovin v Wise [1996] 3 All ER 801 at 818–820, [1996] AC 923 at 943–944, the law of negligence does not impose liability for mere omissions. It is true that the complaint is that the bank did something: it paid away the money. But the payment is alleged to be the breach of the duty and not the conduct which generated the duty. The duty was generated ab extra, by service of the order. The question of whether the order can have generated a duty of care is comparable with the question of whether a statutory duty can generate a common law duty of care. The answer is that it cannot (see Gorringe v Calderdale Metropolitan BC [2004] UKHL 15, [2004] 2 All ER 326, [2004] 1 WLR 1057). The statute either creates a statutory duty or it does not. (That is not to say, as I have already mentioned, that conduct undertaken pursuant to a statutory duty cannot generate a duty of care in the same way as the same conduct undertaken voluntarily.) But you cannot derive a common law duty of care directly from a statutory duty. Likewise, as it seems to me, you cannot derive one from an order of court. The order carries its own remedies and its reach does not extend any further.

[40] Colman J relied upon the fact that the advisers of one party to litigation owe no duty to the other party and for this purpose treated a party's bank as being in much the same position as his lawyers (see [2004] EWHC 122 (Comm), [2004] 2 All ER 789, [2004] 1 WLR 2027). For my part I prefer to place no particular weight upon this factor. The freezing order suspended the bank's duty to its client and compliance would therefore have created no conflict of interest. The Court of Appeal relied upon the fact that the order provided for payment to the bank of its reasonable costs incurred as a result of this order. I do not regard this as a material factor either. It is one thing to have to do some paper work and another to be put on risk for millions of pounds.

[41] I would therefore allow the appeal and restore the judgment of Colman J.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[42] My Lords, the presumed facts giving rise to this appeal are of the simplest. In January 2001 the Commissioners of Customs and Excise intended to raise proceedings for payment of very large sums which they alleged that two companies, Brightstar Systems Ltd (Brightstar) and Doveblue Ltd (Doveblue), owed them in respect of value added tax (VAT). On 26 January the commissioners obtained a freezing order (familiarly known as a Mareva injunction) against Brightstar. The order was in the usual terms, prohibiting Brightstar from removing from England and Wales or in any way disposing of or dealing with or diminishing any of its assets in England and Wales, including, in particular, any money in account number 70845302 at Barclays Bank plc (Barclays). The limit was £1,800,000 (though it was subsequently increased). The commissioners undertook to pay any reasonable costs which the bank incurred as a result of the order. At about 12.33 pm on 29 January the commissioners notified Barclays of the order. Despite this, at about 2.30 pm on the same day, due to an error, Barclays authorised payments totalling £1,240,570 to be made out of the Brightstar account. In their proceedings against Brightstar the commissioners obtained judgment in default for £2,285,788·98, but Brightstar have paid nothing. In the present action the commissioners seek damages for the loss which they claim to have suffered as a result of Barclays' negligence in authorising the payments after being notified of the order.

[43] On 30 January 2001 the commissioners obtained a similar freezing order against Doveblue with a limit of £3,928,130. It referred in particular to money in account numbered 10902284 at Barclays Bank, Hounslow. The commissioners notified Barclays of the order at 11.38 am on 30 January but, again due to an error, at about 2 pm Barclays allowed £1,064,289 to be paid out of the Doveblue account. In due course the commissioners obtained judgment in default against Doveblue for £3,944,095·85, none of which has been paid by Doveblue. The commissioners again seek damages for the loss which they claim they suffered as a result of Barclays' negligence.

[44] The preliminary issue in the case is whether, on these assumed facts, Barclays owed a duty of care to the commissioners. Colman J held that they did not (see [2004] EWHC 122 (Comm), [2004] 2 All ER 789), but the Court of Appeal held that they did (see [2004] EWCA Civ 1555, [2005] 3 All ER 852).

[45] The assumed facts do not make any reference to the time when the freezing orders were actually served on Brightstar and Doveblue. More particularly, they do not spell out whether the orders were served on the companies after Barclays were notified. It would, however, be usual for the bank to be notified first, in order to minimise the risk that, once made aware of the orders, the companies would try to dispose of the funds in their accounts. I consider the position on that basis.

[46] In opening the appeal on behalf of Barclays, Mr Brindle QC focused on the fact that at the relevant time both Brightstar and Doveblue were customers of Barclays. The commissioners had obtained freezing orders against Barclays' customers and soon they would serve those orders on the bank's customers and commence adversarial proceedings to recover the VAT from them. The commissioners were therefore the adversaries of Barclays' customers and in that fight Barclays were, in effect, on their customers' side. As the companies' bankers, Barclays were in a roughly similar position to the companies' solicitors or counsel and, like them, they did not owe a duty of care to those on the other side.

[47] I do not find the analogy compelling. When parties embark on contested court proceedings, even under the rules of procedure in force today, they are entitled to treat the other side as opponents whom they wish to vanquish. So they do not owe them a duty of care (see Business Computers International Ltd v Registrar of Companies [1987] 3 All ER 465, [1988] Ch 229). Equally, when the parties employ solicitors and counsel to act for them in the proceedings, in general, those representatives owe no duty of care to the other side (see Al-Kandari v JR Brown & Co [1988] 1 All ER 833 at 838–839, [1988] QB 665 at 675 per Bingham LJ). But, as the narrative of events shows, Barclays did not represent their customers in their dispute with the commissioners. In reality, they were no more on the companies' side in that dispute than the companies' butchers, bakers or candlestick-makers.

[48] Mr Brindle next argued that no one owed a duty of care to avoid causing financial harm to another unless he had voluntarily undertaken responsibility towards that other person. Here Barclays had not undertaken any responsibility to the commissioners for the way in which they would freeze the companies' accounts. They had just been required to act due to the notification of the order. Mr Sales argued in reply that assumption of responsibility was not the only criterion for holding that someone owed a duty of care. It was just one factor to be taken into account. The correct approach was to adopt the so-called 'threefold test' and to ask whether the loss was reasonably foreseeable, whether the parties were in a relationship of proximity and whether it would be fair, just and reasonable that the defendant should owe a duty of care to the claimant. It is common ground that in this case the loss was reasonably foreseeable.

[49] There is no doubt that some passages in speeches in your Lordships' House provide support for the view that voluntary assumption of responsibility is the touchstone of liability for pure economic loss. In the first and most famous case, Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575 at 610, [1964] AC 465 at 528–529, Lord Devlin held that the categories of special relationships which might give rise to a duty of care in word as well as in deed are not limited to contractual relationships or to relationships of fiduciary duty—

> 'but include also relationships which in the words of Lord Shaw in [Nocton v Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932, [1914–15] All ER Rep 45] are "equivalent to contract" that is, where there is an assumption of responsibility in circumstances in which, but for the absence of consideration, there would be a contract.'

He then continued in what was to become a famous passage ([1963] 2 All ER 575 at 610–611, [1964] AC 465 at 529):

> 'I have had the advantage of reading all the opinions prepared by your lordships and of studying the terms which your lordships have framed by way of definition of the sort of relationship which gives rise to a responsibility towards those who act on information or advice and so creates a duty of care towards them. I do not understand any of your lordships to hold that it is a responsibility imposed by law upon certain types of persons or in certain sorts of situations. It is a responsibility that is voluntarily accepted or undertaken either generally where a general relationship, such as that of solicitor and client or banker and customer, is created, or specifically in relation to a particular transaction.'

Much of Lord Devlin's concern was to avoid the risk that people would be held liable for remarks made in a social or other informal context. Hence the emphasis on liability arising because the defendant himself assumes responsibility for what he says. None of the other members of the House analysed the basis of liability in quite this way, but nevertheless, to begin with at least, Lord Devlin's analysis was to prove influential. It fell out of favour, however, as a result of the criticisms of Lord Griffiths ('unlikely to be a helpful or realistic test in most cases') and

Lord Jauncey in Smith v Eric S Bush (a firm), Harris v Wyre Forest DC [1989] 2 All ER 514 at 536, 540, [1990] 1 AC 831 at 864–865, 870, and of Lord Roskill and Lord Oliver of Aylmerton in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 582, 589, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 628, 637. But, in a trio of cases a few years later its fortunes revived when it found a powerful supporter in Lord Goff of Chieveley.

[50] First, at the beginning of July 1994, in Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129, [1995] 2 AC 296, where counsel for the plaintiff had not put his case on the footing of Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd and the other members of the majority were proposing to allow the appeal on a broader basis, Lord Goff set out the reasoning, based on a Hedley Byrne assumption of responsibility, which he preferred. Lord Lowry agreed with his interpretation ([1994] 3 All ER 129 at 152, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 325). Next, towards the end of that same month, in Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hallam-Eames v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hughes v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Arbuthnott v Feltrim Underwriting Agencies Ltd, Deeny v Gooda Walker Ltd (in liq) [1994] 3 All ER 506 at 518, [1995] 2 AC 145 at 178 Lord Goff returned to the point and identified voluntary assumption of responsibility as 'the governing principle'. He sought to defuse the criticisms of Lord Griffiths and others by saying ([1994] 3 All ER 506 at 521, [1995] 2 AC 145 at 181) that, 'at least in cases such as the present', in which there is no problem in keeping the number of persons owed a duty of care within reasonable bounds, 'there seems to be no reason why recourse should not be had to the concept . . .' Where a case fell within the Hedley Byrne principle, 'there should be no need to embark upon any further inquiry whether it is "fair, just and reasonable"'. Finally, in February 1995, in White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691, [1995] 2 AC 207, where the plaintiff was an intended beneficiary under a will which the deceased's solicitors had negligently failed to prepare before his death, Lord Goff acknowledged ([1995] 1 All ER 691 at 710, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 268) that the Hedley Byrne principle could not 'in the absence of special circumstances, give rise on ordinary principles to an assumption of responsibility by the testator's solicitor towards an intended beneficiary'. Nevertheless, in his opinion, the House—

> 'should in cases such as these extend to the intended beneficiary a remedy under the Hedley Byrne principle by holding that the assumption of responsibility by the solicitor towards his client should be held in law to extend to the intended beneficiary who (as the solicitor can reasonably foresee) may, as a result of the solicitor's negligence, be deprived of his intended legacy in circumstances in which neither the testator nor his estate will have a remedy against the solicitor.'

[51] Part of the function of appeal courts is to try to assist judges and practitioners by boiling down a mass of case law and distilling some shorter statement of the applicable law. The temptation to try to identify some compact underlying rule which can then be applied to solve all future cases is obvious. Mr Brindle submitted that in this area the House had identified such a rule in the need to find that the defendant had voluntarily assumed responsibility. But the unhappy experience with the rule so elegantly formulated by Lord Wilberforce in Anns v London Borough of Merton [1977] 2 All ER 492 at 498–499, [1978] AC 728 at 751–752, suggests that appellate judges should follow the philosopher's advice to 'Seek simplicity, and distrust it'.

[52] Therefore it is not surprising that there are cases in the books—notably Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp [1970] 1 All ER 1009, [1970] 2 QB 223, approved by Lord Slynn of Hadley in Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3

All ER 129 at 158–159, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 332—which do not readily yield to analysis in terms of a voluntary assumption of responsibility, but where liability has none the less been held to exist. I see no reason to treat these cases as exceptions to some over-arching rule that there must be a voluntary assumption of responsibility before the law recognises a duty of care. Such a rule would inevitably lead to the concept of voluntary assumption of responsibility being stretched beyond its natural limits—which would in the long run undermine the very real value of the concept as a criterion of liability in the many cases where it is an appropriate guide. In any event, as the words which I have quoted from his speech in Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd make clear, Lord Goff himself recognised that, although it may be decisive in many situations, the presence or absence of a voluntary assumption of responsibility does not necessarily provide the answer in all cases. Indeed in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd Lord Reid saw it as only one possible basis, the other being where the defendant has 'accepted a relationship with the inquirer which requires him to exercise such care as the circumstances require' (see [1963] 2 All ER 575 at 583, [1964] AC 465 at 486). So I would reject Mr Brindle's submission on this point.

[53] In the absence of any single touchstone, the House finds itself in the familiar position, envisaged by Lord Bridge of Harwich in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 574, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 618, where a court faced with a novel situation must apply the threefold test, while recognising that—

> 'the concepts of proximity and fairness embodied in these additional ingredients are not susceptible of any such precise definition as would be necessary to give them utility as practical tests, but amount in effect to little more than convenient labels to attach to the features of different specific situations which, on a detailed examination of all the circumstances, the law recognises pragmatically as giving rise to a duty of care of a given scope.'

[54] For his part, Mr Sales was, of course, anxious to portray Barclays as being in a relationship with the commissioners which would give rise to a duty of care on the part of the bank if the threefold test were applied. The commissioners notified Barclays of the freezing order. This alerted them to the existence of the proceedings in which the commissioners were claiming large amounts of VAT from the companies. They knew that the commissioners had felt it necessary to protect their position by obtaining a freezing order. Barclays could easily foresee that, if they did not duly freeze the accounts and the companies transferred the funds, the commissioners might well be unable to enforce any judgment against them. So Barclays would realise that the commissioners were relying on them to freeze the accounts. In these circumstances Barclays owed a duty of care to the commissioners.

[55] Essentially, Mr Sales was simply describing the consequences which he said flowed from the notification of the freezing order. This can be seen by supposing that, before applying for any order, the commissioners had approached Barclays, had told them about their claims for VAT, had explained the risk that the companies might defeat those claims by transferring the funds in their accounts and had asked for Barclays' help. Knowing all that, the bank would have been under no obligation to help the commissioners. For one thing, you do not come under a duty in tort to prevent someone causing me financial harm just because I tell you what is likely to happen to me if you do not take steps to prevent it. In addition, of course, Barclays would have been contractually bound to transfer the funds if their customers so instructed and even if they knew that this was likely to cause the commissioners financial harm. So they could have done nothing to help, even if they had wanted to.

[56] The position changed when Barclays were notified of the freezing order. In Z Ltd v A [1982] 1 All ER 556 at 566, [1982] QB 558 at 578 Eveleigh LJ stated the consequences which ensue when there are acts or omissions which are contrary to the terms of an injunction:

> '(1) The person against whom the order is made will be liable for contempt of court if he acts in breach of the order after having notice of it. (2) A third party will also be liable if he knowingly assists in the breach, that is to say if knowing the terms of the injunction he wilfully assists the person to whom it was directed to disobey it. This will be so whether or not the person enjoined has had notice of the injunction.'

Eveleigh LJ went on to deal with the argument that the liability of a third party arose because he was treated as aiding and abetting the defendant (ie as an accessory) and that, since the defendant could himself not be in breach unless he had notice, it followed that there was no offence to which the third party could be an accessory:

> 'In my opinion this argument misunderstands the true nature of the liability of the third party. He is liable for contempt of court committed by himself. It is true that his conduct may very often be seen as possessing a dual character of contempt of court by himself and aiding and abetting the contempt by another, but the conduct will always amount to contempt of court by himself. It will be conduct which knowingly interferes with the administration of justice by causing the order of the court to be thwarted.' (See [1982] 1 All ER 556 at 566–567, [1982] QB 558 at 578.)

For Lord Denning MR ([1982] 1 All ER 556 at 563, [1982] QB 558 at 574), the juristic principle was:

> 'As soon as the bank is given notice of the Mareva injunction, it must freeze the defendant's bank account. It must not allow any drawings to be made on it, neither by cheques drawn before the injunction nor by those drawn after it. The reason is because, if it allowed any such drawings, it would be obstructing the course of justice, as prescribed by the court which granted the injunction, and it would be guilty of a contempt of court.'

[57] In A-G v Times Newspapers Ltd [1991] 2 All ER 398, [1992] 1 AC 191, the House applied Eveleigh LJ's analysis of the position of a third party. Lord Oliver of Aylmerton noted ([1991] 2 All ER 398 at 417, [1992] 1 AC 191 at 222) that:

> 'Once the conclusion is reached that the fact that the alleged contemnor is not party to or personally bound by the court's order then, given the intention on his part to interfere with or obstruct the course of justice, the sole remaining question is whether what he has done has that effect in the particular circumstances of the case.'

According to the speeches in A-G v Leveller Magazine Ltd [1979] 1 All ER 745, [1979] AC 440, the gravamen of the offence of contempt of court would be that the contemnor's act 'frustrates, thwarts, or subverts the purpose of the court's order and thereby interferes with the due administration of justice in the particular action'

(see [1991] 2 All ER 398 at 418, [1992] 1 AC 191 at 223). Lord Oliver added ([1991] 2 All ER 398 at 419, [1992] 1 AC 191 at 223):

> '"Purpose", in this context, refers, of course, not to the litigant's purpose in obtaining the order or in fighting the action but to the purpose which, in seeking to administer justice between the parties in the particular litigation of which it had become seized, the court was intending to fulfil.'

[58] In A-G v Punch Ltd [2002] UKHL 50 at [39], [2003] 1 All ER 289 at [39], [2003] 1 AC 1046, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead quoted this passage with approval and went on (at [43]) to explain the position of a third party in this way:

> 'When proceedings come before a court the plaintiff typically asserts that he has a legal right which has been or is about to be infringed by the defendant. The claim having come before the court, it is then for the court, not the parties to the proceedings or third parties, to determine the way justice is best administered in the proceedings. It is for the court to decide whether the plaintiff's asserted right needs and should have any, and if so what, interim protection. If the court orders that pending the trial the defendant shall not do certain acts the court thereby determines the manner in which, in this respect, the proceedings shall be conducted. This is the court's determination on what interim protection is needed and is appropriate. Third parties are required to respect this determination, as expressed in the court's order. The reason why the court grants interim protection is to protect the plaintiff's asserted right. But the manner in which this protection is afforded depends upon the terms of the interlocutory injunction. The purpose the court seeks to achieve by granting the interlocutory injunction is that, pending a decision by the court on the claims in the proceedings, the restrained acts shall not be done. Third parties are in contempt of court if they wilfully interfere with the administration of justice by thwarting the achievement of this purpose in those proceedings.' (My emphasis.)

[59] As these authorities show, when the court granted the commissioners' application for a freezing order, its purpose was to protect the commissioners by preventing the companies from parting with their assets pending the conclusion of the commissioners' action for the payment of the VAT. Unlike, say, an arrestment on the dependence in Scots law, the freezing orders were directed at the two companies, not at the bank. But, if the bank had deliberately ignored the orders and set about assisting the companies to transfer their assets, that would have thwarted the court's purpose in granting the orders and the bank would have been in contempt of court, even if the companies themselves had still been unaware of the relevant order. So Barclays had to freeze the companies' assets, not out of any consideration for the commissioners but because to do otherwise would thwart the purpose of the court and obstruct the course of justice.

[60] The courts make quite extensive use of freezing orders. So, in practice, banks like Barclays can be expected to have in place a system for freezing accounts when they are notified of an order—and to take care when they have to operate the system. But, of itself, this does not mean that if they fail to take care they are liable to the applicant who obtained the order. For instance, as I pointed out in Brooks v Metropolitan Police Comr [2005] UKHL 24 at [38], [2005] 2 All ER 489 at [38], [2005] 1 WLR 1495, a prosecutor is under a professional and ethical duty to take care in preparing and presenting the case against a defendant whom he is prosecuting. If he fails to take the necessary care, any conviction may be unsafe and he himself may be subject to some disciplinary sanction. Nevertheless, the prosecutor does not assume a responsibility to the defendant to act carefully and owes him no duty of care in the law of tort (see Elguzouli-Daf v Metropolitan Police Comr, McBrearty v Ministry of Defence [1995] 1 All ER 833 at 842, [1995] QB 335 at 349 per Steyn LJ).

[61] In most cases the third party will be a bank or similar institution. But sometimes a private individual who happens, for example, to be looking after the addressee's car will be startled to receive notification of a freezing order. This puts him in essentially the same position as a bank which is notified of an order. Usually, he will do his best to respect the order and to hold on to the car. Should the law add to his burdens, however, by exposing him to an uninsured liability in damages if he fails to take the care which is ultimately considered to be reasonable and the addressee makes off with the car?

[62] Punishment for contempt of court is the remedy which the law provides for the addressee's failure to comply with an injunction such as a freezing order. Liability is strict and so he may be guilty of contempt even where he did not deliberately flout the order, the degree of his fault being relevant in determining the appropriate punishment (see A-G v Times Newspapers Ltd [1991] 2 All ER 398 at 415, [1992] 1 AC 191 at 217 per Lord Oliver of Aylmerton).

[63] By contrast, a third party who is notified of an injunction is guilty of contempt of court only if he knowingly takes a step which will frustrate the court's purpose in granting the order. So a bank will be in contempt only if it knowingly fails to freeze a customer's account and pays away sums in the account after being notified of an order. Mr Sales argued that this was not a sufficient sanction: the law of tort could usefully supplement the law of contempt by imposing on the bank a duty of care in favour of the party who obtained the freezing order. I would reject that argument.

[64] The policy of the law is that a third party, such as a bank, which is notified of a freezing order, must not knowingly undermine the court's purpose in granting the order. If this is all that the court which makes the order can demand, it would be inconsistent to hold that, by reason of the selfsame notification, the applicant could simultaneously demand a higher standard of performance from the bank—and then claim damages for the bank's failure to achieve it. Notification imposes a duty on the bank to respect the order of the court; it does not of itself generate a duty of care to the applicant. And here the commissioners can point to nothing more than the order and Barclays' negligent failure to respond to it.

[65] Mr Sales submitted that, as the bank must know, the applicant relies on it to comply with the order—and this means that the third party must take reasonable care for the applicant's interests. In my view, that is to stretch the concept of reliance too far. If a party wishes to freeze his opponent's bank account, he cannot do so without the intervention of the court. Having obtained a freezing order and notified the bank, the applicant can expect that any responsible bank will respect the order. But he does not rely on the bank doing so. Rather, like anyone else who obtains a court order, he relies on the court being able to enforce its orders. So the applicant relies on the court ensuring that the bank does not flout its order and punishing the bank for contempt if it does. That is, after all, the assistance which the law provides to someone who shows that his opponent's assets should be frozen. In any such proceedings the applicant and the bank are very much at arm's length, even though the applicant has to reimburse the bank's costs. There is nothing which could be regarded as a voluntary assumption of responsibility by the bank for the way in which it would go about freezing the companies' accounts. Similarly, there is nothing which involves the bank in entering into any kind of relationship with the applicant that requires it to exercise such care as the circumstances require. Indeed the bank and the applicant are about as far from being in a relationship 'equivalent to contract' as they could be. The bank has to act, but merely because the court order compels it to do so—ultimately on pain of punishment. It gets its reasonable costs, but makes no profit out of performing its duty. Moreover, its duty to respect the order and to act accordingly does not arise out of any relationship with the applicant. If anything, it arises out of the bank's relationship with its customers under which it holds funds that it may be instructed to transfer. Clearly, this relationship—which may well be damaged by the bank having to freeze the funds—cannot give rise to a duty of care to the applicant.

[66] Having regard to all these circumstances, in my view, not only is there not the necessary proximity between the applicant and a third party, such as a bank, who is notified of a freezing order, but it would not be fair, just and reasonable to hold that the third party owes a duty of care to the applicant.

[67] For these reasons I would hold that in this case Barclays did not owe a duty of care to the commissioners. I would accordingly allow the appeal and dismiss the claim.

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

[68] My Lords, I have had the great advantage of reading in draft the opinions of all your Lordships. Not without some hesitation, I agree with their conclusion that this appeal should be allowed. I will explain briefly what are the points on which I have no hesitation in concurring in my Lords' views, and what are the points on which I have found it more difficult to concur.

[69] Your Lordships are, I think, largely at one as to what I might call the basic approach to the problem. The development of the tort of negligence since the seminal case of Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1 has not been one of steady advance along a broad front. It has been a much more confused series of engagements with salients and beachheads, and retreats as well as advances. It has sometimes been only long after the event that it has been possible to assess the true significance of some clash of arms. That may be the case with the decision of this House in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465, as has been suggested in an important article, criticising what she calls the 'pockets of case law' approach, by Professor Jane Stapleton ('Duty of Care and Economic Loss: a Wider Agenda' (1991) 107 LQR 249, especially pp 259–263). The whole article, although published 15 years ago (that is, soon after the revision or displacement of Anns v London Borough of Merton [1977] 2 All ER 492, [1978] AC 728) contains much that is still very relevant.

[70] The complicating factors are not limited to the distinction between pure economic loss and personal injury or physical damage to property. Other factors are the interface with breach of statutory duty and the position of public authorities, especially local authorities in discharging their statutory functions in relation to social services, education and highways; special rules relating to defective premises, product liability and marine transport; the distinction (elusive though it sometimes is) between acts and omissions; and the recognition of the need for particular caution in imposing duties of care in tort (other than lawyers' duties to their own clients) in the context of hostile litigation.

[71] Arguably the last 15 years have seen some modest progress in the direction recommended by Professor Stapleton. The increasingly clear recognition that the threefold test (first stated by Lord Bridge of Harwich in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 573–574, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 617–618) does not provide an easy answer to all our problems, but only a set of fairly blunt tools, is to my mind progress of a sort. I respectfully agree with the observation of Kirby J in Perre v Apand Pty Ltd (1999) 164 ALR 606 at 684, (1999) 198 CLR 180 at 284 (para 283):

> 'As against the approach which I favour, it has been said that the three identified elements are mere "labels". So indeed they are ... Labels are commonly used by lawyers. They help steer the mind through the task in hand.'

(It would be an unnecessary distraction to go into the more recent jurisprudence in the High Court of Australia, noted by Christian Witting, 'The Three-Stage Test Abandoned in Australia—or Not?' (2002) 118 LQR 214.)

[72] This House had indeed, in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman itself, recognised both that the elements of the threefold test are labels, and that their usefulness is limited: see the observations of Lord Bridge ([1990] 1 All ER 568 at 574, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 618) and Lord Roskill ([1990] 1 All ER 568 at 581–582, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 628), both quoted in [6] of the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

[73] I would add a footnote in relation to the notion of 'voluntary assumption of responsibility'. So far as the modern law is concerned, this expression seems to be traceable mainly to the speeches of Lord Reid and Lord Devlin in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575 at 583, [1964] AC 465 at 486 ('held to have accepted some responsibility') and [1963] 2 All ER 575 at 611, [1964] AC 465 at 529 ('a voluntary undertaking to assume responsibility'). Earlier in his speech Lord Devlin had referred ([1963] 2 All ER 575 at 608, [1964] AC 465 at 526) to early authority going back as far as Coggs v Bernard (1703) 2 Ld Raym 909, 91 ER 25, the case of the broken cask of brandy, in which the motion in arrest of judgment had relied on the fact ((1703) 2 Ld Raym 909 at 912) that the defendant 'is neither laid to be a common porter, nor that he is to have any reward for his labour' (see also 91 ER 25 at 25). This quotation reflects the fact that there are (at any rate for a lawyer) two threads of meaning in the word 'voluntary': without compulsion and without remuneration. A common carrier would have been under an obligation to undertake the task of moving the brandy cask, and would have been remunerated. The old cases show liability being imposed despite the defendant's conduct having been (in one or both senses) voluntary. As the law has developed (and in the field of pure economic loss) liability is imposed because of the voluntary assumption of responsibility. But in the modern context the word 'voluntary' is being used, it seems to me, with the connotation of 'conscious', 'considered' or 'deliberate'. That appears, for instance, in White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691, [1995] 2 AC 207, both in the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson ([1995] 1 All ER 691 at 716, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 274) and in the dissenting speech of Lord Mustill ([1995] 1 All ER 691 at 729, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 286–287). That is particularly important in considering whether the defendant has undertaken responsibility for economic loss towards anyone other than the person or persons with whom he is in an obviously proximate relationship. In such cases the voluntary assumption of responsibility towards others, judged objectively, may provide the necessary proximity.

[74] In this case the appellant bank has not, in any meaningful sense, made a voluntary assumption of responsibility. It has by the freezing order had responsibility thrust upon it. But in any case it is not proximity that is the respondents' problem in this case. The duty of care for which the respondents contended successfully in the Court of Appeal, and which they seek to maintain in this House, is not a duty leading to 'liability in an indeterminate amount for an indeterminate time to an indeterminate class'(in the very well-known words of Cardozo CJ in Ultramares Corp v Touche (1931) 174 NE 441 at 444). It would be a liability in a known maximum sum (in respect of a precisely identified account), for a brief period, to a single known body corporate. The respondents' problem is whether it is fair, just and reasonable to impose on a bank a novel and substantial liability (on top of its potential liability for contempt of court) if it carelessly fails to comply with a freezing order.

[75] That is the point on which I have found this appeal more difficult than the rest of your Lordships. If this issue affected only banks, I would be slow to conclude that there could never be liability for carelessly failing to comply with a freezing order. Banks are already subject to strict regulation and potential sanctions in connection with money-laundering and similar activities. They are enjoined to know their customers. They become liable for breach of fiduciary duty if they shut their eyes to dishonest dealings by their customers. VAT (and PAYE) collected on behalf of HM Revenue and Customs by trading companies is not trust money, but banks cannot be unaware that VAT (and PAYE) collected in this way is often not properly accounted for, through fraud or mismanagement. There is a public interest in banks responding with particular care, promptness and vigilance to any freezing order obtained by HM Revenue and Customs.

[76] I am also rather disinclined to put much weight on the litigation context. A bank whose customer is a party to litigation may occasionally be joined as a party to the litigation, either for the purposes of a freezing order or in the pursuit of a proprietary remedy. But that is unusual, and it did not happen in this case. The bank's duty to its customer was overridden and suspended by the freezing order. Its position was a neutral position.

[77] However, Mr Sales, appearing for the commissioners, realistically acknowledged that if in these circumstances a duty of care is to be imposed on a bank, it must also be imposed on any other person affected by notice of a freezing order. In many cases that would produce unfair, unjust and unreasonable results. I too would allow this appeal and make the order which Lord Bingham proposes.

LORD MANCE.

[78] My Lords, the short question on this appeal is whether a bank served with notice of a non-proprietary freezing order (in yesterday's terms a Mareva injunction) owes a duty of care to the claimants who obtained the order against defendants in civil proceedings. The bank is Barclays Bank plc, the claimants are the Commissioners of Customs and Excise and the defendants are two companies, Brightstar Systems Ltd (Brightstar) and Doveblue Ltd (Doveblue), who have allegedly defaulted in payment of large sums of value added tax (VAT). The order against Brightstar was made on 26 January 2001 in the sum of £1,800,000 and notice of it was served on the bank by fax at about 12.33 pm on 29 January 2001. The order against Doveblue was made on 30 January 2001 in the sum of £3,928,130 and notice of it was served on the bank by fax at about 11.38 am on that day. The effect of each order was to suspend the bank's mandate in respect of any payment instructions from its customers which would reduce such customers' assets within the jurisdiction to below those sums: cf Z Ltd v A [1982] 1 All ER 556 at 563, [1982] QB 558 at 574 per Lord Denning MR and [1982] 1 All ER 556 at 572–573, [1982] QB 558 at 586 per Kerr LJ.

[79] In the case of each order about two hours after the bank received such notice, the relevant defendant used the bank's Faxpay system to give direct payment instructions to the bank's payment centre, as distinct from the branch where the relevant accounts (No 70845302 in the case of Brightstar and No 10902284 in the case of Doveblue) were held. The instructions were for payments totalling £1,240,570 (Brightstar) and £1,064,289 (Doveblue). The instructions were on their face in breach of the freezing orders, but the bank in each case met them. For the purposes of the present preliminary issues, it is assumed that the bank failed to act with reasonable competence. The commissioners, unable to recover the full outstanding VAT in any other way, claim damages from the bank in the sums thus paid out.

[80] The orders were in standard Commercial Court form. They prohibited the defendant companies from removing, disposing of, dealing with or diminishing the value of any of their assets in England and Wales up to the values frozen and included 'the following assets in particular', specifying the above-numbered accounts with the bank. They provided:

> 'Variation of [sic] discharge of this Order
>
> The Defendant (or anyone notified of this Order) may apply to the Court at any time to vary or discharge this Order (or so much of it as affects that person), but anyone wishing to do so must first inform the Claimants' legal representatives.
>
> Parties other than the Claimants and Defendant
>
> 1. Effect of this Order:-
>
> It is a Contempt of Court for any person notified of this Order knowingly to assist in or permit a breach of this Order. Any person doing so may be sent to prison, fined or have his assets seized.
>
> 2. Set off by Banks:-
>
> This injunction does not prevent any bank from exercising any right of set off it may have in respect of any facility which it gave to the Defendant before it was notified of this Order.
>
> 3. Withdrawals by the Defendant:-
>
> No bank need enquire as to the application or proposed application of any money withdrawn by the Defendant if the withdrawal appears to be permitted by this Order.'

The orders further recited that the judge had 'accepted the undertakings set out in Schedule B at the end of this Order', which provided:

> 'Schedule B
>
> Undertakings given to the Court by the Claimants . . .
>
> (7) The Claimants will pay the reasonable costs of anyone other than the Defendant which have been incurred as a result of this Order including the costs of ascertaining whether that person holds any of the Defendant's assets and if the Court later finds that this Order has caused such person loss, and decides that such person should be compensated for that loss, the Claimants will comply with any Order the Court may make.'

[81] The covering sheets to the faxes notifying of the orders to the bank show that the relevant officer acting for the commissioners knew and had already spoken to the bank's legal adviser to whom such notices were directed. The first notice relating to Brightstar requested that the attached freezing order be 'put into effect with immediate effect', while the second relating to Doveblue said 'Many thanks for your assistance in this matter'. However, neither in the pleadings nor in argument has anything been sought to be made of the informal preceding conversations. What is relied upon, as a fall-back and in relation to the Brightstar claim only, is the bank's response by letter dated 29 January 2001 written by its Retail Financial Services—Legal department. This said inter alia 'We confirm that the Bank will abide by the terms of the Order', drew attention to the costs which it would incur so doing and to its entitlement under the order to reimbursement and set out on the reverse an explanation of their nature and concluded:

> 'Almost all of the time expended on service of an Order is by staff of Managerial status and has been carefully costed. Our minimum costs for dealing with this Freezing Order are in excess of £150, but we are prepared to round our costs down to this amount.'

It is clear that this letter was not received by the commissioners before the bank's error in making the payment out of Brightstar's account, so that the commissioners cannot have relied on it. But it may have been sent before the error and, if so, Mr Philip Sales for the commissioners suggests that the bank might by the time of the error be regarded as having assumed responsibility for the task and/or towards the commissioners.

[82] The conceptual basis on which courts decide whether a duty of care exists in particular circumstances has been repeatedly examined. Three broad approaches have been suggested, involving consideration (a) whether there has been an assumption of responsibility, (b) whether a threefold test of foreseeability, proximity and 'fairness, justice and reasonableness' has been satisfied or (c) whether the alleged duty would be 'incremental' to previous cases. Mr Michael Brindle QC for the bank argues that in cases of economic loss the only relevant question is whether there has been an 'assumption of responsibility'. Mr Philip Sales for the commissioners submits that the primary approach should be through the threefold test of foreseeability, proximity and 'fairness, justice and reasonableness' and that assumption of responsibility and incrementalism are no more than potentially relevant factors under that test.

[83] All three approaches may often (though not inevitably) lead to the same result. Assumption of responsibility is on any view a core area of liability for economic loss. But all three tests operate at a high level of abstraction. What matters is how and by reference to what lower-level factors are interpreted in practice, see eg Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 573–574, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 617–618 per Lord Bridge of Harwich and [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 585, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 633 per Lord Oliver of Aylmerton.

[84] As to incrementalism, I note that the House's support for this approach in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman was given with reference to a passage in Brennan J's judgment in Sutherland Shire Council v Heyman (1985) 60 ALR 1 at 43–44, (1985) 157 CLR 424 at 481, where he was rejecting the House's approach in Anns v London Borough of Merton [1977] 2 All ER 492, [1978] AC 728, from which the House itself resiled a year after Caparo Industries plc v Dickman in Murphy v Brentwood DC [1990] 2 All ER 908, [1991] 1 AC 398. Brennan J said of Anns v London Borough of Merton:

> 'I am unable to accept that approach. It is preferable, in my view, that the law should develop novel categories of negligence incrementally and by analogy with established categories, rather than by a massive extension of a prima facie duty of care restrained only by indefinable "considerations which ought to negative, or to reduce or limit the scope of the duty or the class of person to whom it is owed".'

Incrementalism was therefore viewed as a corollary of the rejection, now uncontroversial, of any generalised liability for negligently caused economic loss, rather than as necessarily inconsistent with the development of novel categories of negligence. Having said that, caution and analogical reasoning are generally valuable accompaniments to judicial activity, and this is particularly true in the present area.

[85] The concept of assumption of responsibility derives from the fountain of most modern economic claims, Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465. The concept appears most clearly in the speech of Lord Devlin ([1963] 2 All ER 575 at 610, [1964] AC 465 at 528–529), who founded himself on the proposition that a duty of care might arise in relationships 'which . . . are "equivalent to contract" that is, where there is an assumption of responsibility in circumstances in which, but for the absence of consideration, there would be a contract'. Lord Devlin went on to emphasise ([1963] 2 All ER 575 at 611, [1964] AC 465 at 529) that, in the light of the bank's disclaimer in that case, the claim failed because: 'Responsibility can attach only to the single act, ie, the giving of the reference, and only if the doing of that act implied a voluntary undertaking to assume responsibility.' Where there has been an assumption of responsibility in the core sense considered in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd, questions of 'foreseeability', 'proximity' and 'fairness, justice and reasonableness' tend to answer themselves (cf Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hallam-Eames v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Hughes v Merrett Syndicates Ltd, Arbuthnott v Feltrim Underwriting Agencies Ltd, Deeny v Gooda Walker Ltd (in liq) [1994] 3 All ER 506 at 521, [1995] 2 AC 145 at 181 per Lord Goff of Chieveley).

[86] In Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd the concept was one of assumption of responsibility by the defendant towards the claimant. Lord Devlin's contractual analogy also indicates, and Mr Brindle accepts, that whether there has been an assumption of responsibility is to be assessed objectively: see Henderson v Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1994] 3 All ER 506 at 521, [1995] 2 AC 145 at 181 per Lord Goff, with whose speech all other members of the House agreed. Similarly, an assumption of responsibility may arise from the provision not merely of information or advice, but also of services: see [1994] 3 All ER 506 at 520, [1995] 2 AC 145 at 180 per Lord Goff.

[87] However, it has been said on a number of occasions that it is artificial or unhelpful to insist on fitting all claims for breach of a duty of care to avoid economic loss within the conception of assumption of responsibility, and there are several cases involving economic loss where the threefold test and incrementalism have been preferred.

[88] Thus in Smith v Eric S Bush (a firm), Harris v Wyre Forest DC [1989] 2 All ER 514, [1990] 1 AC 831 valuers engaged by the mortgagee council were held to owe a duty of care to house buyers, despite an express disclaimer stating that their report was 'intended solely for the information of' that council and advising the house buyers to obtain independent advice. Apart from the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 the disclaimer would have negatived any duty of care, in the same way as the disclaimer in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd. But, since the disclaimer was unreasonable and so void under the 1977 Act, the valuer was held to owe a duty of care to the buyers. Lord Templeman explained this on the basis that the valuer had 'assumed responsibility' to both mortgagee and purchaser, knowing that the latter has paid the fee and would probably rely on the report (see [1989] 2 All ER 514 at 522–523, [1990] 1 AC 831 at 847). But Lord Griffiths thought ([1989] 2 All ER 514 at 534, [1990] 1 AC 831 at 862) that assumption of responsibility was not 'a helpful or realistic test for liability', and explained its use in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd by reference to the disclaimer which there existed. He went on to say that:

> 'The phrase "assumption of responsibility" can only have any real meaning if it is understood as referring to the circumstances in which the law will deem the maker of the statement to have assumed responsibility to the person who acts on the advice.'

Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle took a similar view ([1989] 2 All ER 514 at 541, [1990] 1 AC 831 at 871). Lords Keith and Brandon agreed with both Lord Templeman and Lord Griffiths (see [1989] 2 All ER 514 at 517, [1990] 1 AC 831 at 840D-F).

[89] In Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605, Lord Bridge of Harwich found it unnecessary to address any difference between an approach based on assumption of responsibility and the threefold test (see [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 577–578, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 623). But Lord Roskill echoed Lord Griffiths's words in Smith v Eric S Bush (see [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 582, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 628) and Lord Oliver of Aylmerton said of 'the voluntary assumption of responsibility' that:

> 'This is a convenient phrase but it is clear that it was not intended to be a test for the existence of the duty for, on analysis, it means no more than that the act of the defendant in making the statement or tendering the advice was voluntary and that the law attributes to it an assumption of responsibility if the statement or advice is inaccurate and is acted on. It tells us nothing about the circumstances from which such attribution arises.' (See [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 589, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 637.)

Earlier in his speech ([1990] 1 All ER 568 at 585, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 633), Lord Oliver had also expressed doubt about the value of the threefold test, saying that:

> '. . . although the cases in which the courts have imposed or withheld liability are capable of an approximate categorisation, one looks in vain for some common denominator by which the existence of the essential relationship can be tested. Indeed, it is difficult to resist a conclusion that what have been treated as three separate requirements are, at least in most cases, in fact merely facets of the same thing, for in some cases the degree of foreseeability is such that it is from that alone that the requisite proximity can be deduced, whilst in others the absence of that essential relationship can most rationally be attributed simply to the court's view that it would not be fair and reasonable to hold the defendant responsible. "Proximity" is, no doubt, a convenient expression so long as it is realised that it is no more than a label which embraces not a definable concept but merely a description of circumstances from which, pragmatically, the courts conclude that a duty of care exists.'

Lord Jauncey took as his approach the threefold test (see [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 602, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 655). The House also expressed its support for Brennan J's preference in Sutherland Shire Council v Heyman (1985) 60 ALR 1 at 43–44, (1985) 157 CLR 424 at 481 for development of novel categories of negligence incrementally.

[90] In Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129, [1995] 2 AC 296, the issue was whether a company giving a reference owed a duty of care to the subject of the reference, its former employee, who by virtue of the content of reference had not been appointed to the new post which he was seeking elsewhere. While Lord Goff would have decided in favour of such a duty on the ground of assumption of responsibility, all three other members of the majority proceeded (as Lord Goff recognised: [1994] 3 All ER 129 at 143–144, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 316) on a broader basis, applying the threefold test of foreseeability, proximity and fairness, justice and reasonableness (see [1994] 3 All ER 129 at 152, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 325 per Lord Lowry, [1994] 3 All ER 129 at 159–160, 161, 162–163, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 333, 334, 336 per Lord Slynn of Hadley and [1994] 3 All ER 129 at 168, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 342 per Lord Woolf).

[91] In White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691, [1995] 2 AC 207 the general approach was revisited. Lord Goff referred ([1995] 1 All ER 691 at 700, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 257) to assumption of responsibility as the test which 'as a general rule' determined whether there could be liability for purely financial loss, but he recognised that the testator's solicitor could not be said actually to have assumed responsibility towards a disappointed beneficiary ([1995] 1 All ER 691 at 704, 710, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 262, 268). It was only because there would otherwise be a lacuna in the law leading to injustice that he concluded that the House—

> 'should in cases such as these extend to the intended beneficiary a remedy under the Hedley Byrne principle by holding that the assumption of responsibility by the solicitor towards his client should be held in law to extend to the intended beneficiary who (as the solicitor can reasonably foresee) may, as a result of the solicitor's negligence, be deprived of his intended legacy in circumstances in which neither the testator nor his estate will have a remedy against the solicitor.'

[92] Lord Browne-Wilkinson addressed ([1995] 1 All ER 691 at 715–716, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 273–274) the doubts expressed by Lord Griffiths in Smith v Eric S Bush [1989] 2 All ER 514, [1990] 1 AC 831 and Lord Roskill in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605 by explaining assumption of responsibility as 'assumption of responsibility for the task, not the assumption of legal responsibility'. He said:

> 'If the responsibility for the task is assumed by the defendant he thereby creates a special relationship between himself and the plaintiff in relation to which the law (not the defendant) attaches a duty to carry out carefully the task so assumed.'

On this basis he explained Smith v Eric S Bush and Caparo Industries plc v Dickman as cases where there had been 'a conscious assumption of responsibility for the task' (see [1995] 1 All ER 691 at 716, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 274), and said that, although the categories of cases of special relationship were not closed, the only two hitherto identified were:

> '(1) where there [was] a fiduciary relationship and (2) where the defendant has voluntarily answered a question or tenders skilled advice or services in circumstances where he knows or ought to know that an identified plaintiff will rely on his answers or advice. In both these categories the special relationship is created by the defendant voluntarily assuming to act in the matter by involving himself in the plaintiff's affairs or by choosing to speak.' (See [1995] 1 All ER 691 at 716–717, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 274.)

He recognised that neither of these categories covered the circumstances in White v Jones (see [1995] 1 All ER 691 at 717, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 275). But he considered a duty of care in White v Jones to be justified because 'the law in this area has not ossified', because Lord Devlin in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd had himself envisaged that there might be other sets of circumstances in which it would be appropriate to find a special relationship giving rise to a duty of care, and because the case fell within Lord Bridge's statement in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman that novel categories of negligence could be developed 'incrementally and by analogy with established categories'. A duty owed by the negligent solicitor to the disappointed beneficiary was closely analogous with existing categories of special relationship (see [1995] 1 All ER 691 at 717, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 275).

[93] This review of authority confirms that there is no single common denominator, even in cases of economic loss, by which liability may be determined. The threefold test of foreseeability, proximity and fairness, justice and reasonableness provides a convenient general framework although it operates at so high a level of abstraction. Assumption of responsibility is particularly useful as a concept in the two core categories of case identified by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691 at 716–717, [1995] 2 AC 207 at 274, when it may effectively subsume all aspects of the threefold approach. But if all that is meant by voluntary assumption of responsibility is the voluntary assumption of responsibility for a task, rather than of liability towards the defendant, then questions of foreseeability, proximity and fairness, reasonableness and justice may be very relevant. In White v Jones itself there was no doubt that the solicitor had voluntarily undertaken responsibility for a task, but it was the very fact that he had done so for the testator, not the disappointed beneficiary, that gave rise to the stark division of opinion in the House. Incrementalism operates as an important cross-check on any other approach.

[94] The present cannot be regarded as a case of assumption of responsibility. The involuntary nature of the bank's involvement with the commissioners makes it impossible to regard the situation as one 'akin to contract'; it is also difficult in any meaningful sense to speak of the bank as having voluntarily assumed responsibility even for the task in relation to which it was allegedly negligent, let alone responsibility towards the commissioners for the task. In a very general sense any bank, indeed anyone carrying on any activity during the course of which they might have cause to hold the monies or possessions of another, might be said to accept the risk that a third party might obtain a freezing order in respect of such monies or possessions. But that is to assign to the concept of voluntary assumption of responsibility so wide a meaning as to deprive it of effective utility. Further, I do not consider that it can make any difference to the above analysis in the case of Brightstar if the bank's letter of 29 January 2001 was posted before the bank's error. The letter was itself written simply to reflect and acknowledge the legal obligation which the freezing order imposed on the bank. To analyse the situation (as Lord Denning MR did in Z Ltd v A [1982] 1 All ER 556 at 564, [1982] QB 558 at 575) in terms of a request to freeze the account in consideration of payment of the relevant expenses is in my opinion artificial.

[95] Mr Brindle thus submits that no duty of care on the bank can be recognised because the bank did not voluntarily undertake responsibility even for the task which it is now alleged negligently to have executed. But Mr Sales can point to cases where a duty of care has been recognised even though the defendant cannot realistically be said to have voluntarily undertaken the relevant task. Instances may be found in Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp [1970] 1 All ER 1009, [1970] 2 QB 223, Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129, [1995] 2 AC 296 and Phelps v London Borough of Hillingdon [2000] 4 All ER 504, [2001] 2 AC 619. Mr Brindle questions the correctness of the first of these decisions, but submits that none of them points towards the recognition of a duty on the present facts. First, it is convenient to summarise their effect.

[96] In Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp Mr Sharp was the local land registrar charged by statute with keeping the local registry, and where requested searching it and issuing a certificate setting forth the result. A clerk was seconded by Hemel Hempstead Rural District Council to assist Mr Sharp with this work. The clerk negligently issued an inaccurate certificate to a prospective purchaser of land, omitting any reference to a claim to reimbursement of compensation which the Ministry had against the seller. The effect was to extinguish the right which the Ministry would otherwise have had to pursue its claim against the purchaser. It was conceded that, if the clerk was liable in negligence to the Ministry, then the council was vicariously liable for its clerk. The Court of Appeal held that the clerk was so liable. Lord Denning MR did not agree that a duty of care could only arise when there was a voluntary assumption of responsibility (see [1970] 1 All ER 1009 at 1018–1019, [1970] 2 QB 223 at 268). Salmon LJ said ([1970] 1 All ER 1009 at 1027–1028, [1970] 2 QB 223 at 279):

> 'It has been argued . . . that since the council did not voluntarily make the search or prepare the certificate for their clerk's signature they did not voluntarily assume responsibility for the accuracy of the certificate and, accordingly, owed no duty of care to the Minister. I do not accept that, in all cases, the obligation to take reasonable care necessarily depends upon a voluntary assumption of responsibility.'

He added that he was anyway far from satisfied that the council did not voluntarily assume responsibility in circumstances where they had chosen to discharge 'this somewhat pedestrian task' through their clerk, so that their registrar 'might be left free to carry out other far more difficult and important functions on their behalf'. Cross LJ saw 'no sufficient reason why in an appropriate case the liability should not extend to cases in which the defendant is obliged to make the statement which proves to be false' (see [1970] 1 All ER 1009 at 1038, [1970] 2 QB 223 at 291).

[97] In Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129, [1995] 2 AC 296 the company acting as referee was obliged to give a reference (which the company considering whether to engage its subject was also obliged to seek). The obligation arose under the rules of the relevant self-regulatory body, Lautro (the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation), set up under the Financial Services Act 1986. No member of the House saw such obligations as an obstacle to the recognition of a duty of care (see especially [1994] 3 All ER 129 at 148, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 321 per Lord Goff of Chieveley and [1994] 3 All ER 129 at 153, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 327 per Lord Lowry). The main focus was on whether the existence of a potential defence of qualified privilege in any action for defamation was a bar to the recognition of a duty of care, which the House also held was not the case.

[98] In Phelps v London Borough of Hillingdon [2000] 4 All ER 504, [2001] 2 AC 619 the House was concerned with claims arising in the statutory context of education authorities operating to a considerable extent under the Education Acts. The primary issue was whether the authorities' employees responsible for diagnosing special needs could owe a duty of care to those pupils affected by their diagnoses or failures to diagnose or treat properly. It was not suggested that the statutory duties themselves gave rise to any claim for breach of statutory duty, and the authorities argued that their employees' only duty of care was owed to the authorities. The House held that duties of care existed, even though the failures complained of took place in the course of purported fulfilment of the authorities' statutory duties, and of the employees' duties in that regard to the authorities. Further, Lord Slynn of Hadley did not accept that an authority could never owe a direct duty to pupils affected by its own (as opposed to one of its employees') failures to take care in the exercise of its powers relating to children with special needs (see [2000] 4 All ER 504 at 522, [2001] 2 AC 619 at 658), while Lord Clyde ([2000] 4 All ER 504 at 538, [2001] 2 AC 619 at 676) was 'certainly not prepared to deny the possibility that such a duty may exist'. Although there were allegations of damage amounting to physical loss in the cases before the House, the House did not draw any clear distinction between physical and economic loss and Lord Clyde ([2000] 4 All ER 504 at 533, [2001] 2 AC 619 at 670) expressly said that 'The loss claimed may be purely of an economic character'.

[99] Before considering further the relevance of these cases to the present, it is convenient to look more closely at factors which may assist to determine whether or not a duty of care should be recognised. Starting with the broad framework of the threefold test, no issue arises regarding foreseeability. The rationale of a non-proprietary freezing order is the risk of dissipation of assets, so the loss to the bank if the order was breached by the defendants or not implemented by the bank is exactly what is foreseen and foreseeable. Proximity is a vaguer notion, which may take in aspects which can also be considered under the head of fairness, justice and reasonableness. In legal, financial and practical terms, the freezing orders once notified to the bank created a most proximate relationship between the commissioners and the bank. The orders were specifically directed to Brightstar's and Doveblue's accounts, the commissioners gave direct notice of them to the bank, and the commissioners were obviously likely to be heavily dependent on the bank's observance of such orders if they were to hope to satisfy any judgments they might obtain against Brightstar and Doveblue.

[100] The key question therefore is whether it is therefore fair, just and reasonable to recognise a duty? Here, in particular, it is necessary to descend to a level of greater particularity. What are the factors which can be identified as relevant? Foremost among those which have militated against the recognition of a duty of care in respect of economic loss in the past has been the fear of the indeterminacy of any resulting liability. This arises both when economic loss is liable to have what the respondents (citing Jane Stapleton in 'Duty of Care and Economic Loss: A Wider Agenda' (1991) 107 LQR 249, 255) call a 'ripple' effect, creating a chain or network of potential claimants and when it is likely to give rise to individual claims in indeterminate amounts. But neither of those aspects of the 'floodgates' objection has any weight in circumstances such as the present. The freezing orders define both the potential claimants and the maximum amounts of any claim (although situations are conceivable in which it could take a third party given notice of such an order a little time to ascertain what assets belonging to the claimant he was actually holding). The fact that a bank served with a freezing order has, prior to notice of its making, no idea which of its customers may attract such an order seems to me an irrelevance. The bank's duty only arises and is only to comply once it has notice of the order. In practice, of course a reputable and well-organised bank will have machinery in place to meet all the contingencies and requirements which may be expected commonly to arise in banking life. But that does not militate for or against recognition of any duty of care which it would otherwise be appropriate to recognise.

[101] A second potentially relevant factor is the availability of adequate alternative protection for the commissioners. Here the position is again not unfavourable for the commissioners' case that a duty of care should be recognised. The bank, once notified of the freezing orders was informed by para 1 under the heading 'Effect of this Order' that it was liable to contempt proceedings, if it knowingly assisted in or permitted a breach of their terms. The bank was obliged to do its best to implement the order, and no reputable bank could or should do anything but take the notification of a freezing order extremely seriously. But contempt requires proof to a standard commensurate with the seriousness of the offence, and the sanctions available to the court are not directed primarily at compensation, but at the imposition of a penalty. It is true that, with sensible ingenuity, a sanction can sometimes be tailored in such a way as to encourage the restoration of an asset which has been improperly released from a freezing order or perhaps even compensation: see eg the order made by Colman J in Z Bank v D1 [1994] 1 Lloyd's Rep 656 at 668. But a civil remedy for breach of a duty of care would be a much more satisfactory and complete protection than potential contempt proceedings for a claimant like the commissioners.

[102] A third factor is the availability of insurance. There is no obvious likelihood that the commissioners could have obtained insurance against the risk of negligence by the bank. In contrast, one would, as Mr Brindle accepts, expect any exposure of the bank under any duty of care to be covered by a banker's blanket policy, the terms of which are typically of extreme width. If the recognition of a duty of care involves any risk which the bank's insurers have not yet taken into account, any additional premium could either be a basis for increasing the conventional sum (in 2001 £150) which the bank charges those obtaining freezing orders against it, or be factored more generally into the bank's profit and interest margins. However third parties other than banks may be notified of a freezing order, eg individuals or businesses holding a defendant's assets or moneys. It is not so obvious that they will have or could obtain insurance to cover the risk of negligent release to the defendant of such assets or monies. A distinction might, possibly, be advanced between third parties like banks whose business it is to look after monies and who could be expected to have procedures and insurance in place to meet the requirements and cover the risks of a freezing order and others of whom this would or could not necessarily be expected. But this would, I think, prove a difficult distinction both to justify in principle and to draw and apply.

[103] A fourth factor to be considered is whether the suggested duty of care to the claimants would be inconsistent with the bank's or the defendants' duty to the court. Clearly it would not. It would complement and if anything reinforce performance of that duty, as Colman J recognised in his judgment (see [2004] EWHC 122 (Comm) at [63], [2004] 2 All ER 789 at [63], [2004] 1 WLR 2027).

[104] Fifthly, the suggested duty of care would be equally consistent with the bank's duty to the defendants as its customers, bearing in mind that each freezing order revoked the bank's mandate to make payments pursuant to the relevant defendant's instructions to the extent necessary to ensure compliance with its terms.

[105] Sixthly (and associated with the previous two points), the nature of a freezing order means that a duty could without difficulty be recognised, although it would amount to a duty to take care to avoid a disposition which would itself involve an intentional contempt of court by the bank's customer.

[106] A seventh factor which weighed heavily and proved decisive with Colman J was that the bank was in his view in a similar position to an adverse party or an adverse party's legal representative in civil proceedings. An adverse party owes no duty of care in the commencement of proceedings: cf Business Computers International Ltd v Registrar of Companies [1987] 3 All ER 465, [1988] Ch 229, where a petitioner had negligently caused the plaintiff to be put into liquidation by serving a petition for the plaintiff's winding up at the wrong address. This decision was approved in Al-Kandari v JR Brown & Co [1988] 1 All ER 833 at 838, [1988] QB 665 at 675, where Bingham LJ (as he was) went on to say: 'In the ordinary course of adversarial litigation a solicitor does not owe a duty of care to his client's adversary.'

[107] Starting from this point, Mr Brindle pointed out that a solicitor might well hold client money which might be caught by a freezing order of which he was given notice, and submitted that, if such a solicitor could not owe a duty of care to the claimant, no more could or should the bank in the present case. But that submission assumes what it has to prove—it assimilates the role of a defendant's solicitor to whom a freezing order is notified with his adversarial role on behalf of his client. In some (albeit rare) circumstances one party's solicitor may at the same time occupy a separate, non-partisan role giving rise to a duty of care to [the] other party. The decision in Al-Kandari v JR Brown & Co demonstrates this. The solicitors there agreed to hold the defendant's passport to the order of the court. As Lord Donaldson of Lymington MR said ([1988] 1 All ER 833 at 836, [1988] QB 665 at 672):

> 'In voluntarily agreeing to hold the passport to the order of the court, the solicitors had stepped outside their role as solicitors for their client and accepted responsibilities towards both their client and the plaintiff and the children.'

Bingham LJ (as my Lord then was) said ([1988] 1 All ER 833 at 838, [1988] QB 665 at 675): 'If the client intends to confer a benefit on a third party, the solicitor may owe a duty to the third party to take reasonable care to see that effect is given to the client's intentions.' He went on ([1988] 1 All ER 833 at 839, [1988] QB 665 at 676):

> 'In so holding the passport the [solicitors] were not acting as solicitors and agents of Mr Al-Kandari, their client, but as independent custodians subject to the directions of the court and the joint directions of the parties.'

The first passage quoted from Bingham LJ's judgment refers to circumstances like those in White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691, [1995] 2 AC 207. In Dean v Allin & Watts (a firm) [2001] EWCA Civ 758, [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep 249, on which Mr Sales relied, the Court of Appeal took the view that such circumstances existed in the context of a property transaction where one party's solicitor was instructed and endeavouring to put security in place to enable a transaction to proceed in both parties' interests.

[108] Mr Brindle points out that third parties such as banks may not only be affected by notification of freezing orders, but may themselves actually be joined as co-defendants or sued in separate proceedings for relief (usually by way of disclosure, but in appropriate circumstances also by way of freezing order) which is essentially ancillary to a freezing order against the main defendant, the bank's customer: see eg A v C [1980] 2 All ER 347 at 352, [1981] QB 956n at 961, TSB Private Bank International SA v Chabra [1992] 2 All ER 245, [1992] 1 WLR 231 and Mercantile Group (Europe) AG v Aiyela [1994] 1 All ER 110, [1994] QB 366. (They may also be, and not uncommonly are, sued for disclosure of information about apparent wrong-doing in which they have innocently become involved: Norwich Pharmacal Co v Comrs of Customs and Excise [1973] 2 All ER 943, [1974] AC 133.) Apart from the relative rarity of the cases in which banks are joined as defendants to obtain freezing orders against them in respect of assets of the main defendant, I do not consider that their ancillary role as defendants in such cases would of itself be a reason for refusing to recognise a duty of care, if it were otherwise appropriate to do so.

[109] This brings me back to what is in my opinion the determinative factor in this case, that is the absence of any real voluntary aspect to the involvement of a third party such as the bank in relation to a claimant's freezing order such as the present. Al-Kandari v JR Brown & Co is a quite different case to the present, since the specific task was there voluntarily undertaken. In White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691, [1995] 2 AC 207 and Dean v Allin & Watts (a firm) [2001] 2 Lloyd's Rep 249 the solicitors also acted voluntarily on their clients' instructions, although the scope of their resulting duty was extended to third parties for whose benefit they so acted. In Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129, [1995] 2 AC 296 the relevant regulatory regime did no more than impose an obligation to obtain and give a reference of a familiar type which a former employer would commonly give, irrespective of any compulsion. It would have been incongruous if a duty of care was owed, when such a reference was not given under compulsion, but was absent just because it was. Further, if the reference had been unduly favourable, the recipient's reliance on it would have introduced an element bringing the situation close to that in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465, and it would have been strange if a duty were not also owed to the subject of an unduly unfavourable reference (cf [1994] 3 All ER 129 at 148, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 321 per Lord Goff). Phelps v London Borough of Hillingdon [2000] 4 All ER 504, [2001] 2 AC 619 is similarly a case where, although the defendant council and its employees were operating in the context of public statutory duties, they were none the less providing services which could equally well be and are provided in the private sector, and it would have been surprising if a similar duty of care were not owed by those providing to them to that owed in the private sector (see [2000] 4 All ER 504 at 533–534, [2001] 2 AC 619 at 670–671 per Lord Clyde).

[110] The closest case to the present on which Mr Sales can rely is Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp [1970] 1 All ER 1009, [1970] 2 QB 223. But the statutory scheme there was aimed at protecting persons in respect of property purchases and, so far as necessary for that purpose, overriding other proprietary interests. Again, it would have been incongruous if a person relying on such a certificate to his detriment could have a claim because of the closeness of the situation to Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd, but the Minister whose cause of action for reimbursement was extinguished had none (cf [1970] 1 All ER 1009 at 1018–1019, [1970] 2 QB 223 at 268 per Lord Denning and [1970] 1 All ER 1009 at 1027–1028, [1970] 2 QB 223 at 278 per Salmon LJ). I do not accept Mr Brindle's submission that Ministry of Housing and Local Government v Sharp was wrongly decided. It was referred to without disapproval in the speeches of both Lord Templeman and Lord Griffiths in Smith v Eric S Bush [1989] 2 All ER 514 at 522, 534, [1990] 1 AC 831 at 846, 862. The result reached was eminently fair, just and reasonable. The role of land registrar was established as a public service to keep accurate records and provide reliable information. The information was to enable buyers to be secure in the property rights they acquired but concomitantly to override other property interests in the public interest in order to achieve this, even though such security and overriding occurred through negligence of the registrar or a clerk fulfilling his function. It would be unjust if no compensation could be obtained for the adverse consequences on property rights of negligence of an official performing such a service in the public interest.

[111] There is no analogy between any of these cases and the present. The recognition of a duty of care in the present case would not be closely incremental upon any existing duty. Here, the bank has not been entrusted by statute or otherwise with the provision of any public service. It has simply been notified of an order made by the court in favour of a claimant, and warned that it will be liable for contempt if it knowingly assists or permits a breach of that order. In a case of contempt, the court has control of the situation and a discretion which enables it to match the appropriate penalty to the seriousness of the particular contempt. It may be said that, if the court can revoke the bank's contractual mandate from its customer and can impose on the bank a potential liability for contempt in a case of knowingly assistance in or permission of a breach, the court may also go further and impose a duty on the bank towards the claimant to take care to avoid any disposition of the defendants' frozen assets contrary to the freezing order. But that would be to impose a liability on an involuntary third party which would be outside the court's control, and which might be measured in very large sums, even for quite venial fault. The amounts caught by a freezing order can be very large, even though one would usually expect a third party notified of such an order to be able to ascertain quite quickly, from the order itself and from its own records, how much is actually caught by such an order. Nor does it seem to me that such a liability is required to maintain standards or ensure good practice. In practice, banks must and will try to do their best to ensure compliance with freezing orders, while their clients are, as this case shows, likely to try to evade them. Problems are, as here, most likely to arise at the very outset of such orders, when assets have not been fully ascertained or all possible avenues of evasion have not been closed.

[112] A further subsidiary consideration is that the commissioners, at least in a case such as the present, cannot be said to have relied to their detriment on anything said or done by the bank. All that has happened is that the defendants have succeeded in abstracting assets which the commissioners hoped to have frozen. In addition, if a duty of care were owed by a bank in this type of situation, it would be difficult to avoid the conclusion that other third parties, even private individuals, would also owe a duty of care, on receiving notification of a freezing order in respect of a defendant's assets which they happened to be holding. In the case of physical assets, questions could arise as to how far that would impose duties similar to those incurred by bailees to preserve or guard such assets (although I would accept that, if such duties were owed, it might be possible to limit them in extent to those owed to the defendant).

[113] Despite the consistency of many of the factors in play with the recognition of a duty of care, I would therefore answer the question whether it is fair, just and reasonable to impose such a duty on the bank in the negative. The common law has, it seems to me, developed a system offering very significant protection for claimants, together with very considerable incentives, backed by ample sanctions, for banks and other third parties to do their best to comply. Having imposed such an obligation on a third party, I do not consider that it should go further by imposing a duty on the third party towards a claimant to take care to prevent abstractions committed by the defendant in breach of a freezing order. This would not be analogous with or incremental to any previous development of the law. The position as it is without any such duty of care seems to me to represent a fair and normally effective balance between the respective interests involved.

[114] I would therefore allow the appeal, and restore the order made by Colman J.

Appeal allowed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Vibixa Ltd v Komori UK Ltd and others
Polestar Jowetts Ltd v Komori UK Ltd and others

[2006] EWCA Civ 536

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

SIR ANTHONY CLARKE MR, BROOKE AND ARDEN LJJ

14, 15 FEBRUARY, 9 MAY 2006

Statutory instrument – Power to make instrument – Preamble – General enabling words in preamble – Interpretation and effect of general enabling words – Whether general enabling words could be interpreted as referring to enabling power not expressly invoked – Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974, ss 15(1), 47(2) – Supply of Machinery (Safety) Regulations 1992, SI 1992/3073.

The claimants sought in their respective claims to recover damages for damage to property and loss of profit which they had suffered as a result of fires in their premises. Nobody's health or safety had been put at risk by any of the fires. The claimants alleged that the fires had been caused by defective machinery supplied by the defendants. They claimed damages for breach of duty in contract and tort, and for breach of statutory duty under the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974. They relied on s 47(2)[a] of the Act, which provided that breach of a duty imposed by health and safety regulations made by the Secretary of State pursuant to s 15(1)[b] should, so far as it caused damage, be actionable except in so far as the regulations provided otherwise, claiming that the defendants had been in breach of the Supply of Machinery (Safety) Regulations 1992, SI 1992/3073. The claimants contended that the 1992 regulations were health and safety regulations for the purposes of s 47(2) of the 1974 Act. The preamble[c] to the regulations expressly stated that they were made by the Secretary of State pursuant to s 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972 (because they were designed to implement Council Directive (EEC) 89/392 (on the approximation of laws relating to machinery)) 'in the exercise of powers conferred on him by that section and all of his other enabling powers'. The claimants argued that the regulations were also made pursuant to s 15(1) of the 1974 Act. The defendants applied to strike out the claims under the Act. The judge held that the regulations had not been made pursuant to s 15(1) and struck out those claims. The claimants appealed.

Held – General enabling words in the preamble to a statutory instrument, such as 'and all of his other enabling powers' in the preamble to the 1992 regulations, might be interpreted as referring to an enabling power, not expressly invoked, in situations such as (i) where, in order for the statutory instrument to have effect, the maker of the instrument had necessarily to have invoked that power, or (ii) where the operative provisions of the statutory instrument made it clear that a Section 47 is set out in the Appendix, below

b Section 15 is set out in the Appendix, below

c The preamble, so far as material, is set out at [6], below its maker had to have invoked that power, or (iii) where it was necessary to adopt that interpretation in order to make the statutory instrument conform to Community law or if that interpretation would make the statutory instrument compatible with the rights conferred by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1988). However, the general enabling words would not be interpreted as including an enabling power simply because the maker of the statutory instrument could have used that power. None of those situations applied in the case of the 1992 regulations. Moreover, it was not an objective of Directive (EEC) 89/392 to provide remedies for purchasers of machinery against suppliers of defective machinery, and therefore there was no need for the general enabling words in the 1992 regulations to be interpreted as referring to s 15(1) of the 1974 Act for that purpose. The general enabling words in the preamble to the 1992 regulations accordingly did not invoke the enabling power contained in s 15(1) of the 1974 Act, and the judge had been right to strike out the claims made under the Act. Accordingly, the appeals would be dismissed (see [13], [24]–[26], [38], [40], [41], below).

Buck v A-G [1965] 1 All ER 882 considered.

Notes

For the interpretation of subordinate legislation, see 44(1) Halsbury's Laws (reissue) para 1522.

For the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974, ss 15, 47, see 20 Halsbury Statutes (4th edn) (2005 reissue) 122, 164.

For the Supply of Machinery (Safety) Regulations 1992, SI 1992/3073, see 9 Halsbury's Statutory Instruments (2006 reissue) 159.

Cases referred to in judgment

Buck v A-G [1965] 1 All ER 882, [1965] Ch 745, [1965] 2 WLR 1033, CA.

EC Commission v Germany Case C-131/88 [1991] ECR I-825, ECJ.

Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentacion SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I-4135, ECJ.

R (on the application of Junttan Oy) v Bristol Magistrates' Court [2003] UKHL 55, [2004] 2 All ER 555.

Revenue and Customs Comrs v IDT Card Services Ireland Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 29, [2006] All ER (D) 220 (Jan).

Three Rivers DC v Bank of England [2000] 3 All ER 1, [2003] 2 AC 1, [2000] 2 WLR 1220, HL.

Appeals

The claimants, Vibixa Ltd and Polestar Jowetts Ltd, appealed against the order of Field J on 26 July 2005 ([2005] EWHC 1674 (QB), [2005] All ER (D) 480 (Jul)) striking out their respective claims against the defendants, Komori UK Ltd and Spectral Technology Ltd, in so far as they were made under the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974. A third defendant in the action, Bryland Fire Protection Ltd, took no part in the appeals. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Lord Neill of Bladen QC and Andrew Moran (instructed by Kennedys) for the claimants.

Michael Kent QC and Andrew Rigney (instructed by Barlow Lyde & Gilbert) for the first defendant.

Nicholas Baldock (instructed by Hextalls) for the second defendant.

Cur adv vult

9 May 2006. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

ARDEN LJ (giving the judgment of the court at the invitation of Sir Anthony Clarke MR).

[1] These appeals concern important questions of statutory interpretation. In particular, they are about the effect of some general words appearing in the preamble to a statutory instrument (SI). Those words are italicised in the quotation from the preamble set out at [7], below. General words of this kind are in common use in subordinate legislation. In the instant appeals, the relevant subordinate legislation is the Supply of Machinery (Safety) Regulations 1992, SI 1992/3073 (the machinery regulations).

[2] There is also an important question about the scope of the power to make health and safety regulations under s 15(1) of the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974. The appendix to this judgment sets out ss 1, 2, 15 and 47 of, and Sch 3 to, the 1974 Act.

[3] Before defining the legal issues for determination with more particularity, and setting out our conclusions and reasoning on them, we must place these issues in the context of the proceedings in which they arise.

BACKGROUND

[4] These are appeals against the order of Field J dated 26 July 2005 ([2005] EWHC 1674 (QB), [2005] All ER (D) 480 (Jul)). The judge's order struck out part of the cases of the appellants Polestar Jowetts Ltd (Polestar) and Vibixa Ltd (Vibixa) in their respective actions against the respondents, Komori UK Ltd (Komori) and Spectral Technology Ltd (Spectral). There is a third defendant in the action, Bryland Fire Protection Ltd. This party has played no part in these appeals. There has been no trial, and the correctness of the judge's conclusions depends on points of law.

[5] Polestar and Vibixa seek to recover damages for damage to property and loss of profit which the appellants suffered as a result of fires in their premises. They allege that the fires were caused by a defective type of printing machinery containing a dryer supplied by the two respondents to this appeal. Fires destroyed all three presses between June 1999 and October 2002 and also did other significant damage, although nobody's health or safety were put at risk by any of the fires. These claims were brought to recover damages for the ensuing losses. By their amended claim forms the claimants claimed damages for breach of duty in contract and tort and for breach of statutory duty under the 1974 Act. The appellants rely on s 47(2) of the 1974 Act, and contend that the machinery regulations are health and safety regulations for the purposes of that section. The respondents applied to strike out the claims under the 1974 Act. Their case is that the Secretary of State cannot make health and safety regulations so as to give rise to a claim for damages to property. The only issue that arises for our decision on these appeals is whether the judge was right to strike out their claims in so far as the claimants relied on breaches of statutory duty.

[6] Field J held that the machinery regulations were not made under s 15(1) of the 1974 Act and he accordingly struck out the appellants' claims made under the 1974 Act.

THE POWERS UNDER WHICH THE MACHINERY REGULATIONS WERE MADE

[7] The preamble to the machinery regulations states as follows:

> 'The Secretary of State, being a Minister designated for the purposes of section 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972 in relation to measures relating to the design and construction of, and to the placing on the market and putting into service of, machinery, in exercise of the powers conferred on him by that section and of all his other enabling powers, hereby makes the following Regulations . . .' (My emphasis.)

[8] The machinery regulations were thus expressly made by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to s 2(2) of the European Communities Act 1972. Section 2(2) of the 1972 Act is thus an enabling power for the purpose of the machinery regulations. It was invoked because the regulations are designed to implement Council Directive (EEC) 89/392 (on the approximation of the laws of the member states relating to machinery) (OJ 1989 L183 p 9) (the machinery directive).

[9] As already stated, the dispute between the parties is whether the machinery regulations were also made pursuant to s 15(1) of the 1974 Act. There is no express reference to s 15(1) of the 1974 Act in the preamble to the machinery regulations. The appellants rely on the additional words appearing in the preamble, that is the words 'and of all his other enabling powers'. If the machinery regulations were made under s 15(1) of the 1974 Act, then, as outlined above, the appellants contend that they have a cause of action against the respondents for damages for damage to property and loss of profits on the grounds of breach of statutory duty under s 47(1) the 1974 Act.

[10] We use the expression 'general enabling words' to refer to general words such as 'and of all his other enabling powers', when used in the preamble to a statutory instrument. We use the expression 'enabling power' to cover both a specific power to make regulations (here s 2(2) of the 1972 Act), such as may be expressly referred to in the preamble to a statutory instrument, and in addition general enabling words (if used).

[11] General enabling words are often used when an SI is made. Thus the issue on these appeals has wide implications. Do general enabling words cover, as the appellants say, all the powers that might have been invoked to make the SI or are they apt to denote only the powers that must necessarily be utilised if the SI is to take effect according to the terms in which it is enacted?

[12] There is a further issue, namely whether s 15(1) of the 1974 Act enables health and safety regulations to be made which protect not simply the health and welfare of employees or others at or around the employer's premises, but also the employer in the event that plant or machinery to which such regulations apply turn out to be defective, causing property damage instead of, or in addition to, personal injuries to employees.

SUMMARY OF THE COURT'S CONCLUSIONS

[13] For the reasons given below, our conclusions are as follows:

(1) General enabling words

General enabling words in the preamble to a statutory instrument may be interpreted as referring to an enabling power, not expressly invoked, in situations such as the following: (i) where, in order for the SI to have effect, the maker of the instrument must necessarily have invoked that power; or (ii) where the operative provisions of the SI make it clear that its maker must have invoked that power; or (iii) where it is necessary to adopt that interpretation in order to make the SI conform to community law or if that interpretation would make the SI compatible with the rights conferred by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). However the general enabling words will not be interpreted as including an enabling power simply because the maker of the SI could have used that power.

(2) Effect of the general enabling words in the machinery regulations

The general enabling words in the preamble to the machinery regulations did not invoke the enabling power contained in s 15(1) of the 1974 Act.

(3) Health and safety regulations and property damage

In any event, health and safety regulations made under s 15(1) of the 1974 Act cannot form the basis of a claim by the purchaser of machinery in respect of property damage or consequent loss of profits.

THE MACHINERY REGULATIONS

[14] The machinery regulations came into force on 1 January 1993. Although they are printed under the heading 'Health and Safety', nothing turns on this. The preamble to the machinery regulations makes it clear that the principal purpose of the machinery regulations is to regulate the design and sale of machinery. Thus, for example, the regulations provide for machinery which meets the requirements of the machinery directive to be certified by the addition of the words 'CE'.

[15] Regulation 3 of the machinery regulations provides that they apply to 'relevant machinery'. Relevant machinery (subject to defined exclusions) means all machinery within the meaning of reg 4, which itself provides a very broad definition of 'machinery'. Regulation 11 provides that no person shall supply relevant machinery unless the requirements of reg 12 are complied with. Regulation 12 provides that relevant machinery must satisfy 'the relevant essential health and safety requirements'. These can be found in Sch 3 to the machinery regulations. This lays down a number of requirements, including a requirement that machinery must be designed and constructed to avoid all risk of fire or overheating posed by the machinery. The opening words of Sch 3, however, qualify the effect of reg 12 and in particular state that where, having regard to the state of the art, it is not possible to meet the objectives set by the requirements, the relevant machinery must so far as possible be designed and constructed with the purpose of approaching those objectives.

[16] Regulation 12 also requires that the relevant machinery is in fact 'safe'. The word 'safe' is defined (in reg 2) to mean that there is no risk of its causing death or injury to persons 'or, where appropriate, to domestic animals or damage to property'. The words quoted come from the machinery directive and the machinery regulations have rightly been drafted on the basis that the meaning of those words should be resolved by judicial interpretation rather than by definition in the regulations.

(1) General enabling words

[17] In para 13, above, we stated our conclusion that general enabling words in the preamble to a statutory instrument may be interpreted as referring to an enabling power, not expressly invoked, in situations such as the following: (i) where, in order for the SI to have effect, the maker of the instrument must necessarily have invoked that power; or (ii) where the operative provisions of the SI make it clear that its maker must have invoked that power; or (iii) where it is necessary to adopt that interpretation in order to make the SI conform to community law or if that interpretation would make the SI compatible with the rights conferred by the convention. However, the general enabling words will not be interpreted as including an enabling power simply because the maker of the SI could have used that power. In this part of the judgment we set out our reasons for our conclusion.

[18] The appellants' case is that these words must have content and operative effect and that the court must interpret them on the premise that they are intended to have some effect. We agree that when interpreting a statute the court has to work on the basis that, unless otherwise stated, Parliament intended to change the law in some way. However this does not extend to the preamble of a statutory instrument which is clearly not intended to change the law but merely to recite the authority to make the instrument and any step (such as consultation) which the maker of the instrument must undertake before making the instrument. Moreover, if the appellants are right, the result would be that when a question arose as to the effect of a statutory instrument the court would have to conduct an inquiry across the statute book to see whether there was some unexpressed enabling power that could have been invoked by the person making the statutory instrument.

[19] In our judgment, this could lead the court to make an impermissible journey across the dividing line between the interpretation of legislation, which is the constitutional role of the courts, and the making of legislation, which is the role of Parliament. This could occur in a case such as the present where the conclusion that the general enabling words include a reference to an enabling power will automatically trigger certain other consequences under other legislation, such as the imposition of criminal liability and civil liability for a contravention of duties imposed by the statutory instrument. The presence of the general enabling words does not without more evince an intention on the part of Parliament that this should be the effect of the statutory instrument. In addition the imposition of criminal liability in this non-transparent way would be likely to violate the rights conferred by art 7 of the convention. But it is not necessary for us to go into that last point as the appellants do not rely on any criminal provision in this case.

[20] There are, however, situations in which the court might rely on the general enabling words. One such situation is where it is necessary to do so to invoke an enabling power which has not been specified and which is essential to the validity of the SI. This was the position in Buck v A-G [1965] 1 All ER 882, [1965] Ch 745, which concerned an order in council. There is no material difference for this purpose between an order in council made under a statutory power and a statutory instrument made under such a power. In the Buck case the order was invalid if made solely under the enabling power under which it was expressed to have been made. There were, however, general enabling words in the order in council similar to those in the present case. Wilberforce J held that as a result of those general enabling words the order was in fact made under a power conferred by the British Settlements Act 1887 even though that order did not expressly refer to that power. As a result the order was valid. On appeal, this court accepted the reasoning of Wilberforce J and upheld his order.

[21] Buck v A-G was a case where an order would have failed altogether if the general enabling words had not been present. But the same point could arise where an instrument would otherwise be invalid in part. There is a further possibility, that is where the SI is expressed to be made under a particular enabling power and is valid on that basis, but the operative provisions of the statutory instrument make it clear that the maker of the instrument must have intended also to use another enabling power which has not been specified but which would result in some further consequence. If in such a case it is clear that the omission of the specific reference to that further power must have been an oversight, it is likely that the court would hold that such power was within the general enabling words.

[22] It follows that, until the contrary is shown, the court must proceed on the basis that the preamble to an SI sets out all the statutory enabling powers that are necessary for its validity. (We restrict our observations to statutory enabling powers as we accept that it may be necessary to use general enabling words where the royal prerogative is being invoked but this is not the usual situation). We would not wish to encourage the use of general enabling words in lieu of specific references to specific statutory enabling powers. Reliance on general enabling words is inconsistent with the objective of clear and accessible legislative drafting, and it may mislead Parliament into believing that it is enacting an instrument with different effect from that which it actually has. In addition, reliance on general enabling words may lead to great uncertainty as to the effect of the statutory instrument. There would also logically be doubt as to the applicability of the presumption in s 11 of the Interpretation Act 1978 (namely that expressions in an SI have the meaning they bear in the primary legislation under which the SI is made).

[23] We accept, however, Lord Neill QC's submission that the test of whether an enabling power is within the general enabling words is to be assessed objectively from the terms of the instrument and other matters relevant to the interpretation of the instrument. The test is not what power did the maker of the instrument intend to exercise. We should also make it clear that we accept also that an SI can and often will be made pursuant to several enabling powers.

[24] We thus conclude that an enabling power which has not been specifically mentioned should not be treated as included in general enabling words in an SI merely because the SI could have been made under that power. On the other hand the court can rely on general enabling words where the SI would otherwise fail or it is clear from the operative provisions of the statutory instrument that the maker of the SI must have intended to use an unspecified enabling power. The courts may also interpret the general enabling words as referring to a specific enabling power (not expressed) where that interpretation is required under the Marleasing principle (see Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentacion SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I-4135, referred to at [32], below) or where that interpretation is necessary to make the SI compatible with convention rights under s 3 of the 1998 Act.

[25] The proposition which we have formulated here (and at 13, above) should not be treated as exclusive. The purpose of stating that proposition is to explain why we have rejected the appellants' submission. That proposition is also subject to the qualification that, although general enabling words should normally be interpreted as including an unexpressed enabling power in the situations that we have envisaged in the preceding paragraph, in a particular case the court may not be able to adopt that interpretation because (and these are the opposite of situations considered in the preceding paragraph), our domestic law would not then conform with community law, or because, under s 3 of the 1998 Act, the general enabling words must be given some other interpretation to make the SI compatible with convention rights under s 3 of the 1998 Act.

[26] It follows from our conclusion on this part of these appeals that we would not agree with the simple statement taken from Craies on Legislation (8th edn, 2004) pp 112–113 that 'the preamble has no legal effect'. These words must be read with the remainder of the sentence in which they appear, which contemplates that the validity of an SI may depend on general enabling words. In our judgment the general enabling words may have effect, as explained at [17], above. In addition, as explained below, the narrative accompanying the identification of any specified enabling power may provide an indication as to the aims of the SI, and the preamble may thus have effect in the sense of being a legitimate aid to interpretation. There may also be other occasions when, and purposes for which, the preamble has legal effect.

(2) Effect of the general enabling words in the machinery regulations

[27] At 13, above we stated our conclusion that the general enabling words in the preamble to the machinery regulations did not invoke the general enabling power contained in s 15(1) of the 1974 Act. In this part of our judgment we set out our reasons for that conclusion.

[28] We turn now to apply the conclusion reached at [24], above, about the interpretation of general enabling words. The appellants do not say that the machinery regulations have no effect unless the general enabling words are interpreted as including a reference to s 15(1) of the 1974 Act. Further they do not contend that there is anything in the express terms of the machinery regulations which leads to the conclusion that they must have been made under s 15(1) of the 1974 Act. Nor is there any question of the enabling power in s 15(1) of the 1974 Act having to be invoked in order that the machinery regulations may be interpreted in a manner which is compatible with convention rights.

[29] Thus, to succeed on this appeal, the appellants must persuade the court that unless the enabling power is interpreted as referring to s 15(1) the United Kingdom will have failed properly to implement the machinery directive in domestic law. This means that they must show that the machinery directive required member states to provide express statutory remedies for purchasers of defective machinery in order properly to implement the machinery directive. The appellants have also submitted on the hearing of this appeal that the machinery directive gave purchasers of defective machinery a directly effective right as a matter of community law to sue the suppliers of defective machinery. This submission does not add anything to the case just summarised because, if the purchaser has a directly effective right to a remedy against the supplier, it is not necessary for the appellants to rely on the machinery regulations at all.

[30] As with other directives, the United Kingdom was obliged under arts 5 and 189 (now arts 10 and 24) of the EC Treaty to take all appropriate measures to implement the machinery directive, although it was free to choose the form and methods of implementation. Thus the United Kingdom was free to introduce the requirements of the directive into domestic law by SI. Section 2(2) authorises any designated minister (which term includes the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, on whose behalf the machinery regulations were made) to make regulations for the purpose of implementing any community obligation of the United Kingdom and thus conferred power to implement the machinery directive in domestic law by what became the machinery regulations. So if the machinery directive required purchasers to be given an express right of action against suppliers of defective machinery this could have been done by exercising the powers under s 2(2) of the 1972 Act. But that would have meant setting out the right in some detail.

[31] The appellants say that this could equally well be done, and was done, by invoking s 15(1) of the 1974 Act, by making the regulations which are referred to in that subsection as 'health and safety regulations'. The statutory right of action conferred by s 47(2) of the 1974 Act was then automatically triggered. We have set out ss 15(1) and 47(2) of the 1974 Act in the appendix to this judgment for ease of reference. We shall have to consider the 1974 Act in more detail below. At this stage we will proceed on the basis that this latter step in the argument (viz the availability of s 15(1) of the 1974 Act) is correct.

[32] It is common ground that under the Marleasing principle, or principle of conforming interpretation, the domestic court of a member state must interpret its national law so far as possible in the light of the wording and purpose of the directive in question (see Revenue and Customs Comrs v IDT Card Services Ireland Ltd [2006] EWCA Civ 29, [2006] All ER (D) 220 (Jan), cited by Lord Neill). There is no reason why this principle cannot be applied to the interpretation of general enabling words.

[33] This part of the appellants' argument is itself put in two ways: first, the machinery directive requires a remedy to be given to persons to whom machinery is supplied, and secondly, appropriate measures to implement the directive were taken only if purchasers of defective machinery were given an express statutory right of action against suppliers. By 'defective', we mean machinery which fails to comply with the detailed requirements of the machinery directive.

[34] Under the first way the appellants put their case, it is necessary to examine the machinery directive. The long title is unhelpful: it merely states that the directive is 'on the approximation of the laws of the Member States relating to machinery'. The directive states that it is adopted under art 100a of the Treaty of Rome. This provides for the Council of Ministers, acting on a proposal from the European Commission, to adopt measures to promote the internal market, and for the Commission to make proposals concerning health, safety, environmental protection and consumer protection. The directive begins with some 22 recitals which emphasise that the directive is about the design and construction of machinery and that one of its purposes is to improve safety levels and reduce the risk of accidents. Article 3 requires machinery to comply with the essential health and safety requirements set out in annex 1. So far as material this annex is in the same terms as Sch 3 to the machinery regulations, which is described at [15], above.

[35] There are only two references to property in the machinery directive. The first appears in the first recital which states that member states—

'are responsible for ensuring the health and safety on their territory of their people and, where appropriate, of domestic animals and goods and, in particular, of workers notably in relation to the risks arising out of the use of machinery . . .'

The fact that domestic animals and goods are mentioned in the context of health and welfare suggests that the references to domestic animals and property were added at a late stage in the negotiation of the directive. The second reference to property is in art 2 of the machinery directive, which requires member states to take steps to ensure that machinery is put on to the market or into service 'only if it does not endanger the health or safety of persons and, where appropriate, domestic animals or property'. The English text therefore refers once to 'goods' and once to 'property'. In the French version of the machinery directive, the same expression is used in both places, namely 'biens'. This is a very general word which could mean all property or, dependent on the context, some property only. We accept that the goods or property referred to in the machinery directive are goods or property that might otherwise be or is damaged by the defective machinery. However, in our judgment, it is impossible to deduce from those two references that one of the objectives of the machinery directive is to protect purchasers of machinery from the financial consequences to them of defective machinery. In both places, property is relevant only where it is 'appropriate': that immediately suggests that property of the kind within the purview of the directive is only a certain kind of property (in the first reference it has indeed been described only as 'goods'). It is difficult to see why the words 'if appropriate' should be included if all purchasers were entitled to claim for loss caused by damage to their property and that it was merely a question of fact whether such damage occurred. Moreover, in the first recital, goods are mentioned in between persons in general and workers: that suggests that the type of property in contemplation is connected with the persons protected. That, we accept, need not be the case in relation to 'domestic animals'. A milking machine may injure both the cows and the milkman but the cows may well not belong to him. However, the very reference to domestic animals which are themselves a form of property confirms the view that only limited forms of property are included.

[36] Furthermore, there is no reference in the machinery directive to financial losses. A machine that is defective may cause no damage to property at all, but it may cause substantial financial loss in the form of claims from injured employees and loss of profits due to business interruption or the need to acquire new machinery. If the directive intended that the interests of purchasers should also be protected, it would in our judgment have mentioned not simply damage to property but other forms of loss as well. The point was made in argument that the imposition of liability for defective machinery on suppliers in favour of purchasers of machinery might indirectly promote the protection of employees since it might also make suppliers more careful. The machinery directive might have taken that approach but in our judgment it did not do so.

[37] The more likely interpretation, as it seems to us, is that the directive covers the personal property of the persons injured, whether they are workers or others, such as people walking past, or visiting, a factory when for example a fire occurs due to the defective machinery. It would thus be an objective of the machinery directive to provide protection from damage to such property, but damage to other property is outside the directive. Lord Neill pointed out that annex 1 imposed an obligation on employers to minimise any explosion which may occur so that 'it does not endanger the surroundings'. However the reference here to 'surroundings' is not inconsistent with the objective of protecting workers and others since they may be present 'in the surroundings' when the explosion occurs.

[38] Accordingly we do not consider that it is an objective of the directive to provide remedies for purchasers of machinery against suppliers of defective machinery, and therefore there is no need for the general enabling words in the machinery regulations to be interpreted as referring to s 15(1) of the 1974 Act for that purpose. In any event, domestic law already provides for a number of remedies for purchasers of defective machinery against suppliers of defective machinery. If the machinery directive required remedies to be provided by domestic law in respect of damage to property suffered by purchasers of defective machinery, there would have been a question as to whether the existing remedies were sufficient to meet the United Kingdom's obligations to implement the machinery directive. There is no provision in the machinery directive which stipulates the basis on which any such liability should be imposed. We can see that if there had been such a provision it may very well have been necessary for Parliament to create new statutory remedies so as to be sure there was no failure to implement the directive fully.

[39] It is also clear that the imposition of civil liability is not the only way in which the standards imposed by the machinery directive could be enforced. Such standards are capable of being enforced through inspection of premises, industry guidance, prohibition notices, improvement notices and criminal sanctions. A member state has in general a choice as to the manner in which it implements a directive. Some of these sanctions are adopted in the machinery regulations. Since we have concluded that it was not an objective of the machinery directive to provide protection to the purchasers of defective machinery, the question whether this package of alternative measures would have sufficiently met any such objective does not arise. Our provisional view is that it would not do so.

[40] In putting the case the second way, the appellants relied on a series of cases, such as EC Commission v Germany Case C-131/88 [1991] ECR I-825, which Lord Neill called 'the German environmental cases'. They are considered by Lord Hope of Craighead in his speech in Three Rivers DC v Bank of England [2000] 3 All ER 1, [2003] 2 AC 1. As Lord Hope said ([2000] 3 All ER 1 at 24–25, [2003] 2 AC 1 at 210), the German environmental cases demonstrate that the question whether provisions in a directive create rights and obligations for individuals depends in each case on the subject matter of the directive, on the context and on the nature and purpose of the provisions which are in issue. Thus our answer to the submission based on these cases is the same as to the last submission, namely that there is nothing in the machinery directive which creates any rights in favour of purchasers of defective machinery or which requires the member state to give remedies to purchasers of machinery for property damage as part of its implementation of the machinery directive. Therefore it cannot be said that the general enabling words have to be read as including a reference to s 15(1) of the 1974 Act.

[41] For these reasons also, we conclude that the general enabling words in the machinery regulations do not invoke the enabling power in s 15(1) of the 1974 Act. That conclusion is reinforced by examination of another SI (the Provision and Use of Work Equipment Regulations 1992, SI 1992/2932, referred to at [43], below, as PUWER) giving employees the right to sue their employer for breaches of the machinery regulations under s 47(2) of the 1974 Act, and by a number of textual indications in the machinery regulations that they were not made in exercise of that power.

[42] As to the rights conferred on employees, the history of the matter is that on 12 June 1989, shortly before it adopted the machinery directive, the Council of Ministers adopted a directive (Council Directive (EEC) 89/391 (OJ 1989 L183 p 1) (the framework directive)) on the introduction of measures to encourage improvements in the safety and health of workers. This directive was made under art 118a of the EC Treaty. Under this article the Council is required to adopt by means of directives minimum requirements for encouraging improvements to the level of protection for the safety and health of workers. The framework directive sets out general principles on health and safety and anticipates the introduction of further community measures (see art 1(3)). The framework directive was implemented in domestic law by the Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1992, SI 1992/2051, made on behalf of the Secretary of State for Employment in pursuance of (among other enabling powers) s 15(1) of the 1974 Act.

[43] According to Redgrave's Health and Safety (4th edn, 2002) p 318, the framework directive has led to the adoption of six 'daughter' directives on health and safety. Those have been implemented by the United Kingdom by various sets of regulations made in 1992 on behalf of the Secretary of State for Employment utilising expressly her enabling power under s 15(1) of the 1974 Act among other specified enabling powers. These regulations include the Provision and Use of Work Equipment Regulations 1992 (known as 'PUWER').

[44] Significantly, reg 10 of PUWER provided that employers must ensure that work equipment (which is defined to include machinery) complies with (among other enactments) the machinery regulations. PUWER was made on 17 November 1992. Regulation 10 therefore imposed a duty on the employer. Because of the operation of ss 15(1) and 47(2) of the 1974 Act, this means that PUWER imposed liability for machinery which does not comply with the machinery directive on to the employer. It shows that the question whether breach of the machinery regulations should give rise to an express statutory remedy was considered by the government and the conclusion was that the liability should be imposed on the employer. The purchaser will normally be the employer and he is given no express right to seek indemnity from the supplier of the machinery or to make a claim against him for his own losses. This legislative scheme is thus inconsistent with a legislative policy of the kind asserted by the appellants, namely a policy which protects the purchaser against loss incurred through the supply of defective machinery.

[45] There are also a number of textual indications in the machinery regulations that they were not made under s 15(1) of the 1974 Act. First, the preamble to the machinery regulations states that the Secretary of State is the minister designated for the purposes of s 2(2) of the 1972 Act 'in relation to measures relating to the design and construction of, and to the placing on the market and putting into service of, machinery'. That wording does not indicate any intention to create remedies for the supply of defective machinery. Secondly, under s 50(3) of the 1974 Act, a minister must consult the Health and Safety Commission before making health and safety regulations. There is no clear evidence that that statutory consultation took place in relation to the machinery regulations, but the textual point is that the preamble to the machinery regulations does not refer to such consultation whereas the preamble to PUWER recites that consultation took place in accordance with s 50(3) (by implication on the content of PUWER). This is normal practice where statutory consultation is a condition to the exercise of an enabling power (see the Cabinet Office 'Statutory Instrument Practice' (3rd edn, June 2003) pp 18–19 (para 2.4.6)). The appellants do not submit that any lack of consultation would render the machinery regulations ultra vires the 1974 Act to the extent that they were health and safety regulations; they assert that the court can infer that the statutory consultation took place. We do not need to go into the evidence supporting this submission because the significant point for present purposes is the machinery regulations proceed on the basis that no such consultation needed to be mentioned.

[46] Thirdly, Sch 6 of the machinery regulations applies (in part) rather than disapplies s 33 of the 1974 Act (offences) to the machinery regulations and does so with the exclusion of that part of s 33 which criminalises a breach of health and safety regulations. Regulation 29 in turn creates a new offence for contravention of reg 11, which would not have been necessary if the regulations were health and safety regulations and s 33 of the 1974 Act applied. The machinery regulations thus on their face proceed on the basis that they are not health and safety regulations for the purposes of the 1974 Act. Fourthly, s 33 of the 1974 Act has been carefully amended by Sch 6 of the machinery regulations in its application to those regulations so that the penalties are reduced from those applying to breaches of health and safety regulations under the 1974 Act and made consistent with the more limited penalties that can be imposed by regulations made under s 2(2) of the 1972 Act.

[47] An employer whose employees are injured by defective machinery and who thereby comes under a liability to his own employees or who suffers other loss as a result of the supply of machinery which does not comply with the machinery regulations has already rights under the common law against the supplier of the machinery, particularly where negligence occurred. Moreover he is able to take additional rights against the supplier by contract. In these circumstances the view may have been taken that there was no need to extend an employer's rights so as to enable him to seek redress for breaches of the machinery directive in an action for breach of statutory duty. For whatever reason, such rights were not in our judgment so extended through the mechanism relied on by the appellants, namely making the machinery regulations health and safety regulations for the purposes of s 15(1) of the 1974 Act.

(3) Health and safety regulations and property damage

[48] In 13, above we stated our conclusion that health and safety regulations made under s 15(1) of the 1974 Act cannot form the basis of a claim by the purchaser of machinery in respect of property damage or consequent loss of profit. This issue does not need to be determined in the light of our earlier conclusions, but as it was fully argued we wish to explain our reasons for reaching this conclusion.

[49] It is potentially a very important question whether health and safety regulations can be made pursuant to s 15(1) of the 1974 Act so as to confer a right of action on the employer for property damage. We would record that we have not had the benefit of any submissions from the Health and Safety Commission or the Health and Safety Executive on it. We are not here concerned with incidental property damage suffered by a person who suffers personal injury as a result of a breach of the 1974 Act or health and safety regulations made under it. Such damage is likely to be within the scope of the duty which it is common ground is owed to him under health and safety regulations.

[50] The appellants' argument is in substance as follows. Section 47(6) of the 1974 Act defines damage in terms that is wide enough to include damage to property. The power to make regulations is very wide and the duties imposed by the 1974 Act extend to such matters as the control of emissions which could cause damage to property of the employer. Moreover regulations have been made under s 15(1) which provide for the protection of property from damage. In this connection, the appellants refer by way of example to the Placing on the Market and Supervision of Transfers of Explosives Regulations 1993, SI 1993/2714. For the reasons given below, in our judgment health and safety regulations cannot be made for the purpose of protecting an employer against damage to property or financial loss which he incurs as a result of a matter which is the subject of health and safety regulations.

[51] There is little or nothing in the 1974 Act to point to the conclusion that the Act is intended to protect the employer from damage to his property. The long title supports the view that the provisions of Pt 1 of the 1974 Act are to promote the health, safety and welfare of people at work. There is no reference in the long title to the recovery of compensation for property damage. There is a reference to the control of dangerous substances and of emissions into the atmosphere. Such substances and emissions could cause damage to the employer's property as well as personal injury to workers, but in the context of the 1974 Act in our judgment the provisions dealing with those matters are for the purposes of promoting health and safety of workers.

[52] Within the body of the 1974 Act, s 1 contains a statement of the purposes of the Act, which are then defined as 'general purposes', and s 2 sets out the general duties of employers. We have set these sections out also in the appendix below. In our judgment, these purposes are all for the promotion of the health, safety and welfare of employees, and they do not extend to the protection of the property or economic interests of the employer. We make the same point about the references to the control of dangerous substances and emissions in s 1 as we have made about these references in the long title. Likewise, although s 1(3) of the 1974 Act seemingly extends relevant risks for the purposes of s 1(1)(b) to those attributable to the manner in which an undertaking is conducted and plant, the risks still have to fall within s 1(1)(b), ie be risks to health and safety.

[53] Sections 3–7 of the 1974 Act also set out general duties of the employer and others. Breach of these duties does not result in civil liability in damages (s 15(1)). Again, these sections in our judgment concern only the health, safety and welfare of employees and others. There is no reference to property damage of the employer. Duties are also imposed on those who control premises but again nothing is said about damage to that property. Reference is made to the control of substances and emissions, but the observations already made in relation to these matters apply here too. Sections 8 and 9 prohibit persons from misusing equipment provided in compliance with health and safety requirements, and an employer from charging an employee for (for example) the provision of any such equipment. Sections 10–14 deal with the establishment and functions of the Health and Safety Commission and the Health and Safety Executive. Then by s 15(1) the Secretary of State has to make health and safety regulations 'for any of the general purposes of this Part'. If he does so and there is a breach, these regulations are actionable to the extent provided in s 47(2) of the 1974 Act. As we have explained the general purposes of the 1974 Act are those set out in s 1 and they do not include protection of the employer's property interests.

[54] Although 'damage' as defined in s 47(6) of the Act is not limited to personal injury or death, health and safety regulations can only be made for the general purposes of the 1974 Act, which are those contained in s 1 of that Act. Section 15(2) enables regulations to be made under s 15(1) for any of the purposes in Sch 3 (set out in part in the appendix hereto). But the regulations must still be for the general purposes of the Act (see s 15(2)). As we have concluded that such purposes do not include the protection of the employer's property, health and safety regulations made under s 15(1) cannot in our judgment form the basis of a claim by an employer for damages for loss which he has suffered because of damage to his property or financial loss, even though that damage or loss was caused by breach of a health or safety regulation. Moreover, the contrary conclusion would radically change the scope of liability in s 47. It is unlikely that Parliament would have done that without specific mention.

[55] The 1993 regulations (see [50], above) provide that explosives must be designed, manufactured and supplied so as 'to prevent damage to property and the environment' (see para 1 of Sch 1). But, as the respondents point out, these regulations were made both under s 15(1) of the 1974 Act and s 2(2) of the 1972 Act. Therefore if the community instrument designed to be implemented by these regulations required there to be a remedy for damage to property (not incidental to damage to the person) there was power to make the regulations under the 1972 Act. At all events, those regulations can have no effect on the interpretation of the 1974 Act.

[56] For all these reasons, we accept the respondents' submission that health and safety regulations cannot be made for the purpose of protecting an employer against damage to property or financial loss which he incurs as a result of a matter which is the subject of health and safety regulations. They therefore cannot form the basis of a claim for the recovery of such loss or damage.

MISCELLANEOUS POINTS

[57] The respondents have submitted that the allocation of ministerial responsibilities for the 1974 Act as between ministers supports their interpretation of the machinery regulations as not being health and safety regulations. In the light of our conclusions above, it is not necessary to express a view on this argument.

[58] Reference has been made to a number of other regulations under the 1974 Act, including the Biocidal Products Regulations 2001, SI 2001/880. These regulations support the respondents' case as they proceed on the basis that references to danger or danger to health and safety, in the 1974 Act in its application to those regulations have to be expressly extended if they are to cover danger to the environment (see para 2(3) of Sch 11). In our judgment these regulations cannot materially assist the argument on either side as the court cannot interpret the 1974 Act by reference to these regulations.

[59] The appellants also relied on the decision of the House of Lords in R (on the application of Junttan Oy) v Bristol Magistrates' Court [2003] UKHL 55, [2004] 2 All ER 555. In this case, the improper use of machinery had resulted in the death of an employee. The House of Lords held that the employer could be prosecuted either under the 1974 Act or under the machinery regulations. We reject the appellants' submission that this means that the machinery regulations constitute health and safety regulations under the 1974 Act. There is no reason why criminal sanctions cannot be imposed by two parallel but separate statutory regimes. The appellants cannot point to any passage in the speeches of the majority of the House as supporting the submission which we have rejected.

[60] An issue was raised as to whether if the machinery regulations were indeed health and safety regulations the Secretary of State had complied with his obligation under s 50 of the 1974 Act to consult the Health and Safety Commission. For this purpose it would have to be shown that the purpose for which they were being consulted was the making of health and safety regulations and not for some other purpose. While it seems clear that the Department of Trade and Industry consulted the Health and Safety Executive before making the machinery regulations, it is not clear whether the Commission was also consulted or if it was consulted whether the consultation was the statutory consultation to which s 50 applies. In the light of our above conclusions, it is not necessary to decide this point.

DISPOSITION

[61] For the reasons given above, we dismiss these appeals. The judge was right to strike out the appellants' claims based on breach of statutory duty.

Appeals dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

APPENDIX

RELEVANT PROVISIONS OF THE HEALTH AND SAFETY AT WORK ETC ACT 1974 (SHOWING AMENDMENTS TO DATE)

'1. Preliminary.—(1) The provisions of this Part shall have effect with a view to—(a) securing the health, safety and welfare of persons at work; (b) protecting persons other than persons at work against risks to health or safety arising out of or in connection with the activities of persons at work; (c) controlling the keeping and use of explosive or highly flammable or otherwise dangerous substances, and generally preventing the unlawful acquisition, possession and use of such substances . . .

(2) The provisions of this Part relating to the making of health and safety regulations . . . and the preparation and approval of codes of practice shall in particular have effect with a view to enabling the enactments specified in the third column of Schedule 1 and the regulations, orders and other instruments in force under those enactments to be progressively replaced by a system of regulations and approved codes of practice operating in combination with the other provisions of this Part and designed to maintain or improve the standards of health, safety and welfare established by or under those enactments.

(3) For the purposes of this Part risks arising out of or in connection with the activities of persons at work shall be treated as including risks attributable to the manner of conducting an undertaking, the plant or substances used for the purpose of an undertaking and the condition of premises so used or any part of them.

(4) References in this Part to the general purposes of this Part are references to the purposes mentioned in subsection (1) above.

2. General duties of employers to their employees.—(1) It shall be the duty of every employer to ensure, so far as is reasonably practicable, the health, safety and welfare at work of all his employees.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of an employer's duty under the preceding subsection, the matters to which that duty extends include in particular—(a) the provision and maintenance of plant and systems of work that are, so far as is reasonably practicable, safe and without risks to health; (b) arrangements for ensuring, so far as is reasonably practicable, safety and absence of risks to health in connection with the use, handling, storage and transport of articles and substances; (c) the provision of such information, instruction, training and supervision as is necessary to ensure, so far as is reasonably practicable, the health and safety at work of his employees; (d) so far as is reasonably practicable as regards any place of work under the employer's control, the maintenance of it in a condition that is safe and without risks to health and the provision and maintenance of means of access to and egress from it that are safe and without such risks; (e) the provision and maintenance of a working environment for his employees that is, so far as is reasonably practicable, safe, without risks to health, and adequate as regards facilities and arrangements for their welfare at work . . .

15. Health and safety regulations.—(1) Subject to the provisions of section 50, the Secretary of State . . . shall have power to make regulations under this section for any of the general purposes of this Part (and regulations so made are in this Part referred to as "health and safety regulations").

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the preceding subsection, health and safety regulations may for any of the general purposes of this Part make provision for any of the purposes mentioned in Schedule 3 . . .

47. Civil liability.—(1) Nothing in this Part shall be construed—(a) as conferring a right of action in any civil proceedings in respect of any failure to comply with any duty imposed by sections 2 to 7 or any contravention of section 8; or (b) as affecting the extent (if any) to which breach of a duty imposed by any of the existing statutory provisions is actionable; or (c) as affecting the operation of section 12 of the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 (right to compensation by virtue of certain provisions of that Act).

(2) Breach of a duty imposed by health and safety regulations . . . shall, so far as it causes damage, be actionable except is so far as the regulations provide otherwise . . .

(6) In this section "damage" includes the death of, or injury to, any person (including any disease and any impairment of a person's physical or mental condition) . . .

SCHEDULE 3

Subject-Matter Of Health And Safety Regulations

1.—(1) Regulating or prohibiting—(a) the manufacture, supply or use of any plant; (b) the manufacture, supply, keeping or use of any substance; (c) the carrying on of any process or the carrying out of any operation.

(2) Imposing requirements with respect to the design, construction, guarding, siting, installation, commissioning, examination, repair, maintenance, alteration, adjustment, dismantling, testing or inspection of any plant . . .'

C plc v P (Secretary of State for the Home Office and another intervening)

[2006] EWHC 1226 (Ch)

CHANCERY DIVISION

EVANS-LOMBE J

24 MARCH, 11, 12 APRIL, 26 MAY 2006

Practice – Pre-trial or post judgment relief – Search order – Privilege against self-incrimination – Material constituting freestanding evidence which had not been created by respondent to search order under compulsion – Whether privileged at common law – Whether court having power to modify application of common law privilege – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1.

A search order was made in an action in which C plc made claims against P for breach of confidence and copyright infringement. P indicated that he intended to rely on his privilege against self-incrimination in respect of any material which the search disclosed and, subject to that indication, permitted the search to take place. In the course of the search a number of computers and their associated electronic equipment were disclosed which the order required P to permit to be 'imaged' by W, the independent computer specialist appointed by the order. As P had invoked his privilege against self-incrimination the computers were placed in the custody of the supervising solicitor who passed them to W for the purpose of imaging the contents. W uncovered images of children. It was an offence to be found in possession of such material. W applied to the court for directions as to what he should do with the material. The court considered, inter alia, whether the common law privilege against self-incrimination extended to material which constituted freestanding evidence not brought into existence under compulsion by the person claiming privilege and which could have come to public notice otherwise than as the result of the exercise of some statutory power to require disclosure enforceable by a court. It then considered the effect of the rights guaranteed by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

Held – The circumstances of the instant case were such that the court could modify the application of the common law privilege against self-incrimination so as to exclude from its ambit material constituting freestanding evidence which had not been created by the respondent to the search order under compulsion. The right of the public under the convention to be protected from the effect of criminal activity, when balanced against P's right to the common law privilege against self-incrimination, which would otherwise operate to prevent the court from directing that the offending material be passed to the police, required the court to modify the respondent's right so as to enable the material to be so transferred. The instant case fell within the partial exception to the rule that, in the effective implementation of the convention, it was by adherence to the rules of precedent that the domestic courts should set the domestic standard. The exceptional circumstances included the fundamental alteration of the legislative circumstances by the enactment of the 1998 Act. Accordingly, W would be directed to pass the relevant materials to the police authority (see [54], [56], [80]–[82], [84], below).

Dicta of Lord Bingham of Cornhill in Lambeth London BC v Kay, Leeds City Council v Price [2006] 4 All ER 128 at [45] applied.

A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) [2001] 1 WLR 1879 considered.

Rank Film Distributors Ltd v Video Information Centre (a firm) [1981] 2 All ER 76, AT & T Istel Ltd v Tully [1992] 3 All ER 523 and Den Norske Bank ASA v Antonatos [1998] 3 All ER 74 not followed.

Notes

For privilege against self-incrimination, see 11(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1160, and for incrimination of witnesses, see 17(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 959.

Cases referred to in judgment

A v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 137, ECt HR.

A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) [2001] EWCA Crim 888, [2001] 1 WLR 1879.

Arrows Ltd (No 4), Re, Hamilton v Naviede [1994] 3 All ER 814, [1995] 2 AC 75, [1994] 3 WLR 656, HL.

Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528, [1985] ECHR 8225/78, ECt HR.

Brown v Stott (Procurator Fiscal, Dunfermline) [2001] 2 All ER 97, [2003] 1 AC 681, [2001] 2 WLR 817, PC.

D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust, K v Dewsbury Healthcare NHS Trust, K v Oldham NHS Trust [2005] UKHL 23, [2005] 2 All ER 443, [2005] 2 AC 373, [2005] 2 WLR 993; affg [2003] EWCA Civ 1151, [2003] 4 All ER 796, [2004] QB 558, [2004] 2 WLR 58.

Den Norske Bank ASA v Antonatos [1998] 3 All ER 74, [1999] QB 271, [1998] 3 WLR 711, CA.

Downie v Coe (1997) Times, 28 November, CA.

EC (a minor) (care proceedings: disclosure), Re [1996] 3 FCR 521, sub nom Re C (a minor) (care proceedings: disclosure) [1997] Fam 76, [1997] 2 WLR 322, CA.

Ferreira v Levin NO, Vryenhoek v Powell NO 1996 (1) SA 984, [1996] 3 LRC 527, SA Const Ct.

Istel (AT & T) Ltd v Tully [1992] 3 All ER 523, [1993] AC 45, [1992] 3 WLR 344, HL; rvsg [1992] 2 All ER 28, [1992] QB 315, [1992] 2 WLR 112, CA.

L v UK [2000] 2 FLR 322, ECt HR.

Lambeth London BC v Kay, Leeds City Council v Price [2006] UKHL 10, [2006] 4 All ER 128, [2006] 2 WLR 570.

O Ltd v Z [2005] EWHC 238 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 387 (Apr).

Orkem v EC Commission Case 374/87 [1991] 4 CMLR 502, [1989] ECR 3283, ECJ.

Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293, ECt HR.

R v Boyes (1861) 1 B & S 311, 121 ER 730.

R v Hertfordshire CC, ex p Green Environmental Industries Ltd [2000] 1 All ER 773, [2000] 2 AC 412, [2000] 2 WLR 373, HL.

R v Hundal, R v Dhaliwal [2004] EWCA Crim 389, [2004] 2 Cr App R 307.

R v Kearns [2002] EWCA Crim 748, [2002] 1 WLR 2815.

Rank Film Distributors Ltd v Video Information Centre (a firm) [1981] 2 All ER 76, [1982] AC 380, [1981] 2 WLR 668, HL.

Rio Tinto Zinc Corp v Westinghouse Electric Corp, RTZ Services Ltd v Westinghouse Electric Corp [1977] 3 All ER 717, [1978] AC 547, [1978] 2 WLR 81, CA; affd [1978] 1 All ER 434, [1978] AC 547, [1978] 2 WLR 81, HL.

Saunders v UK [1998] 1 BCLC 362, ECt HR.
Sporrong v Sweden (1983) 5 EHRR 35, [1982] ECHR 7151/75, ECt HR.
Thomson Newspapers Ltd v Director of Investigation and Research (1990) 54 CCC (3d) 417, Can SC.
Triplex Safety Glass Co Ltd v Lancegaye Safety Glass (1934) Ltd [1939] 2 All ER 613, [1939] 2 KB 395, CA.
Warman International Ltd v Envirotech Australia Pty Ltd (1986) 67 ALR 253, Aus FC.
X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633, [1995] 3 WLR 152, HL.
X v Netherlands (1986) 8 EHRR 235, ECt HR.
Z v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 384, ECt HR.

Application

C plc brought an action against P for breach of confidence and copyright infringement. C plc obtained a search order of premises in the occupation of P. The order provided that P had to enable the contents of certain computer memory storage devices to be imaged by an independent computer specialist, W. P notified the parties and the supervising solicitor appointed by the order that he would rely on his privilege against self-incrimination in respect of any material which the search disclosed. The computers and associated equipment were placed in the custody of the supervising solicitor who passed them to W. W discovered images which it was an offence to be found in possession of. W applied to the court for directions. An advocate to the court was appointed and the Attorney General and the Secretary of State for the Home Department appeared as interveners. C plc played no part in the proceedings but assisted through its representatives in the preparation of the statement of facts. W, who also assisted, played no active part in the proceedings but retained the material. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Anthony Peto and Robert Weekes (instructed by Mischon de Reya) for the applicants.
David Casement (instructed by Pannone LLP, Manchester) for P.
Nicholas Caddick (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) as advocate to the court.
Richard Milne (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State.
David Perry (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Attorney General.

Cur adv vult

26 May 2006. The following judgment was delivered.

EVANS-LOMBE J.

[1] The issue with which this judgment is concerned arises from an application in an action in which C plc makes claims against P for breach of confidence and copyright infringement. As will be seen, however, the resolution of that issue has no significant bearing on the resolution of that action but none the less must be determined and raises important points of principle and procedure. As a result of co-operation between the parties it has been possible to produce a statement of relevant facts, substantially agreed. To the extent that the parties have not been able to agree what actually occurred, which disagreements are identified in the text of the statement, I was satisfied that they did not affect the issues which I have to resolve and accordingly it was not necessary for me to embark on any fact-finding process.

[2] The relevant background facts may be briefly summarised in this way. On 10 October 2005 Peter Smith J made a search order in these proceedings, on the application of the claimants, of premises in the occupation of P. Later in this judgment I will set out the material provisions of the order which he made. Before the order was executed P obtained the advice of a solicitor who attended at the premises. That solicitor advised the parties and the supervising solicitor appointed pursuant to the order, that P would rely on his privilege against self-incrimination (PSI) in respect of any material which the search disclosed. Subject to that indication, however, P permitted the search to take place. In the course of the search a number of computers and their associated electronic equipment were disclosed which the order required P to permit to be 'imaged' so that information recorded on those computers which belonged to C plc could be identified. By reason of P's invoking the protection of his PSI in respect of material produced by the search, the computers were placed in the custody of the supervising solicitor who passed them to W, appointed by the order as independent computer expert, for the purpose of imaging their contents. In the course of doing so W uncovered highly objectionable images of children (the offending material) recorded on one of them. It is an offence to be found in possession of such material. W is a retired police officer who, in the course of his police service, was a computer expert who, from time to time, was concerned in prosecutions for such offences. Offences of this type are graded in seriousness by reference to numerals 1–5, 5 being the most serious. It was W's view that the offending material should be classified for seriousness as grade 4.

[3] The matter first came before me as applications judge on 2 February 2006 on the application of W, seeking directions from the court as to what he should do with the offending material which has been left in his possession. As a result of that hearing I made an order that W should retain it pending further order. I directed that P should be notified that I was considering whether I should direct that the offending material be passed to the police indicating, that if he objected to that course, I would give him an opportunity to make submissions to me as to why I should not do so. In due course P's solicitors gave notice that he wished to take advantage of that opportunity. Because of the important issues raised I sought the assistance of an advocate to the court through the good offices of the Attorney General. Mr Caddick was appointed for that purpose instructed by the Treasury Solicitor. The matter returned before me on 24 March at a hearing attended by solicitors and counsel for P and by Mr Caddick at which I gave directions for a full hearing. Those directions included an approach to the Home Office with a view to the full hearing being attended by a representative of the prosecuting authorities. In due course Mr Milne, instructed by the Treasury Solicitor, was appointed to appear for the Secretary of State at that hearing which took place on 11 and 12 April when Mr Casement appeared for P instructed by his solicitors. Prior to the hearings, C plc indicated that it wished to play no part in these proceedings, in the result of which it had no interest, but it has assisted, through its representatives, in the preparation of the statement of facts. W, who also assisted in the preparation of that statement, has played no active part in the proceedings but retains the offending material as a result of my order.

[4] It is important to emphasise at the outset that P does not accept that he was responsible for the presence of the offending material on one of the computers produced as a result of the search and asserts that he was at all material times unaware of its presence. He asserts that he has a good defence to any charges brought against him as a result.

[5] I return to the order of Peter Smith J of 10 October 2005 which set in train the events with which this application is concerned. That order, having made provision for the search and appointed the supervising solicitor and the independent computer specialist represented by W, under the heading 'restrictions on search', provided as follows:

> '9. The defendant is entitled to seek legal advice and to ask the court to vary or discharge this order. Whilst doing so he may ask the Supervising Solicitor to delay starting the search for up to two hours or such other longer period as the Supervising Solicitor may permit. However the defendant [P] must . . . (b) Not disturb or remove any listed items; and (c) Permit the Supervising Solicitor to enter but not start to search.
>
> 10. Before permitting entry to the premises by any person other than the Supervising Solicitor the defendant may, for a short time (not to exceed two hours unless the Supervising Solicitor agrees to a longer period) gather together any documents he believes may be privileged and hand them to the Supervising Solicitor for him to assess whether they are privileged as claimed. If the Supervising Solicitor decides that any of the documents may be privileged or is in any doubt as to their status he will exclude them from the search and retain them in his possession pending further order of the court.
>
> 11. If the defendant wishes to take legal advice and gather documents as permitted, he must first inform the Supervising Solicitor and keep him informed of the steps being taken.'

[6] Then under the heading 'Delivery up of articles/documents' the order continues:

> '15. The defendant must immediately (a) Hand over to the claimant's solicitors the claimant's computer, mobile phone and printer which are presently located at [left blank] together with any necessary passwords and (b) Hand over to the claimant's solicitors any of the listed items which are in his possession power custody or under his control, and (c) Enable the contents of any computers, mobile telephones, memory cards, USB drives, printers, PDAs or any other memory storage devices or any hard disc integral to any such device at any of the premises (other than those devices already referred to at (a) which are to be handed over to the claimant's solicitors aforesaid) to be imaged by the Independent Computer Specialist and must provide all such assistance (including the provision of passwords) as may be necessary to enable such imaging to be performed . . .'

[7] At schedule (e) the order specified undertakings to be given by the supervising solicitor to the court as follows:

> '(1) [undertakings with relation to service on the defendant] . . .
>
> (2) The Supervising Solicitor will offer to explain to the person served with the order its meaning and effect fairly and in everyday language and to inform him of his right to take legal advice (such advice to include an explanation that the defendant may be entitled to avail himself of legal professional privilege and to apply to vary or discharge this order as mentioned in paragraph 23 above.) The Supervising Solicitor will retain in the safekeeping of his firm all items retained by him as a result of this order until the court directs otherwise.

(4) [An undertaking to report to the parties and the court].'

[8] Schedule (f) of the order provides for undertakings to the court by the independent computer specialist as follows:

'(1) [an undertaking not to damage the defendant's computers in the course of imaging]

(2) The independent computer specialist will not publish or disclose the images made to any one other than the claimant without permission of the defendant or the court.

(3) The independent computer specialist will not disclose any materials obtained as a result of the search to any employees of the claimant other than Mr F save with the permission of (a) the Supervising Solicitor, or (b) the defendant, or (c) the Court.'

[9] The order contained the usual penal notice indicating the consequences of failure to comply with it and a notification that it was made without notice to the defendant who had a right to apply to the court to vary or discharge the order.

[10] On 23 February 2005 Lindsay J gave judgment in the case of O Ltd v Z [2005] EWHC 238 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 387 (Apr). The facts of that case mirror almost precisely the facts of the present case save in the following important respects: (i) Before the search commenced P's solicitors informed the supervising solicitor and the claimant's solicitor that P was relying on his PSI without reference to any particular document or electronic material which might be disclosed as a result of the search at the same time giving them a copy of the judgment in O Ltd v Z. He also informed them of P's intention to apply to the court for the determination of the extent to which he was entitled to exert his PSI and, in consequence, to vary the search order. Such an application was made on 12 October and was supported by a witness statement of P containing a statement of truth dated 14 October. None the less as in O Ltd v Z P permitted the search to proceed. (ii) The computers, on one of which the offending material was recorded with their associated electronic equipment, were delivered to the supervising solicitor for his retention, pending determination of P's right to PSI. (iii) The matter returned to the court on 20 October before Mann J when he made the following directions:

'3. The parties shall deal with the CDs DVDs and other electronic storage materials ("the Electronic Materials") retained pursuant to the order of the 10th October 2005 and listed in exhibit NCH1 to the report of Neil Clifford Howes "the Supervising Solicitor" in the manner set out in schedule 2 below or in such other manner as may be agreed between the parties.

4. Information contained in the Electronic Materials shall not be disclosed by the persons inspecting the same except as provided for in schedule 2 to any persons other than the court, the defendant and his professional legal advisors and the claimants professional legal advisors without the permission of the other party or of the court.

5. Nothing in the foregoing shall be considered to be an admission by the claimant that anything in the Electronic Materials is privileged or not relevant to this case or by the defendant that it is not privileged or relevant to this case, and the parties have permission to apply for further directions in relation to the manner in which the Electronic Materials may be dealt with without the need to show a change of circumstances.'

Schedule 2 to Mann J's order provided:

> '10. The Electronic Materials shall be retained in the custody of W save as set out below
>
> 11. W shall make a copy of each of the Electronic Materials which he shall retain pending further order of the court or agreement of the parties.'

There then follow provisions for meetings and agreements as to how the contents of the computers should be displayed and divided up with the intention of removing and passing to the claimant those contents to which he was entitled. (iv) In consequence of the order of Mann J the computers etc were passed to W for him to image them so that their contents could be analysed. (v) W imaged the computers in the course of which process the offending material emerged but that material and the computer recording it never thereafter left his possession and no copies of its contents and, in particular, of the offending material, have ever left his possession or been disclosed by him to any of the parties or any third party.

[11] In arriving at my conclusions in this case I have the benefit of the judgment of Lindsay J in O Ltd v Z in which, on substantially similar facts to the present case and where the issue was the same, he set out a comprehensive review of the relevant statutory provisions and the authorities. This relieves me of the task of attempting to do the same. Between [25] and [53] inclusive of that judgment Lindsay J sets out the relevant criminal legislation, the statutory provisions as to search orders and the authorities giving guidance on their use, arts 6 and 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) and relevant authorities, and the cases which define the PSI in English common law and how that privilege is to be applied. I gratefully adopt these passages in Lindsay J's judgment. So that this judgment is comprehensible I repeat the following matters which Lindsay J sets out in much greater detail: (i) The jurisdiction to make a search order is provided by s 7 of the Civil Procedure Act 1997. Subsections (1) and (7) of that section are set out later in this judgment. Search orders are enforceable by proceedings for contempt. (ii) It has been, at all material times, an offence to possess images such as those comprising the offending material in this case. (iii) PSI is a common law right but is a right which, by contrast with legal professional privilege is not absolute in the sense that it is open to the legislature, by statute, to derogate from it. See Brown v Stott (Procurator Fiscal, Dunfermline) [2001] 2 All ER 97, [2003] 1 AC 681. Statute may do so expressly or by implication. Whether any individual statute has that effect is a matter of statutory construction for the court before which the issue arises. See per Lord Hoffmann in R v Hertfordshire CC, ex p Green Environmental Industries Ltd [2000] 1 All ER 773, [2000] 2 AC 412. (iv) Where not so excluded the privilege confers an absolute protection on the party claiming it which a judge has no discretion to overrule. See per Lord Wilberforce in Rank Film Distributors Ltd v Video Information Centre (a firm) [1981] 2 All ER 76 at 80, 81, [1982] AC 380 at 441, where he says:

> 'However, it is only too clear (and I deliberately use the language of reluctance) that supply of the information and production of the documents sought would tend to expose the respondents to a charge of conspiracy to defraud ... A charge of conspiracy to defraud, so far from being as it sometimes is, a contrived addition to other charges, is here an appropriate and exact description of what was being done . . . Unless some escape can be devised from this conclusion, the privilege must inevitably attach.' a

Lord Wilberforce continues ([1981] 2 All ER 76 at 81, [1982] AC 380 at 442):

'Counsel was at pains to make clear that he was not, in these submissions, attempting to negate or undermine the privilege against self-incrimination. This has been too long established in our law as a basic liberty of the subject (in other countries it has constitutional status) to be denied. It has received modern recognition in the Civil Evidence Act 1968, s 14, and in this House.' b

Then Lord Wilberforce stated ([1981] 2 All ER 76 at 82, [1982] AC 380 at 443) that the protection of PSI extended to material which might 'set in train a process which may lead to incrimination or may lead to the discovery of real evidence of an incriminating character'. (v) A judge in civil proceedings must give effect to the privilege in appropriate circumstances notwithstanding that in subsequent criminal proceedings the relevant material might be excluded, eg under s 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. (vi) As the passage which I have quoted from Lord Wilberforce's judgment in the Rank Film Distributors case makes plain and from other authorities, the English common law right to PSI (domestic PSI) has hitherto been held to extend, beyond a right to refuse to answer questions tending to incriminate to which an answer would otherwise be compellable, but also to incriminating material of whatever nature, but of which documents and electronic records are good examples, the production of which would otherwise be compellable. Because no claim to PSI was made by the respondent to the search order in O Ltd v Z [2005] All ER (D) 387 (Apr) before the search started, in the course of which the offending material in that case was passed to the independent computer expert for imaging, Lindsay J was able to find that the suspect had lost his PSI and so he could direct the offending material to be handed over to the police. (See [53].) In that case a claim to PSI was made by the respondent but only after the offending material had been discovered by the computer expert and after the adjourned return date of the application for the search order (see [21], [22]).

[12] At [64] of his judgment Lindsay J having reviewed various authorities concludes:

'The better view of the authorities, taken as a whole and, again, as can be harsh on some facts, is that whether he knows of the privilege and whether or not it is mentioned or explained to him, he will be taken to have lost the privilege if he is not heard to claim it before (as the case might be) he answers the questions or produces the documents in issue.

[65] But that, in this case, raises the question: produces the documents to whom? The order here, as I have already mentioned (at 8, above), contemplated it being open to Z to gather together documents he believed to be privileged and for him to hand them to the supervising solicitor for him to assess whether they were privileged or not. If the supervising solicitor was in doubt, he was to exclude them from the search and retain them in his possession pending further order of the court. I have already referred also (at [11], above) to undertakings given by the expert. An argument can surely be raised that supply of documents to a supervising solicitor or to a person in the position of the expert should not represent a loss of privilege . . .'

[13] The judge, however, proceeded, on the authority, primarily, of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Den Norske Bank ASA v Antonatos [1998] 3 All ER 74, [1999] QB 271, to conclude ([2005] All ER (D) 387 (Apr) at [67]):

> '. . . I thus take myself to be bound to hold that delivery to the supervising solicitor of the offensive material without any prior claim to the privilege would have caused Z to lose the privilege against self-incrimination.
>
> [68] If, therefore, supply of a document to a supervising solicitor can represent a loss of the privilege, at any rate if it is not then expressly claimed then, if anything, supply to the expert was even more likely to cause a loss of the privilege as the expert was not described in the order as a repository for documents in respect of which privilege might be claimable and, for all that the expert gave undertakings, the expert's basic position was that of an expert whose services were to be paid for by the claimants and who, rightly, feared that either possessing the offensive material or handing it back to Z could involve the commission of a crime. The expert, even more than the supervising solicitor, who was at least contemplated by the order as a proper retainer of documents, was a person who was likely to wish to pass the material on to some other.
>
> [69] Let it be supposed, though, that I am not bound by the Den Norske Bank ASA v Antonatos view and that I was thus free to adopt the earlier reasoning of Wilcox J in Warman International Ltd v Envirotech Australia Pty Ltd (1986) 67 ALR 253 at 266 where he said, of a prospective production of documents under a subpoena:
>
> > "Production is to the court. Unless and until the content of the documents is made known to a person who is reasonably likely to use those documents for the purpose of a criminal prosecution, no self-incrimination can occur."'

Lindsay J points to the fact that in Warman International Ltd v Envirotech Australia Pty Ltd, as in the present case, a claim to PSI had been made before the subpoena was worked through.

[14] Then resuming later Lindsay J says this (at [69]):

> '. . . Indeed [counsel for the Home Office] does not need to go as far as to say and does not say that the privilege was necessarily lost on the supply of the offensive material to the expert; it was lost on the supply to the expert without any prior or simultaneous claim to the privilege being asserted.
>
> [70] . . . The privilege, I hold, was lost by way of an objective look at Z's behaviour; he handed the offensive material to the third party without claiming the privilege.'

I gratefully adopt Lindsay J's approach to the question of loss of PSI illustrated by the passages which I have quoted from his judgment in O Ltd v Z. In the present case, of course, a claim to PSI was made before the search even started.

[15] It was submitted to me that P had a choice whether to allow the search to proceed after his solicitor had notified those present that he was relying on PSI. Similarly he had a choice whether to comply with the directions order of Mann J. By permitting the search to proceed and by agreeing to an order the consequence of which was to hand over the relevant computer to W for imaging it is submitted that P lost his PSI protection. I cannot accept this submission. So long as the offending material remained in the possession of the court through its officers bound by their undertakings to the court to keep it confidential, the protection of PSI was not lost. a [16] The directions order of Mann J was made with the evident intention of providing a means whereby the contents of the various computer discs, produced as a result of the search, could be imaged and analysed in the possession of the computer expert without the suspect losing the benefit of PSI which he had claimed. It must be possible to preserve PSI in respect of part of the material b produced on a search which appears to have been what was sought to be achieved by this order.

[17] It seems to me that there is everything to be said for a system for the enforcement of search orders, in which the supervising solicitor and computer expert (if any) appointed by the court act as a neutral repository for documents in which the respondent to the order can place material in respect of which he c claims privilege without losing, in the case of PSI, the benefit of such privilege.

[18] I come to this conclusion in the absence of any authority directly on the point and notwithstanding, as was held in Den Norske Bank ASA v Antonatos by the Court of Appeal, that putting material in respect of which PSI was claimed in the hands of the supervising solicitor or computer expert would be no d protection against a demand to deliver up the material to the prosecuting authorities on warrant should they become aware of its existence. I do not read the passages cited in Lindsay J's judgment in O Ltd v Z [2005] All ER (D) 387 (Apr) at [67] from the judgments in Den Norske Bank ASA v Antonatos as a finding that delivery of potentially incriminating material to a supervising solicitor under a e search order, without more, is sufficient to result in the loss of PSI. In agreement with the submissions of Mr Casement for P, I take the view that delivery up of potentially privileged material in those circumstances amounts to a delivery up to the court under compulsion of the search order, through officers or agents of the court, who have undertaken to preserve the confidentiality of that material. It seems to me that to find otherwise would mean that the court's order which f invited P to gather together material, which he claimed to be privileged from production, and to hand it to the supervising solicitor for the purpose of adjudicating whether that was so, has operated as a trap by falling into which P has lost the benefit of his claim to PSI.

[19] It was submitted by Mr Caddick, as advocate to the court, that a suspect g might lose his privilege by disclosure to the judge of the incriminating material even though that judge was in the process of deciding whether the suspect was entitled to PSI in respect of it. He did this on the authority of a passage in the judgment of Lord Bingham of Cornhill in Downie v Coe (1997) Times, 28 November in turn citing a passage in the judgment of Lord Denning MR in h Rio Tinto Zinc Corp v Westinghouse Electric Corp, RTZ Services Ltd v Westinghouse Electric Corp [1977] 3 All ER 717 at 721, [1978] AC 547 at 574. I cannot accept this submission and do not think that the quotations have such effect.

[20] As appears from the judgment of Lindsay J in O Ltd v Z [2005] All ER (D) 387 (Apr) at [59], and authority there cited, a court is not bound without more, by a claim to PSI by a party to litigation (see inter alia Triplex Safety Glass Co Ltd v j Lancegaye Safety Glass (1934) Ltd [1939] 2 All ER 613 at 617, [1939] 2 KB 395 at 403). He must claim it by sworn evidence, see Downie v Coe itself, and that evidence must demonstrate a risk that the party's PSI will be infringed by his being compelled to answer a particular question or produce material relevant to the particular litigation in progress. It seems to me that it will be almost inevitable that the judge, in the course of deciding whether the claim to PSI is made out, will acquire a good idea of the nature of the material sought to be disclosed and of the offence in respect of which that material may constitute evidence. It seems to me impracticable, and fundamentally unjust, that it should be possible to contend that, because the court's inquiry had proceeded beyond a certain point, the party whose claim to PSI was being inquired into should have lost its benefit. It must be borne in mind that a judge, conducting such an inquiry will usually do so sitting in camera and would be subject to the same duty to keep any information acquired confidential in the same way as any other of the court's officers. In my view Lord Bingham and Lord Denning in Downie v Coe and the Rio Tinto case, must have been speaking of the risk that the judge's investigation of the possibility of an offence might indirectly bring that possibility to the attention of the prosecuting authorities.

[21] In the present case it is accepted that 'an objective look' at P's behaviour shows that the offensive material has never passed out of the hands of either the supervising solicitor or the computer expert to any 'person who is reasonably likely to use those documents for the purpose of a criminal prosecution', within the words quoted from Wilcox J's judgment in Warman International Ltd v Envirotech Australia Pty Ltd (1986) 67 ALR 253 at 266, which, in my view, would include a person 'who was likely to wish to pass the material on to some other' (see O Ltd v Z [2005] All ER (D) 387 (Apr) at [68]).

[22] Mr Caddick also submitted to me that it was arguable that P had not effectively claimed PSI because the claim was made generally and not directed at particular material and because it was not supported by sworn evidence. I do not accept either of these submissions. I can see no reason why a claim to PSI should not be made in respect of all the material produced as a result of the execution of a search order and I can see considerable dangers in requiring a party claiming PSI to be specific as to where, amongst the material produced as a result of the order, the incriminating material is to be found. See per Lord Bingham in Downie v Coe (1997) Times, 28 November where he says:

> '... it is quite plain that the claimant does not have to give chapter and verse to show why disclosure or the answering of the question or interrogatory might incriminate him ... to require him to do that might expose him to the very peril which the privilege exists to protect him.'

In agreement with the submissions of Mr Casement it seems to me that the requirement is that the suspect give evidence upon oath, that he believes himself to be at risk of incrimination, when the matter is brought before a judge to determine whether that is in fact the case. In the present case P applied on the day of the search to vary the search order and gave a witness statement in support of that application, accompanied by a statement of truth two days later.

[23] For these reasons and subject to the point with which I will shortly deal, I would hold that P effectively claimed PSI in respect of the material to be produced as a result of the execution of the search order, before the search started, and an objective consideration of the events occurring after the execution of that order does not result in the conclusion that he lost the benefit of it.

THE INDEPENDENT EVIDENCE ARGUMENT (THE IEA)

[24] The point to which I now turn is directed, not to the existence of a right to PSI and its enforcement, but rather to what materials that right extends. In particular, whereas it is accepted that PSI applies to the oral statements of a suspect made under compulsion and to written material brought into existence by him, under compulsion, which tends to incriminate him, does it extend to material which constitutes freestanding evidence not brought into existence by him under compulsion and which could have come to public notice otherwise than as the result of the exercise of some statutory power to require disclosure enforceable by a court? The offending material in the present case is a good example of material of the latter type. It is the Attorney General's submission that the IEA is available to me notwithstanding the earlier authorities such as Rank Film Distributors Ltd v Video Information Centre (a firm) [1981] 2 All ER 76, [1982] AC 380 because, after the coming into force of the 1998 Act on 2 October 2000, it is open to a court to 'modify' the ambit of the application of domestic PSI so that it does not apply to such material.

[25] To describe how this point emerged it is necessary to return to the history of the proceedings themselves. In his skeleton argument submitted for the purposes of the hearing on 11 and 12 April Mr Milne, for the Secretary of State, brought to my attention certain recent decisions, of the Court of Appeal in criminal cases, in which the issue was whether certain statutory powers to require a party to answer questions or produce documents, which subsequently came to be used in the prosecution of that party for an offence, constituted a breach of his right to a fair trial under art 6 of the convention. In the course of the hearing on 11 and 12 April I put to counsel, that since under art 6 jurisprudence it appeared that PSI did not apply to self-standing evidence not created by the respondent under compulsion, it could be successfully contended that PSI did not apply to such evidence where it was considering the application of domestic PSI where the point arose in the course of the disclosure of documents in a civil action where no charge had been brought against the respondent and, in consequence, art 6 was not engaged. Because counsel were not ready fully to deal with this point, at the close of submissions I stood over judgment to give them an opportunity to make written submissions on the point after further research of the authorities. During that intermission, having been alerted by the Treasury Solicitor, the Attorney General intervened in place of the Secretary of State and submitted, through Mr David Perry, his own written submissions in support of the conclusion the possibility of which I had suggested. Mr Perry subsequently extended those submissions at my instigation.

[26] The Attorney General's submissions were circulated by him to the other parties for their comments in particular those of Mr Casement for P. At the hearing on 11 and 12 April Mr Casement appeared for P on legal aid. Most unfortunately, shortly after the hearing, P lost his legal aid certificate and has indicated that, although he no longer qualifies for legal aid, he is unable to afford legal representation. Notwithstanding this Mr Casement, in the best traditions of the Bar, has supplemented the very helpful submissions he made at the hearing with further written submissions, pro-bono, commenting on those of the Attorney General. I am very grateful to him. It is to be hoped that, if this matter goes further, it may be possible, by some means, to make financial provision so that P can be legally represented at any appeal.

[27] The application of domestic PSI to disclosure of documents and other material evidence in civil proceedings has been much criticised in decisions of the courts up to and including the House of Lords see, inter alia, the passage from the judgment of Lord Wilberforce in the Rank Film Distributors case which I have quoted above. Those criticisms are well summarised by Mr Adrian Zuckerman in his textbook on Civil Procedure (2003) pp 580–581 starting at para 17.8 as follows:

'Although the law concerning intellectual property claims has been changed, as we shall presently see, the fact remains that the privilege against self-incrimination applies to documents and that it therefore tends to impede access to documents where the infringement of rights is of the most serious kind. Since the application of the privilege to civil litigation makes it difficult for victims of fraud and other crimes to obtain vindication, it is not surprising to find that the courts have expressed reservations about its operation in civil proceedings.

17.9 There are several reasons for suggesting that the application of the privilege to the disclosure procedure is anachronistic and should be revised. First, production and disclosure are testimonial obligations only in a technical sense, because the evidential significance of pre-existing documents does not turn on what the person producing or disclosing them now says but on what they say for themselves. Indeed, where documents incriminating a defendant can, for example, be obtained without the defendant's assistance, they are perfectly admissible. Second, the privilege's rationale has no application to disclosure proceedings. Lord Templeman placed the contemporary justification for the privilege against self-incrimination in [AT & T Istel Ltd v Tully [1992] 3 All ER 523, [1993] AC 45] on the basis that "it discourages ill-treatment of a suspect and second that it discourages the production of dubious confessions". He observed that these considerations are of no relevance to civil proceedings. In the same case Lord Griffiths said:

> "I can for myself see no argument in favour of the privilege against producing a document the contents of which may go to show that the holder has committed a criminal offence. The contents of the document will speak for itself and there is no risk of the false confession which underlies the privilege against having to answer, questions that may incriminate the speaker." . . .

17.11 The application of the privilege to civil search orders is even more difficult to justify because it verges on the absurd. Suppose that the defendant has been running a fraudulent business using fraudulent invoices and accounts. The documents would be immune from disclosure and from seizure under a civil search order because they may assist the defendant's conviction for fraud. Yet, in criminal proceedings, a criminal search order can be obtained to seize evidence of fraudulent practice. Against a criminal search order the defendant has no privilege against self-incrimination because the execution of a criminal search order authorises the police to enter, search and seize without the suspect's consent and, therefore, imposes no testimonial obligation on the suspect. It would therefore appear that while the defendant is immune from a civil search order, lest incriminating documents would be found which could later be used in criminal proceedings, he has no immunity in criminal proceedings from the forcible seizure of the same documents which, once in the hands of the police, would be admissible in evidence at the defendant's criminal trial.'

[28] Then at para 17.12 having pointed out that 'Human rights jurisprudence offers little support for the application of the privilege to disclosure obligations', Mr Zuckerman continues (p 582):

'. . . It seems that the ECtHR does not view the disclosure and production of documents as coming under the privilege against self-incrimination. This was recognised by the Court of Appeal in [A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) [2001] EWCA Crim 888, [2001] 1 WLR 1879], where it was held that a legitimate objection may be made to evidence that a defendant has been forced to create by the use of compulsory powers. But if the evidence was already in existence and the only effect of the use of the compulsory powers was to bring such evidence to the attention of the court, then its production is consistent with the right to fair trial, because the existence and quality of such evidence are independent of any order to produce it that is made against the will of the accused person. Therefore the production of such pre-existing and "independent" evidence could not render a trial unfair and so breach art 6.

17.13 The courts have periodically urged Parliament to limit the effect of the privilege against self-incrimination in civil litigation. Judges have suggested legislation removing the excuse of self-incrimination from disclosure in civil proceedings, while at the same time rendering inadmissible in criminal proceedings self-incriminating information produced in civil disclosure. Unfortunately, there has been no legislative response to these recommendations. It would not be difficult, however, for the courts themselves to step into the breach. It should be explicitly held that since production of documents no longer involves any real testimonial obligation, the privilege does not apply to pre-existing documents. Essentially, this is already the position following A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000), mentioned above, which has been reaffirmed in [R v Kearns [2002] EWCA Crim 748, [2002] 1 WLR 2815].'

[29] In A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) [2001] 1 WLR 1879 the issue referred to the Court of Appeal was:

'Does the use by the Crown in the prosecution of a bankrupt for an offence under Chapter VI of Part IX of the Insolvency Act 1986 ("the 1986 Act") of documents which (a) were delivered up to the Official Receiver ("OR") under compulsion (pursuant to the duty imposed on the bankrupt by section 291 of the 1986 Act, which is backed by the contempt sanction in section 291(6) of the 1986 Act) and (b) do not contain statements made by the bankrupt under compulsion violate the bankrupt's rights under article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights . . . ?' (See [1].)

[30] In that case a bankrupt had been charged with an offence under s 362(1)(a) of the Insolvency Act 1986 with materially contributing to his insolvency by gambling. Evidence of his gambling was to be found in cheque stubs, bank statements, returned cheques and a betting file containing loose gambling statements by way of computer print-outs produced by Ladbrokes and a bookmaker's schedule of gambling transactions. The bankrupt had not contributed himself to any of these documents. He was required to produce these documents to the official receiver under the provisions of s 291 of the 1986 Act which carried with it the sanction of proceedings for contempt of court punishable with up to two years' imprisonment under sub-s (6) of that section. He handed them over. The bankrupt successfully applied to the trial charge for a ruling that the documents were inadmissible because their admission would give rise to a violation of art 6. The judge further ruled that their admission would not be fair and excluded them under s 78 of the 1984 Act. In consequence the judge directed a verdict of not guilty to be entered. The Court of Appeal disapproved the order of the judge and returned a negative answer to the question which had been posed.

[31] The leading judgment of the Court of Appeal was given by Rose LJ. At [34] he cites two paragraphs (paras 68, 69) from the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in Saunders v UK [1998] 1 BCLC 362. That case was concerned with the admissibility of evidence obtained from Mr Saunders under compulsory powers contained in the Companies Act 1985 relating to Department of Trade and Industry inquiries. The passages cited read as follows (at 378–379):

> '68. The court recalls that, although not specifically mentioned in art 6 of the convention, the right to silence and the right not to incriminate oneself, are generally recognised international standards which lie at the heart of the notion of a fair procedure under art 6. Their rationale lies, inter alia, in the protection of the accused against improper compulsion by the authorities thereby contributing to the avoidance of miscarriages of justice and to the fulfilment of the aims of art 6 . . . The right not to incriminate oneself, in particular, presupposes that the prosecution in a criminal case seek to prove their case against the accused without resort to evidence obtained through methods of coercion or oppression in defiance of the will of the accused. In this sense the right is closely linked to the presumption of innocence contained in art 6(2) of the convention.
>
> 69. The right not to incriminate oneself is primarily concerned, however, with respecting the will of an accused person to remain silent. As commonly understood in the legal systems of the contracting parties to the convention and elsewhere, it does not extend to the use in criminal proceedings of material which may be obtained from the accused through the use of compulsory powers but which has an existence independent of the will of the suspect such as, inter alia, documents acquired pursuant to a warrant, breath, blood and urine samples and bodily tissue for the purpose of DNA testing . . .'

[32] Rose LJ cites (at [36]) the following passage from the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in L v UK [2000] 2 FLR 322 at 331:

> 'As held in [Saunders v UK] . . . the right not to incriminate oneself is primarily concerned with respecting the will of the accused person to remain silent and does not extend to the use in criminal proceedings of material which may be obtained from the accused through the use of compulsory powers and which has an existence independent of the will of the accused (eg documents, breath, blood, urine and tissue samples).'

[33] At [37] Rose LJ notes that a case in the Supreme Court of Canada Thomson Newspapers Ltd v Director of Investigation and Research (1990) 54 CCC (3d) 417 was cited in Saunders v UK and he quotes extensively from the judgment of La Forest J (at 508–518) in that case. I set out below a passage from that quotation as follows:

> '". . . there is an important difference between the type of prejudice that will be suffered in the two cases. It is only when the testimony itself has to be relied on that the accused can be said to have been forced to actually create self-incriminatory evidence in his or her own trial. The compelled testimony is evidence that simply would not have existed independently of the exercise of the power to compel it; it is in this sense evidence which could have been obtained only from the accused.

By contrast, evidence derived from compelled testimony is, by definition, evidence that existed independently of the compelled testimony. This follows logically from the fact that it was evidence which was found, identified or understood as a result of the 'clues' provided by the compelled testimony. Although such evidence may have gone undetected or unappreciated in the absence of the compelled clues, going undetected or unappreciated is not the same thing as non-existence. The mere fact that the derivative evidence existed independently of the compelled testimony means that it could have been found by some other means, however low the probability of such discovery may have been." [See 508–509.]

[38] Then he said [at 509]:

"the difference between evidence which the accused has been forced to create (the compelled testimony), and the independently existing evidence he or she has been forced to assist in locating, identifying or explaining (evidence derived from compelled testimony), will be readily discernible. I believe its significance will be equally apparent.

The fact that derivative evidence exists independently of the compelled testimony means, as I have explained, that it could also have been discovered independently of any reliance on the compelled testimony. It also means that its quality as evidence does not depend on its past connection with the compelled testimony. Its relevance to the issues with which the subsequent trial is concerned, as well as the weight it is accorded by the trier of fact, are matters that can be determined independently of any consideration of its connection with the testimony of the accused."

[39] He said [at 510]:

"What prejudice can an accused be said to suffer from being forced to confront evidence 'derived' from his or her compelled testimony, if that accused would have had to confront it even if the power to compel testimony had not been used against him or her? I do not think it can be said that the use of such evidence would be equivalent to forcing the accused to speak against himself or herself; once the derivative evidence is found or identified, its relevance and probative weight speak for themselves. The fact that such evidence was found through the evidence of the accused in no way strengthens the bearing that it, taken by itself, can have upon the questions before the trier of fact."

[40] La Forest J then said [at 518]:

"In my view, derivative evidence that could not have been found or appreciated except as a result of the compelled testimony under the Act should in the exercise of the trial judge's discretion be excluded since its admission would violate the principles of fundamental justice. As will be evident from what I have stated earlier, I do not think such exclusion should take place if the evidence would otherwise have been found and its relevance understood. There is nothing unfair in admitting relevant evidence of this kind . . .'"

The conclusion of the court in A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) [2001] 1 WLR 1879 is:

> '[57] In our judgment, the answer to the question posed by the Attorney General is "No". We say that for a number of reasons. First, there is no doubt, and indeed it is not disputed before this court, that the privilege against self-incrimination is not absolute and in English law Parliament has, for a variety of reasons, in a whole range of different statutory contexts, made inroads upon that privilege.
>
> [58] So far as the English courts are concerned, there is, as it seems to us, no doubt that the documents to which we have referred would be regarded as admissible as a matter of law, subject of course to the trial judge's discretion to exclude under section 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.
>
> [59] The question which next arises is whether, in deference to the Strasbourg jurisprudence, this court should give a different answer to that which the English courts and the will of Parliament otherwise suggest. It seems to us that the distinction made in paragraphs 68 and 69 of the European Court of Human Rights's judgment in [Saunders v UK], between statements made and other material independent of the making of a statement, is not only one to which we should have regard, but is one which, as it seems to us, is jurisprudentially sound. We say this for the reasons advanced in the judgment of La Forest J in [Thomson Newspapers Ltd v Director of Investigation and Research] which, via reference to the South African constitutional court's decision in [Ferreira v Levin 1996 (1) SA 984, [1996] 3 LRC 527], was before the European Court in [Saunders v UK]. In our judgment, there is nothing in any of the speeches in [Brown v Stott (Procurator Fiscal, Dunfermline) [2001] 2 All ER 97, [2003] 1 AC 681] which contradicts this conclusion. The Privy Council were seeking to limit the scope of the privilege against self-incriminating statements and pre-existing documents revealed by compelled statements were outwith their consideration.'

[34] The effect of these quotations from La Forest J's judgment may be summarised thus: whereas a compelled statement is evidence that would not have existed independently of the exercise of the powers of compulsion, evidence which exists independently of the compelled statements could have been found by other means and its quality does not depend on its past connection with the compelled statement. Accordingly evidence of the latter type is in no sense 'testimonial' and PSI ought not to attach to it.

[35] In R v Kearns [2002] 1 WLR 2815 the Court of Appeal was considering a prosecution under s 354(3)(a) of the 1986 Act for failing without reasonable excuse to account for the loss of a sum of money being part of his property. It was argued at his trial that the subsection constituted a contravention of the appellant's right to a fair trial under art 6 because it forced the appellant to give information to the official receiver, and if he failed to do so an offence was automatically committed. The section thus breached the appellant's right amongst others against self-incrimination. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal.

[36] The leading judgment was given by Aikens J. At [48] and following he makes reference to the case of A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000). At [51] and [52] the judge analyses that decision, so far as relevant, in this way:

'. . . The court came to the conclusion that [Saunders v UK [1998] 1 BCLC 362 at 378–379 (paras 68, 69)], recognised a distinction between a statement of a defendant that had been made under compulsion and the production of pre-existing documents or other evidence under compulsory powers.

[52] The court concluded in [A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) [2001] 1 WLR 1879 at [59]] that this distinction was valid, jurisprudentially sound and should be followed. In the court's view legitimate objection might be made to evidence that a defendant had been forced to create by the use of compulsory powers. However if the evidence was already in existence and the only effect of the use of the compulsory powers was to bring such evidence to the attention of the court, then its production could not be so objectionable. That is because the existence and quality of such evidence are independent of any order to produce it that is made against the will of the accused person. Therefore the production of such pre-existing and "independent" evidence could not render a trial unfair and so breach article 6.'

[37] As part of the court's conclusions the judge continues (at 53):

'There is a distinction between the compulsory production of documents or other material which have an existence independent of the will of the suspect or accused person and statements that he has had to make under compulsion. In the former case there is no infringement of the right to silence and the right not to incriminate oneself. In the latter case there could be, depending on the circumstances.'

[38] At [47] of his judgment Aikens J noted a passage from the speech of Lord Hoffmann in R v Hertfordshire CC, ex p Green Environmental Industries Ltd [2000] 1 All ER 773 at 783, [2000] 2 AC 412 at 425–426 where he points out and approves a distinction drawn by the European Court of Justice in the case of Orkem v EC Commission Case 374/87 [1991] 4 CMLR 502, [1989] ECR 3283, between questions backed by compulsion but directed to factual information only, the answers to which were admissible, and questions 'which were an attempt to force' Orkem to admit that it had taken part in price fixing, the answers to which were not.

[39] In R v Hundal, R v Dhaliwal [2004] EWCA Crim 389, [2004] 2 Cr App R 307 the Court of Appeal was considering a prosecution under s 11 of the Terrorism Act 2000 against two individuals who were said to be members of a proscribed organisation. Their car was searched at Dover under compulsory powers contained in para 2 of Sch 7 of the 2000 Act and incriminating material relevant to the charges was found. That material consisted of various documents, including an international Sikh Federation Membership card, a rubber stamp, headed notepaper, a 1996 diary, and a newspaper article relating to the International Sikh Youth Federation. The Court of Appeal dismissing the appeal and following R v Kearns and Saunders v UK [1998] 1 BCLC 362 approved the passage in the judgment of Aikens J in R v Kearns [2002] 1 WLR 2815 at [53] which I have quoted above.

[40] It has to be accepted, as submitted by Mr Casement that none of the cases of A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) [2001] 1 WLR 1879, R v Kearns or R v Hundal were directly concerned with the application of domestic PSI. They were each concerned with the admissibility in criminal proceedings of evidence gathered as a result of the exercise of compulsory powers granted by a statute the relevant provisions of which are to be construed as expressly or by implication derogating from the privilege. They were each concerned with whether the relevant statutory provisions offended art 6 and the concept of PSI, which I will call 'European PSI', acknowledged as forming part of the rights comprised in art 6 but which appears to have a more limited application than domestic PSI. However it seems to me that in each case the court was concerned with the question of whether the statutory compulsory powers to gather evidence were proportionate to the social or economic problem with which the measure in question was intended to deal. In each case the fact that the court, following Saunders v UK, could hold that the privilege did not apply to material comprising self-standing evidence not brought into existence as a result of the exercise of compulsory powers, was an important factor in the decision of the court that the relevant legislation was human rights compliant.

[41] The decision of the Court of Appeal in A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) is much more broadly expressed than in the other two cases which are more narrowly focused on the compatibility of the statute giving compulsory powers to gather evidence, with art 6. At para 17.13 in the passage from his book which I have quoted above (Civil Procedure (2003) p 582) Mr Zuckerman appears to be expressing the view that this decision is authority for the proposition that domestic PSI does not apply to self-standing evidence. With respect I doubt that that can be the case in the light of the earlier decisions of the House of Lords in Rank Film Distributors Ltd v Video Information Centre (a firm) [1981] 2 All ER 76, [1982] AC 380 and in AT & T Istel Ltd v Tully [1992] 3 All ER 523, [1993] AC 45, a case which I will deal with in greater detail hereafter. The Rank Film Distributors case was cited in A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) but it was not mentioned in the judgments. The judgment does not chart a path as to how the authority of those cases, so far as the application of domestic PSI is concerned, can be avoided. The IEA was available to the Court of Appeal who gave judgment on 29 March 2001 but the point does not seem to have been taken.

[42] It was submitted by Mr Casement that it was a distinguishing feature of the ruling that PSI does not apply to self-standing evidence that the authorities in which it appears are confined to criminal cases where the relevant statute either expressly or by implication derogates from PSI. I am unable to accept this submission. I can see no logic in the contention that a civil court, in applying PSI to materials produced in the course of disclosure should give it a wider ambit than the criminal court which would try the case in which that material would be evidence. It is also inconsistent with those authorities in which it has been held that PSI does not apply in cases where the court can be satisfied that disclosure of the relevant material will not in any way worsen the position of the party compelled to disclose it (see AT & T Istel Ltd v Tully).

[43] In the absence of binding authority, and this area of the law is evidently replete with authority up to the highest level, I would adopt the approach of the Court of Appeal in A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) to the application of domestic PSI and so confine its application to testimonial evidence, oral and written, and exclude it from application to self-standing evidence not produced under compulsion. I would do so for the reasons set out in the judgment of Rose LJ in that case in turn based on the reasons given by La Forest J in the Canadian Supreme Court in Thomson Newspapers Ltd v Director of Investigation and Research (1990) 54 CCC (3d) 417.

[44] The question then becomes whether, in the present position of the authorities, I am able myself to direct that the offending material be passed by W to the police as I am urged to by Professor Zuckerman and by the written submissions of the Attorney General. Professor Zuckerman suggests that I am able to do this relying on the authority of A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) and R v Kearns.

I have already expressed my doubts that this is possible. I turn therefore to the Attorney General's submissions which, on this aspect of the case are to be found in the second set of written submissions, submitted by Mr Perry on behalf of the Attorney General. The effect of those submissions is summarised at para 2.2 as follows:

> '(i) Since the decisions of the House of Lords, such as [AT & T Istel Ltd v Tully], there have been three significant developments in English law. First, the enactment of the Human Rights Act 1998 ("the 1998 Act"). Secondly, the decision of the Privy Council in [Brown v Stott (Procurator Fiscal, Dunfermline) [2001] 2 All ER 97, [2003] 1 AC 681]. Thirdly, the decision of the Court of Appeal in [A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000)]. The significance of these three matters is that the content of the privilege against self-incrimination has been subject to detailed scrutiny in the latter two cases, and in accordance with the decision in [Saunders v UK] it has been held that the privilege against self-incrimination in criminal proceedings does not apply to pre-existing documents. Since the privilege is an implied right under the Convention it is necessary to balance the rights and interests of others when considering the precise scope of its application. In this connection it is significant to note that the privilege against self-incrimination as guaranteed by Article 6 of the Convention applies as an implied right in both criminal and civil proceedings.
>
> (ii) The distinction that now exists between civil and criminal proceedings is, as Zuckerman notes, indefensible and absurd.
>
> (iii) The modification for which the Attorney General contends would conform to the requirements of the Convention in that it would properly strike a balance between the rights of the person asserting the privilege on the one hand and the rights and freedoms of others as guaranteed by the Convention, particularly the victims of crime, on the other. It would also reflect the point made by Zuckerman that the privilege as it applies to civil proceedings, properly understood, is a testimonial privilege which protected pre-existing documents because such documents were ordinarily produced pursuant to a subpoena duces tecum (literally, "under penalty, bring with you", viz. to court . . .), the point being that the witness was in jeopardy of a penalty for failing to comply if he failed to appear and bring the specified documents or records. The situation of a witness is quite distinct from that of a person found to be in possession of incriminating material.
>
> (iv) So far as the rights and freedoms of others are concerned, the position under the Convention is that positive obligations may be imposed on the state so as to protect the Convention rights of those who may be affected by criminal conduct.
>
> (v) Thus the modification to the privilege against self-incrimination for which the Attorney General contends would not infringe the rights of a potential defendant in criminal proceedings to a fair trial under Article 6 of the Convention and it would also properly take into account the rights and freedoms of others.'

As noted by Mr Casement in his comments on Mr Perry's first set of submissions, he starts by accepting that as the law stood up to the coming into force of the 1998 Act IEA was contrary to authority and, secondly, that, as illustrated by the passage from the judgment in Saunders v UK which I have set out at [31], above, domestic PSI had a wider ambit than European PSI in the sense that it applied to any evidential material produced by a party to civil litigation under compulsion including self-standing evidence not the product of that party's intention. It is the fundamental submission of the Attorney General that it is now open to the court by its judgment to 'modify' the ambit of domestic PSI so as to make it accord with European PSI. It is open to the court to do this, indeed, as a public authority, it is under a duty to do this, because of a positive obligation on states as parties to the convention to have regard to the wider interest of the public, in particular, to the public's right to be protected by the state from the effects of crime by an efficient criminal justice system. Those public rights fall to be balanced by the court against the right of P to a fair trial under art 6 should the emergence of the offending material into public knowledge, including the knowledge of the police, lead to his prosecution. The result would be that domestic PSI would be limited so as to permit the court to direct that the offending material be handed over to the police and P be left to rely on s 78 of the 1984 Act to protect him from any perceived unfairness at trial.

[45] It seems clear from the authorities cited by Mr Perry that the convention, in appropriate circumstances, operates to impose on the authorities of signatory states a positive obligation to ensure, by appropriate measures, that the public are able to enjoy their convention rights freely and in safety. Thus in Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293 the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) was considering a case where one of two applicants was wounded in a shooting incident which resulted in the death of his father, the husband of the other applicant. They claimed compensation for the state's failure to protect the life of the second applicant and his father and to prevent harassment of their family under art 2 the right to life. The material part of the ECtHR's judgment reads as follows (at 321 (para 115)):

> '. . . the state's obligation in this respect extends beyond its primary duty to secure the right to life by putting in place effective criminal law provisions to deter the commission of offences against the person backed up by law enforcement machinery for the prevention, suppression and sanctioning of breaches of such provisions . . . [Article] 2 of the convention may also imply in certain well-defined circumstances a positive obligation on the authorities to take preventive operational measures to protect an individual whose life is at risk from the criminal acts of another individual . . .
>
> 116. . . . where there is an allegation that the authorities have violated their positive obligation to protect the right to life in the context of their abovementioned duty to prevent and suppress offences against the person, it must be established to [the court's] satisfaction that the authorities knew or ought to have known at the time of the existence of a real and immediate risk to the life of an identified individual or individuals from the criminal acts of a third party and that they failed to take measures within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might have been expected to avoid that risk . . .'

[46] In Z v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 384 the ECtHR was considering a case where, over a number of years parents had ill-treated their four children and kept them in a state of utter degradation. The proceedings were brought under art 3, the right not to be subjected to inhuman and degrading treatment. The report reads as follows (at 402–403 (paras 69–73)):

'I. Alleged violation of art 3 of the convention

69. The applicants alleged that the local authority had failed to protect them from inhuman and degrading treatment contrary to art 3 of the convention which provides: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."

70. The Commission in its report found unanimously that there had been a violation of art 3 of the convention. It considered that there was a positive obligation on the government to protect children from treatment contrary to this provision. The authorities had been aware of the serious ill-treatment and neglect suffered by the four children over a period of years at the hands of their parents and failed, despite the means reasonably available to them, to take any effective steps to bring it to an end.

71. The applicants requested the court to confirm this finding of a violation.

72. The government did not contest the Commission's finding that the treatment suffered by the four applicants reached the level of severity prohibited by art 3 and that the state failed in its positive obligation under art 3 of the convention to provide the applicants with adequate protection against inhuman and degrading treatment.

73. The court re-iterates that art 3 enshrines one of the most fundamental values of democratic society. It prohibits in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The obligation on high contracting parties under art 1 of the convention to secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in the convention, taken together with art 3, requires states to take measures designed to ensure that individuals within their jurisdiction are not subjected to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment, including such ill-treatment administered by private individuals (see [A v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 137 at 141–142 (para 22)]). These measures should provide effective protection, in particular, of children and other vulnerable persons and include reasonable steps to prevent ill-treatment of which the authorities had or ought to have had knowledge . . .'

[47] In X v Netherlands (1986) 8 EHRR 235 the ECtHR was dealing with a case where a parent complained to the police about a sexual assault on his daughter a mentally defective girl of 16. The prosecutor's office decided not to prosecute provided the accused did not repeat the offence. X appealed against the decision and requested the court to direct that proceedings be brought. The appeal was dismissed partly on the ground that although the girl was incapable of making the complaint herself, no one else was entitled to complain on her behalf. Amongst other articles the claim was brought under art 8 the right to private and family life. The ECtHR held that there had been a violation of art 8 because no prosecution could be instituted for a sexual assault upon the mentally handicapped applicant because of a 'procedural obstacle which the Dutch legislature had apparently not foreseen', that obstacle being the Dutch law provision which meant that, although the applicant was unable herself to present her case in court due to her mental handicap no one else was entitled to complain on her behalf. The report reads (at 241):

'27. The Court finds that the protection afforded by the civil law in the case of wrongdoing of the kind inflicted on Miss Y is insufficient. This is a case where fundamental values and essential aspects of private life are at stake. Effective deterrence is indispensable in this area and it can be achieved only by criminal-law provisions; indeed, it is by such provisions that the matter is normally regulated . . .'

[48] In the very recent case in the House of Lords of Lambeth London BC v Kay, Leeds City Council v Price [2006] UKHL 10, [2006] 4 All ER 128, [2006] 2 WLR 570 in respect of which the decision was handed down on 8 March 2006, the respondents to the appeal are recorded in the speech of Lord Bingham (at [32]) as placing reliance on three principles which guide the Strasbourg authorities in their administration of the convention. The first two are not relevant for the purposes of this judgment. The third principle is described by Lord Bingham as follows:

'So too is the third principle, that inherent in the whole of the convention is a search for balance between the rights of the individual and the wider rights of the society to which he belongs, neither enjoying an absolute right to prevail over the other. It is unnecessary to cite authority for propositions so well established and understood.'

[49] An example of this balancing process is to be found in the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Brown v Stott (Procurator Fiscal, Dunfermline) [2001] 2 All ER 97, [2003] 1 AC 681. In that case the Judicial Committee were considering a case where a motor car had been driven by a driver under the influence of alcohol above the legal limit. At the driver's trial for the relevant offence evidence was introduced of an admission by the defendant that he had been driving the vehicle at the relevant time as a result of the exercise of compulsory powers under s 172(2)(a) of the Road Traffic Act 1988. The defendant argued that it was contrary to art 6(1) of the convention for the prosecution to rely on an admission obtained under compulsory powers and in consequence there had been breaches of the devolution legislation with consequences it is not necessary to describe. In his speech Lord Bingham, having noted that art 6 contained no express right to PSI, which is not to be found elsewhere in the convention, is recorded as saying this ([2001] 2 All ER 97 at 115, [2003] 1 AC 681 at 704):

'Thus the right we have to consider in this case is an implied right. While it cannot be doubted that such a right must be implied, there is no treaty provision which expressly governs the effect or extent of what is to be implied.

The jurisprudence of the European Court very clearly establishes that while the overall fairness of a criminal trial cannot be compromised, the constituent rights comprised, whether expressly or implicitly, within art 6 are not themselves absolute. Limited qualification of these rights is acceptable if reasonably directed by national authorities towards a clear and proper public objective and if representing no greater qualification than the situation calls for. The general language of the convention could have led to the formulation of hard-edged and inflexible statements of principle from which no departure could be sanctioned whatever the background or the circumstances. But this approach has been consistently eschewed by the court throughout its history. The case law shows that the court has paid very close attention to the facts of particular cases coming before it, giving effect to factual differences and recognising differences of degree. Ex facto oritur jus. The court has also recognised the need for a fair balance between the general interest of the community and the personal rights of the individual, the search for which balance has been described as inherent in the whole of the convention . . .' a

[50] Lord Steyn is recorded as saying ([2001] 2 All ER 97 at 118–119, [2003] 1 AC 681 at 708):

'The convention requires that where difficult questions arise a balance b must be struck. Subject to a limited number of absolute guarantees, the scheme and structure of the convention reflects this balanced approach. It differs in material respects from other constitutional systems but as a European nation it represents our Bill of Rights. We must be guided by it. And it is a basic premise of the convention system that only an entirely neutral, impartial, and independent judiciary can carry out the primary task c of securing and enforcing convention rights. This contextual scene is not only directly relevant to the issues arising on the present appeal but may be a matrix in which many challenges under the Human Rights Act 1998 should be considered.

III. Article 6 of the convention d

The present case is concerned with art 6 of the convention which guarantees to every individual a fair trial in civil and criminal cases. The centrality of this principle in the convention system has repeatedly been emphasised by the European Court. But even in respect of this basic guarantee, there is a balance to be observed. First, it is well settled that the public interest may be taken into account in deciding what the right to a fair e trial requires in a particular context.'

[51] Lord Hope is recorded as saying ([2001] 2 All ER 97 at 129, [2003] 1 AC 681 at 719):

'It is important therefore to distinguish between those convention rights f which are to be regarded as absolute and those which are not. The scheme of art 6, as Keir Starmer in European Human Rights Law (1999) pp 118–119 (para 3.88), has explained, is that the rights listed in arts 6(2) and 6(3) which are supplementary to art 6(1) are not intended to be an exhaustive list of the requirements of fairness in criminal proceedings. Those which are listed in g art 6(3) are described as minimum rights. Once the meaning of those rights has been determined, there is no room in their case for any implied modifications or restrictions. But the European Court and the European Commission of Human Rights (the commission) have interpreted the article broadly by reading into it a variety of other rights to which the accused h person is entitled in the criminal context. Their purpose is to give effect, in a practical way, to the fundamental and absolute right to a fair trial. They include the right to silence and the right against self incrimination with which this case is concerned. As these other rights are not set out in absolute terms in the article they are open, in principle, to modification or restriction so long as this is not incompatible with the absolute right to a fair trial. As j Keir Starmer, p 182 (para 4.75) has observed, where express restrictions are provided for by the convention there is no room for implied restrictions. But where the European Court has read implied rights into the convention, it has also read in implied restrictions on those rights.

The test of compatibility with art 6(1) of the convention which is to be applied where it is contended that those rights which are not absolute should be restricted or modified will not be satisfied if the modification or limitation "does not pursue a legitimate aim and if there is not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be achieved" (see Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528 at 546–547 (para 57)). In Sporrong v Sweden (1983) 5 EHRR 35 at 52–53 (para 69) the court referred to the striking of a fair balance "between the demands of the general interest of the community and the requirements of the protection of the individual's fundamental rights".'

[52] It was submitted by Mr Casement for P that s 11 of the 1998 Act precludes modification of domestic PSI as contended for by the Attorney General because to do so in the manner suggested will diminish the ambit of an existing common law right by removing from its application a substantial amount of the material to which the common law, as it stood at the coming into force of the 1998 Act, would have applied the privilege.

[53] Section 11 provides: 'A person's reliance on a Convention right does not restrict—(a) any other right or freedom conferred on him by or under any law having effect in any part of the United Kingdom . . .'

[54] I accept Mr Perry's submission that s 11 is not intended to determine the content of any particular right or freedom and must be read in conjunction with the requirements under the 1998 Act for public authorities to act compatibly with convention rights. To give s 11 the construction for which Mr Casement contends would confer on domestic PSI the status of an absolute right which authority shows it does not have. Once it is conceded that domestic PSI is not an absolute right, the requirement that the courts must give effect to that right compatibly with the convention means, that in any particular case, the right of the individual seeking the protection of PSI must be balanced against the countervailing rights of the public at large, in this case to be protected from the effects of crime.

[55] The concept of 'modification' of established rules of substantive and procedural law so as to make them human rights compliant is familiar to those who practise in the human rights field. In his speech in Lambeth London BC v Kay, Leeds City Council v Price [2006] 4 All ER 128 at [40], [2006] 2 WLR 570 at [40] Lord Bingham describes the process confronting the courts in that case in the following terms:

> 'Reference has already been made to the duty imposed on United Kingdom courts to take Strasbourg judgments and opinions into account and to the unlawfulness of courts, as public authorities, acting incompatibly with convention rights. The questions accordingly arise whether our domestic rules of precedent are, or should be modified; whether a court which would ordinarily be bound to follow the decision of another court higher in the domestic curial hierarchy is, or should be, no longer bound to follow that decision if it appears to be inconsistent with a later ruling of the court in Strasbourg . . .'

[56] To a puisne judge of the Chancery Division, or certainly this judge the idea that his judgment may 'modify' the right to a privilege described by Lord Wilberforce in his speech in Rank Film Distributors Ltd v Video Information Centre (a firm) [1981] 2 All ER 76 at 81, [1982] AC 380 at 442 as 'too long established in our law as a basic liberty of the subject . . . to be denied' is somewhat alarming. I have however come to the conclusion, subject to the question of precedent with which I will now deal, that this is an appropriate case for that to be done. It seems to me that the public's right under arts 2, 3 and 8 to be protected from the effect of criminal activity when balanced against P's right to domestic PSI, which would otherwise operate to prevent me from directing that the offending material be passed to the police, requires me to modify P's right so as to enable the material to be so transferred. I am reinforced in arriving at that conclusion to know that it will be open to P to apply to the trial judge, at any prosecution of him for the offence of possession of such material, to exclude it as evidence under s 78 of the 1984 Act. I am further reinforced in arriving at that conclusion by the following considerations: (i) The current apparent anomaly between the scope of the privilege in civil proceedings and the scope of the privilege in criminal proceedings would disappear. As the pre-1998 Act law stood a suspect could not resist the production of material comprising free-standing evidence of possible guilt seized in a search by a constable under s 19(3) of the 1984 Act whereas he could resist production to a search order under s 7 of the Civil Procedure Act 1997 on grounds of PSI. (ii) It puts an end to what appears to be an irrational difference between the scope of domestic PSI and European PSI as recognised to form part of the rights comprised in art 6 by convention jurisprudence. (iii) It would remove or certainly reduce the anomalies in the application of domestic PSI presently imposed on disclosure in civil proceedings of which complaint has been made in such cases as AT & T Istel Ltd v Tulley [1992] 3 All ER 523, [1993] AC 45. (iv) The potential offence revealed by the offending material is serious enough having regard to the inhuman treatment of children which its production must have involved. In the course of the hearing on the 11 and 12 April I put to counsel the more extreme example of the discovery in the course of the execution of a civil search order of a substantial bomb with evidence that it was imminently about to be used to terrorise the public. In theory, at least, if the pre-1998 Act situation survives the court would be powerless to do other than hand the bomb back to the respondent to the search order in whose possession it had been found.

THE EFFECT OF PRECEDENT

[57] In Lambeth London BC v Kay, Leeds City Council v Price [2006] 4 All ER 128, [2006] 2 WLR 570 the House of Lords, in arriving at its conclusion, was confronted with a conflict between one of its own decisions and a later ruling of the ECtHR in Strasbourg (see the speech of Lord Bingham at [40] set out above). At [43] and following Lord Bingham having stated that the doctrine of stare decisis in our law is necessary in order to achieve a degree of certainty as to its application, said this:

> '... That degree of certainty is best achieved by adhering, even in the convention context, to our rules of precedent. It will of course be the duty of judges to review convention arguments addressed to them, and if they consider a binding precedent to be, or possibly to be, inconsistent with Strasbourg authority, they may express their views and give leave to appeal, as the Court of Appeal did here. Leap-frog appeals may be appropriate. In this way, in my opinion, they discharge their duty under the [1998 Act]. But they should follow the binding precedent, as again the Court of Appeal did here.
>
> [44] There is a more fundamental reason for adhering to our domestic rule. The effective implementation of the convention depends on constructive collaboration between the Strasbourg court and the national courts of member states. The Strasbourg court authoritatively expounds the interpretation of the rights embodied in the convention and its protocols, as it must if the convention is to be uniformly understood by all member states. But in its decisions on particular cases the Strasbourg court accords a margin of appreciation, often generous, to the decisions of national authorities and attaches much importance to the peculiar facts of the case. Thus it is for national authorities, including national courts particularly, to decide in the first instance how the principles expounded in Strasbourg should be applied in the special context of national legislation, law, practice and social and other conditions. It is by the decisions of national courts that the domestic standard must be initially set, and to those decisions the ordinary rules of precedent should apply.

[45] To this rule I would make one partial exception. In its judgment on the Leeds appeal, [[2005] 3 All ER 573 at [33]], the Court of Appeal said:

> "In [D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust, K v Dewsbury Healthcare NHS Trust, K v Oldham NHS Trust [2003] EWCA Civ 1151, [2003] 4 All ER 796, [2004] QB 558] this court held that the decision of the House of Lords in [X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633] could not survive the introduction of the 1998 Act. This was, however, because the effect of the 1998 Act had undermined the policy consideration that had largely dictated the House of Lords decision. Departing from the House of Lords decision in those circumstances has attracted some academic criticism. It remains to see whether this will be echoed by the House itself."

When that case reached the House, no criticism of the Court of Appeal's bold course was expressed, the House agreed that the policy considerations which had founded its decision in [X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC] had been very largely eroded and it was accepted that that decision was no longer good law: [[2005] UKHL 23 at [21], [30]–[36], [82], [119], [124]–[125], [2005] 2 All ER 443 at [21], [30]–[36], [82], [119], [124]–[125], [2005] 2 AC 373]. The contrary was not suggested. But there were other considerations which made [X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC] a very exceptional case. Judgment was given in 1995, well before the [1998 Act]. No reference was made to the convention in any of the opinions. And, importantly, the very children whose claim in negligence the House had rejected as unarguable succeeded at Strasbourg in establishing a breach of art 3 of the convention and recovering what was, by Strasbourg standards, very substantial reparation: Z v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 384. On these extreme facts the Court of Appeal was entitled to hold, as it did in [D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust [2003] 4 All ER 796 at [83], [2004] QB 558], that the decision of the House in [X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC], in relation to children, could not survive the 1998 Act. But such a course is not permissible save where the facts are of that extreme character.'

RELEVANT STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[58] PSI is referred to in the following statutory provisions. Section 14(1) of the Civil Evidence Act:

> 'The right of a person in any legal proceedings other than criminal proceedings to refuse to answer any question or produce any document or thing if to do so would tend to expose that person to proceedings for an offence or for the recovery of a penalty—(a) shall apply only as regards criminal offences under the law of any part of the United Kingdom and penalties provided for by such law; and (b) shall include a like right to refuse to answer any question or produce any document or thing if to do so would tend to expose the spouse or civil partner of that person to proceedings for any such criminal offence or for the recovery of any such penalty.'

The remaining subsections of s 14 contain nothing further which is of relevance.

[59] Section 31 of the Theft Act 1968 provides:

'A person shall not be excused, by reason that to do so may incriminate that person or the spouse or civil partner of that person of an offence under this Act—(a) from answering any question put to that person in proceedings for the recovery or administration of any property, for the execution of any trust or for an account of any property or dealings with property; or (b) from complying with any order made in any such proceedings; but no statement or admission made by a person in answering a question put or complying with an order made as aforesaid shall, in proceedings for an offence under this Act, be admissible in evidence against that person or (unless they married or became civil partners after the making of the statement or admission) against the spouse or civil partner of that person.'

[60] Section 72(1) of the Supreme Court Act 1981 provides as follows:

'In any proceedings to which this subsection applies a person shall not be excused, by reason that to do so would tend to expose that person, or his or her spouse or civil partner, to proceedings for a related offence for the recovery of a related penalty—(a) from answering any question put to that person in the first-mentioned proceedings; (b) from complying with any order made in those proceedings.'

Section 7 of the 1997 Act provides, so far as material:

'The court may make an order under this section for the purpose of securing in the case of any existing or proposed proceedings in the court—(a) the preservation of evidence which is or may be relevant or (b) the preservation of property which is or may the subject-matter of the proceedings or as to which any question arises or may arise in the proceedings . . .

(7) This section does not affect any right of a person to refuse to do anything on the ground that to do so might tend to expose him or his spouse or civil partner to proceedings for an offence or for the recovery of a penalty . . .'

[61] Section 7 provides the compulsory powers relevant to this case. It seems to me that, whereas these statutory provisions govern the application of PSI in certain circumstances, they were not intended to, and do not, define its ambit so as necessarily to include in the privilege free-standing evidence. The words 'produce any document or thing' in s 14 of the Civil Evidence Act 1968 are capable of referring either to material produced by a witness under compulsion or material amounting to free-standing evidence.

THE AUTHORITIES

[62] It was Mr Casement's submission that R v Hertfordshire CC, ex p Green Environmental Industries Ltd [2000] 1 All ER 773, [2000] 2 AC 412 was another example, similar to Rank Film Distributors Ltd v Video Information Centre (a firm) [1981] 2 All ER 76, [1982] AC 380, of the House of Lords finding that PSI applied to self-standing documentary evidence not created by the respondent but produced under the compulsory powers relating to disclosure. The relevant material is described by Lord Hoffmann as follows ([2000] 1 All ER 773 at 777, [2000] 2 AC 412 at 418):

> 'The request asked for particulars of all persons, companies or hospitals which had supplied clinical waste to Green; of the persons who carried waste on its behalf; of the staff which it employed in handling clinical waste at the two sites which had been found; of the companies which had employed Green to dispose of clinical waste; of the supplier or hirer of the trailers it had used; of the keepers of any vehicles used to collect waste from the producers; of the locations of any other sites used by Green and of three bins which had been seen on one of the sites but were no longer there.'

[63] The relevant statutory power to compel disclosure in that case is contained in s 71(2) of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 which, relevantly, provides:

> 'For the purpose of the discharge of its functions under this Part . . . (b) a waste regulation authority, may, by notice in writing served on him, require any person to furnish such information specified in the notice as the . . . authority . . . reasonably considers . . . it needs, in such form and within such period following service of the notice . . . as is so specified.'

[64] The 'person' spoken of in sub-s (b) is not required to deliver up documents or articles but to answer questions, possibly in writing. It follows, it seems to me, that the answers given by that person are a classic example of 'testimonial evidence', without more, potentially covered by PSI. As noted above Lord Hoffmann went on to find that none the less the respondents were bound to give the information requested because that information was confined to simple fact.

[65] It follows that the most recent House of Lords decision on this point is AT & T Istel Ltd v Tully [1992] 3 All ER 523, [1993] AC 45 in which the decision was handed down in July 1992. The background of the case is set out in the headnote as follows:

> 'In 1988 the second plaintiff company, then in the control of the first and second defendants, entered into a contract with a health authority for the supply of computer services. After the first plaintiff had purchased the entire shareholding of the second plaintiff, they learned of allegations that the contract with the health authority had been operated fraudulently. In proceedings against, inter alios, the first and second defendants for damages for fraud and breach of trust the plaintiffs obtained, from Buckley J., an order ex parte requiring both defendants to disclose information relating to dealings with certain assets and to produce copies of documents in respect of such dealings. Paragraph 33 of the order prohibited the use of the material so disclosed in the prosecution of either defendant. On the application of both defendants Wright J. set aside the order in so far as it related to such disclosure on the ground that it infringed their privilege against self-incrimination. The Crown Prosecution Service were informed of Buckley J.'s order and of the plaintiffs' intention to appeal from the decision of Wright J., and were asked whether they wished to intervene or make representations in the appeal. By a letter dated 23 October 1991 they stated that they did not intend to intervene or be heard and that, since the paragraph applied only to disclosure by the defendants in compliance with the order it would not prevent them from using any material which they had already obtained or which they might obtain independently. The Court of Appeal dismissed the plaintiffs' appeal from Wright J.'s order, holding that it was not open to the court to devise protection in substitution for the defendants' privilege against self-incrimination, and that the plaintiffs' claim was neither proprietary nor within section 72 of the Supreme Court Act 1981.' (See [1993] AC 45.)

[66] The speeches of their Lordships proceed on the basis that all the material requested which would include self-standing evidence was potentially subject to PSI. However the House of Lords found that because of the arrangement with the prosecuting authorities the defendants were in no danger of being prosecuted for any offences in respect of which the requested material might serve as evidence for the prosecution and so the defendants should make the disclosure sought. However their Lordships, on the way to their conclusion, mounted a critique of the application of PSI to disclosure in civil proceedings.

[67] In his speech Lord Templeman stated ([1992] 3 All ER 523 at 530, [1993] AC 45 at 53):

> '... the privilege can only be justified on two grounds, first that it discourages the ill-treatment of a suspect and secondly that it discourages the production of dubious confessions. Neither of these considerations applies to the present appeal. It is difficult to see any reason why in civil proceedings the privilege against self-incrimination should be exercisable so as to enable a litigant to refuse relevant and even vital documents which are in his possession or power and which speak for themselves ... I regard the privilege ... exercisable in civil proceedings as an archaic and unjustifiable survival from the past when the court directs the production of relevant documents and requires the defendant to specify his dealings with the plaintiff's property or money.'

[68] Lord Griffiths noted ([1992] 3 All ER 523 at 533–534, [1993] AC 45 at 57):

> '... the privilege ... is in need of radical reappraisal. It is however deeply embedded in English law and can only be removed or moderated by Parliament [which] has in recent years made many inroads into the privilege in a number of statutes. In civil actions ... the privilege can be claimed to thwart the claims of victims of fraud. I can for myself see no argument in favour of the privilege against producing a document the contents of which may go to show that the holder has committed a criminal offence.'

[69] Lord Lowry said ([1992] 3 All ER 523 at 544, [1993] AC 45 at 69): 'reform ... is still needed in several respects ... such as ... the illogicality of protecting pre-existing documents ...'

[70] In Re Arrows Ltd (No 4), Hamilton v Naviede [1994] 3 All ER 814, [1995] 2 AC 75 the House of Lords was dealing with a case where the Court of Appeal had allowed an appeal from the judge who had directed that the transcripts of examinations of a director of an insolvent company under s 236 of the Insolvency Act 1986 on an undertaking by the director of the Serious Fraud Office that the transcripts would not be used save in the circumstances specified in s 2(8) of the Criminal Justice Act 1987. The effect of the order of the Court of Appeal was that the transcripts should be made available to the director without condition. The House of Lords dismissed the appeal. Lord Browne-Wilkinson gave the leading speech. Having referred to Rank Film Distributors Ltd v Video Information Centre (a firm) [1981] 2 All ER 76, [1982] AC 380 and AT & T Istel Ltd v Tully and to art 6 of the convention as an example of the international acceptance of the principle of PSI he said ([1994] 3 All ER 814 at 821, [1995] 2 AC 75 at 96):

> 'The inevitable effect of a witness in civil proceedings claiming the privilege against self-incrimination is to deprive the opposite party and the court of evidence relevant to the dispute under consideration. Until recently, this has not given rise to much litigation. But the recent upsurge of financial fraud, particularly in relation to companies, has raised in an acute form the conflict between the witness's basic right to rely on the privilege on the one hand and the public interest in successfully pursuing and recovering the fruits of such fraud.'

[71] Then he continues ([1994] 3 All ER 814 at 833, [1995] 2 AC 75 at 109):

> 'Only Parliament can weigh the conflicting public interests as between the demands of justice to the accused, the need to obtain the information for the purposes of civil proceedings (including investigatory proceedings) and the public interest in the successful prosecution of those guilty of fraud.'

[72] The evidence in question in Re Arrows Ltd (No 4) was, of course, testimonial evidence to which the IEA would not apply. It is however the most recent decision of the House of Lords cited to me where their Lordships highlight the difficulties in the application of PSI to the disclosure of documents in civil proceedings but accept that the only solution is fresh legislation. It is of interest, however, to compare the balancing process spoken of by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in 1995 in the passage [1995] 2 AC 75 at 109 which he confines to Parliament with the similar balancing process spoken of by the Privy Council in Brown v Stott (Procurator Fiscal, Dunfermline) [2001] 2 All ER 97, [2003] 1 AC 681 and which is assigned by them to the courts.

[73] The relevant decisions of the House of Lords were given well before the passing of the 1998 Act, indeed, probably before that measure was seriously proposed.

[74] The most recent decision of the Court of Appeal which is potentially inconsistent with the submissions of the Attorney General is Den Norske Bank ASA v Antonatos [1998] 3 All ER 74, [1999] QB 271 in which judgment was given on 7 April 1998. In that case the court was considering a claim by a bank to recover the proceeds of bribes given to him in the course of the bank's business and damages for frauds against the bank. In the course of those proceedings the bank obtained a freezing injunction over the assets of the defendant. Waller LJ sets out ([1998] 3 All ER 74 at 77–78, [1999] QB 271 at 277) the relevant parts of para 3 of that order. The defendant was required to inform the bank's solicitors in writing—

> '"as soon as reasonably practicable, of all his assets and of the Specific Assets whether in or outside England and Wales . . . or whether held by him legally or beneficially or held by him through nominees or otherwise howsoever, and of the Specific Assets, giving the value, location and details of all such assets and Specific Assets, and (in the case of the Specific Assets) to the best of his knowledge and belief what has become of them, including without limitation details of all bank accounts including the name or names in which the account is held, the name of the bank, building society or other entity, the address of the relevant branch and the number of the account controlled by [DA] or to which [DA] is a signatory and details of all interests held by [DA] in any company, ship or partnership or joint venture relating to the companies, ships and individuals named out in Annexes C and D to this Order."

The paragraph further states:

"The first defendant (DA) may be entitled to refuse to provide some or all of this information on the grounds that it may incriminate him. In the event that [DA] claims to be entitled to the benefit of such privilege, he must provide such allegedly privileged information to the Supervising Solicitor who will hold such information to the order of the court."

In schedule 4 the supervising solicitor undertook to explain to DA the effect of the order including his entitlement to avail himself of the privilege against self-incrimination.

The order also provided that "the information must be confirmed in an affidavit which must be served on the Plaintiff's Solicitors within 7 days after this Order has been served on [DA]".'

[75] It seems to me that the form of para 3 is similar in effect to the request for information made in R v Hertfordshire CC, ex p Green Environmental Industries Ltd [2000] 1 All ER 773, [2000] 2 AC 412 the written answer to which would constitute testimonial evidence by the defendant. Accordingly it seems to me that the defendant could have refused to answer it on grounds of PSI today regardless of whether the IEA is correct or not.

[76] The judge at first instance in charge of the case went on to direct cross-examination of the defendant on his answers and that examination took place. In the course of that examination the defendant asserted PSI in answer to a number of the questions. The judge required him to answer. The matter came before the Court of Appeal on appeal from that ruling. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal in part ruling that the defendant should not be required to provide answers to questions which sought to establish his receipt of money from a client of the bank and the amount received.

[77] The leading judgment was delivered by Waller LJ. The judgment deals with the effect on PSI of the handing over of documents to the supervising solicitor. It is not clear from the report what documents were handed over but it seems likely that they constituted that part of the written answer to the request made under para 3 of the order which the defendant was refusing to answer on grounds of PSI. Be that as it may Waller LJ having quoted from the judgment of Cockburn CJ in R v Boyes (1861) 1 B & S 311, 121 ER 730 says ([1998] 3 All ER 74 at 89, [1999] QB 271 at 289):

'Thus, it is not simply the risk of prosecution. A witness is entitled to claim the privilege in relation to any piece of information or evidence on which the prosecution might wish to rely in establishing guilt. And, as it seems to me, it also applies to any piece of information or evidence on which the prosecution would wish to rely in making its decision whether to prosecute or not.'

[78] It is possible that, in so far as that passage in Waller LJ's case is to be read as covering free-standing evidence, it is obiter, as being not necessary for his decision, because the documents in question did not fall within that classification.

[79] The other aspect of the case which is of relevance for present purposes is that passage in Waller LJ's judgment under the heading 'Unsatisfactory nature of the rule allowing privilege to be claimed', where he says ([1998] 3 All ER 74 at 84, [1999] QB 271 at 284):

> 'One must start by expressing sympathy for all those involved in the procedure summarised above, not least the judge. So far as [the bank] were concerned, they had a strong prima facie case that DA had taken bribes and been a party to a fraud, and utilised front companies to disguise the whereabouts of the spoils. They thought and think they are being frustrated in their attempts to discover what bribes DA did receive, and if he did receive them, where the moneys went, and/or where the money is now. So far as DA was concerned there was (as the judge found) a risk of him being prosecuted in a criminal court for corruption. If only Parliament had done that for which there has been a need now for far too long, of extending the policy underlining s 31 of the [Theft Act 1968] to criminal offences more generally, the above sorry saga might never have needed to unfold in the way it did.'

[80] I return to the passage in the speech of Lord Bingham in Lambeth London BC v Kay, Leeds City Council v Price [2006] 4 All ER 128, [2006] 2 WLR 570. It does seem to me that it is at least strongly arguable that this is the exceptional case which fits into the 'partial exception' spoken of by Lord Bingham. I do so for the following reasons: (i) The decisions of the House of Lords, Rank Film Distributors Ltd v Video Information Centre (a firm) [1981] 2 All ER 76, [1982] AC 380 and AT & T Istel Ltd v Tully [1992] 3 All ER 523, [1993] AC 45, and of the Court of Appeal ([1992] 2 All ER 28, [1992] QB 315), Den Norske Bank ASA v Antonatos [1998] 3 All ER 74, [1999] QB 271 and earlier cases which would otherwise bind me, were handed down before the coming into force of the 1998 Act on 2 October 2000. The decisions of the House of Lords were handed down before that Act was passed. In none of those cases was a convention point taken. Although A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000) [2001] 1 WLR 1879 and R v Kearns [2002] 1 WLR 2815 are referred to in the judgment of Lindsay J in O Ltd v Z [2005] All ER (D) 387 (Apr) it is clear that the IEA was not raised before him. (ii) The enactment of the 1998 Act fundamentally altered the legislative circumstances after those decisions of the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal. I refer back to [71], above, to illustrate this point. It seems to me to be highly likely that had the case for modification of domestic PSI, for which the Attorney General contends, been available to the House of Lords in the Rank Film Distributors and AT & T Istel cases they would have accepted it with open arms. (iii) There appears to be almost universal disapproval of the way in which domestic PSI operates on the procedure for disclosure in civil cases. I repeat the earlier passage in this judgment where I set out the perceived advantages, urged on me on behalf of the Attorney General, of a decision to modify the privilege. (iv) It is arguable that the decision of the Court of Appeal in A-G's Ref (No 7 of 2000), in which the Rank Film Distributors case is cited, is authority, binding upon me in favour of the IEA.

[81] As Lord Bingham indicates two courses are open to me the first, if satisfied that the case falls within Lord Bingham's 'partial exception', to decide the case by directing delivery of the offending material to the police, staying the order pending an appeal for which I would give permission. The second course is to decline to make that order, give permission to the Attorney General to appeal by-passing the Court of Appeal if appropriate permission is given, so that the matter can be dealt with by the House of Lords who are able to depart from their own decisions.

[82] After some hesitation I have come to the conclusion that subject to the question of the implied undertaking to keep confidential material produced in the course of disclosure in civil actions, with which I will shortly deal, I should take the former course and hold that this is a case where the court can modify the application of domestic PSI so as to exclude from its ambit material constituting free-standing evidence which was not created by the respondent to the search order under compulsion.

THE IMPLIED UNDERTAKING

[83] In his judgment in O Ltd v Z [2005] All ER (D) 387 (Apr) at [72]–[85] Lindsay J sets out the authorities which govern the circumstances in which a civil court may release material obtained as a result of disclosure from the implied undertaking of the parties to litigation to keep such material confidential to the proceedings. I gratefully adopt that passage in Lindsay J's judgment. My conclusion that the public interest in the prosecution of crime which leads me, in the balance that must be taken between that interest and the interest of P to a fair trial, to come down in favour of the public interest must carry with it the parallel conclusion that I should release the implied undertaking so that the offending material be passed to the police: see in particular the judgment of Swinton Thomas LJ in Re EC (a minor) (care proceedings: disclosure) [1996] 3 FCR 521, sub nom Re C (a minor) (care proceedings: disclosure) [1997] Fam 76.

[84] I will make an order directing W to pass the computer and associated electronic materials on which the offending material is stored to the appropriate police authority.

[85] I will give P permission to appeal and stay this order pending the reasonably urgent prosecution of such appeal. I am aware of the domestic situation of P which makes it of importance that circumstances of this case are investigated as soon as possible by the police.

Order accordingly. Permission to appeal given.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Re Wylde (deceased)
Wylde v Culver
[2006] EWHC 923 (Ch)

CHANCERY DIVISION

GEORGE BOMPAS QC (SITTING AS A DEPUTY JUDGE OF THE HIGH COURT)

3, 12 APRIL 2006

Probate – Costs – Discontinuance – Claimant commencing probate action – Claimant subsequently applying to discontinue action – Incidence of costs on discontinuance – CPR 57.11.

The claimant and the defendant had both been named as executors in a will made by W in 1991. The claimant was a child of W's husband by his first marriage and the defendant was a child of W by her first marriage. In 1993 W's husband died. In 2003 W made another will, in which the defendant was named as executrix and under which W's husband's children did not benefit. She died in 2005 and probate of the 2003 will was granted to the defendant. The claimant brought proceedings seeking revocation of probate, pronouncement against the validity of the 2003 will and pronouncement in solemn form for the 1991 will. He claimed that the will had been executed without W's knowledge and approval, relying, inter alia, on the circumstances that the 2003 will had been written out in the manuscript of the defendant, a principal beneficiary, and was purportedly witnessed by someone W had not liked, whose signature did not resemble her usual signature. Subsequently, however, the claimant applied under CPR 57.11[a] for discontinuance of the proceedings with no order for costs. That rule provided that on the application of the claimant in a probate claim or a defendant who had acknowledged service the court might order that the claim be discontinued or dismissed on such terms as to costs as it thought just. The defendant resisted the application that there be no order for costs, arguing that as it would be inappropriate to allow discontinuance if a serious issue had been raised as to the due execution of the 2003 will, it followed that if no serious issue had been raised it was difficult to see why the claimant should avoid having to pay the costs of the action on the action being discontinued.

Held – Where a claimant sought to discontinue a probate action and the question of costs then arose, the considerations as to discontinuance and costs were different. As to discontinuance, the question was whether, viewed objectively, there was at the time of discontinuance a serious issue to be resolved in relation to the will. As to costs, the question was whether, viewed from the perspective of the discontinuing party, the opposition had been on reasonable grounds. In the instant case, the matters which had been raised by the claimant did not raise a serious issue such as should lead the court to refuse permission to discontinue and instead make directions for a trial. However, there was no basis on which to doubt that the claimant might reasonably have thought it right to a CPR 57, so far as material, provides: 'At any stage of a probate claim the court, on the application of the claimant or of any defendant who has acknowledged service, may order that—(a) the claim be discontinued or dismissed on such terms as to costs or otherwise as it thinks just . . .'

begin and continue the action, and no basis to believe that he had never had faith in the case or that he had at any time pursued the case in bad faith. Accordingly, permission to discontinue would be given, with no order as to costs (see [28], [29], [33]–[37], [39], [40], below).

Notes

For discontinuance and dismissal, and for costs of probate proceedings: unsuccessful parties, see 17(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 292, 330.

Case referred to in judgment

Green v Briscoe [2005] EWHC 3455 (Ch), [2005] All ER (D) 96 (May).

Application to discontinue

Robert Culver, the claimant in proceedings for (i) revocation of the probate granted on 16 February 2005 out of the Oxford District Registry to Theresa Dianne Culver (the defendant) of the will of Jean Wylde deceased dated 20 November 2003; (ii) pronouncement against the validity of the 2003 will; and (iii) pronouncement in solemn form for a will of the deceased made in 1991, applied to the court seeking permission under CPR 57.11 to discontinue the action with no order as to costs. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Sara Hargreaves (instructed by Pitmans, Reading) for the claimant.

Daniel Bromilow (instructed by Field Seymour Parkes, Reading) for the defendant.

Cur adv vult

12 April 2006. The following judgment was delivered.

GEORGE BOMPAS QC.

[1] In May 2005 the present action was started by Mr Robert Culver. He is now seeking permission under r 57.11 of the CPR to discontinue the action. The application is made under that rule because the action, being a probate claim, is not subject to Pt 38 of the CPR (see r 57.11(1)). The application was made on the day when the action was due to come on for trial, notice of the application having been given only on 27 March 2006.

[2] The first question is whether to allow discontinuance. If discontinuance is allowed, questions arise as to the costs of the action.

BACKGROUND

[3] Mrs Jean Wylde (the deceased) died on 3 February 2005. She was a widow, having been married twice. By her first marriage she had three children. One of the children is the defendant. By a will dated 20 November 2003 (the 2003 will) the defendant had been named as executrix. Probate of the 2003 [will] was granted to the defendant out of the Oxford District Registry on 16 February 2005. The reason why probate was sought and granted so promptly after the death of the testatrix was because the defendant, who had been in England during the deceased's last illness, lives and works in the United States and was under pressure to return there.

[4] The deceased's second husband had had six children by a previous marriage. One of these is the claimant. There were no children of the marriage between the deceased and her second husband.

[5] At the time of the deceased's second marriage in 1974 she and her husband already had several grandchildren between them. Over the years many more were born, so that by the time of the deceased's death there were 29 in all.

[6] The deceased and her second husband were not wealthy. Their principal asset was a comparatively modest house in Reading, where they lived. On 16 August 1991 they made wills by which, broadly speaking, each left to the other (if surviving) all her or his assets, including the house, and subject to that left her or his estate to 17 of their grandchildren but with the defendant having expressly a right to live in the house should she so wish. These 17 grandchildren, of whom 8 or 9 were children of the deceased's children, may have been all the grandchildren born by 1991. Certainly there were further grandchildren born later. The deceased's second husband died in 1993.

[7] In the will made by the deceased in 1991 (the 1991 will) the claimant was named as an executor along with the defendant. So far as is known, the deceased had not sought to change the 1991 will or to make a fresh will until 2003. The 1991 will was professionally drawn. The 2003 will was not. It is written out in the manuscript of the defendant.

[8] In the 2003 will the deceased left a gift of £1,000 apiece to each of three of her husband's grandchildren, with three more of those receiving £500 each. These bequests depended upon the deceased's net estate being greater than £10,000. Subject to this her estate was to be divided between her three children with a deceased child's natural children taking in the event of their parent pre-deceasing the deceased.

[9] The last several lines of the 2003 will contained a statement explaining that the deceased felt that her husband's family had not welcomed her into the family and had had no contact and should not benefit under her will. It continued by explaining, so it seems, that these people should not be welcomed at her funeral. An exception was made for the claimant and his family and for one of his brothers, Kevin Wylde, and his family.

[10] The 2003 will bears an attestation clause and signatures indicating that the 2003 will had been signed by the deceased in the presence of a D Hiscock and a P Hiscock. The first of these is Mrs Doris Hiscock; the second is her son Patrick. Mrs Hiscock is the defendant's mother-in-law.

[11] It is said on behalf of the claimant that the content of the 2003 will was a great surprise to him and his siblings, who had been aware of the 1991 will. (i) His brother, Kevin Wylde, says that he had had a conversation with the defendant in November 2003, when she was visiting her mother. In this conversation, says Kevin Wylde, the defendant told him that the deceased had that day been to solicitors and had altered her will, principally to remove as beneficiaries four of the Wylde grandchildren with whom the deceased had had no contact for some time. He also says that he was told he had been made an executor. (ii) It is said by the claimant and his son that at a dinner with his family at his house on Boxing Day 2004 the deceased had announced that all her inheritance was going to the grandchildren and that 'no adults would get anything'.

[12] It is further suggested by the claimant that the deceased's relations with Mrs Hiscock were difficult, that the deceased did not like Mrs Hiscock, and that it is improbable that the deceased would have turned to Mrs Hiscock to find a witness to a will. Mrs Hiscock has stated that she was telephoned by the deceased on 20 November 2003 asking to come round to see her; but the claimant has given evidence that the deceased, who unquestionably had impaired hearing, did not use the telephone. Recent disclosure of telephone bills reveals that on

20 November 2003 there was no call from the deceased's house to Mrs Hiscock's house by land-line. a

[13] The possibility that Mrs Hiscock may not in truth have witnessed the signing of the will is suggested by the fact that the signature used on the 2003 will does not appear to be Mrs Hiscock's normal signature: it did not resemble the signatures on two letters, one of which did take the form of typed statement, sent to the claimant after the deceased's death and before the action was started. As b to this it was explained by the defendant's solicitors in correspondence shortly before this action was started that 'when asked to "sign" formal documents [Mrs Hiscock] "prints" her name in contrast to the "signature" she places on more informal documents such as letters'.

[14] It is also said by the claimant and by his brother that following the c deceased's death the deceased's affairs were dealt with in a rushed and secretive manner, causing suspicion. In particular it is said that the claimant asked to see a copy of the will, but was not shown one; that probate of the will was obtained with undue haste; and that the sale of the house was rushed and not handled with candour.

[15] This action was started on 17 May 2005. On about the 18 February 2005 d the claimant had sought to lodge a caveat, but had learnt shortly afterwards that probate had already been granted. Correspondence ensued between the claimant and solicitors on the one side and the defendant and solicitors on the other. This concerned both the making of the 2003 will and the proposed sale of the deceased's house. The final impetus for the action came when, probably as a result of confusion, the claimant thought that the house was about to be sold e with a risk of the proceeds being distributed.

[16] The claims made in the particulars of claim are (a) that the 2003 will was executed without the deceased's knowledge and approval, the circumstances being such that the burden of proving the contrary lies with the defendant; and (b) that the defendant should in circumstances prove that the 2003 will was duly f executed. The prayer seeks revocation of the probate granted on 16 February 2005, that the court should pronounce against the validity of the 2003 will, and that the court should pronounce in solemn form for the 1991 will.

[17] The defendant has served only a defence, not making any Pt 20 counterclaim: she is not seeking to have a grant of probate in solemn form. No one has sought in the proceedings to require the defendant to obtain such a g grant, putting the defendant to proof of due execution.

[18] As the action has proceeded there has been no development which has radically changed matters. The delivery of witness statements showed some small refinement in the explanations previously given as to the manner of the execution of the 2003 will. Later a handwriting expert has considered what h appears to be Mrs Hiscock's signature on the 2003 will, and has given a somewhat inconclusive report. And the disclosure of telephone records to which I have referred has shown that Mrs Hiscock may well have been mistaken in stating that on the day when the 2003 will was made she was telephoned by the deceased.

[19] With this introduction I turn to the question of discontinuance, before j considering the arguments on costs.

PERMISSION TO DISCONTINUE

[20] Probate claims are not simply proceedings between the parties. There are likely to be others affected by the outcome of the proceedings. The present case is no exception. There is no doubt that the court may refuse permission to discontinue, where it considers that there is a serious question which should be decided by the court.

[21] Mr Bromilow, counsel for the defendant, drew my attention to the case of Green v Briscoe [2005] All ER (D) 96, in which the court had dismissed an action seeking, among other matters, an order pronouncing against a will, revocation of the probate granted in respect of the will and a declaration of intestacy. The defendant executor counterclaimed for a grant of probate in solemn form. One member of the family had acknowledged service of the action and had indicated that he wanted to be satisfied that the will had been properly executed but did not intend to put forward any positive case. Although the action was dismissed, permission was refused to the defendant to discontinue the counterclaim: this was directed to be continued against the family member, because a serious issue had been raised as to the validity of the will. In effect the defendant executor was required to continue to seek an order for a grant of probate in solemn form.

[22] In the present case the claimant is seeking to argue that discontinuance should be permitted, but that either (a) the claimant should be paid costs out of the deceased's estate, or (b) there should be no order made as to costs. On behalf of the claimant Miss Hargreaves drew my attention to the passage in Parry and Clark Law of Succession (11th edn, 2002) p 457 (para 19-43). The general rule in probate actions is no different from ordinary actions: costs follow the event. To this there are exceptions. As to this the editors comment:

> 'The special circumstances justifying a different order may be classified under two heads, ie (i) fault of the testator or the residuary beneficiary—costs out of the estate, (ii) case for inquiry—no order as to costs.'

[23] Mr Bromilow has pointed out that the claimant is faced with something of a dilemma in seeking to discontinue while seeking either of these orders. He submits, and I think rightly, that there is no basis for finding that costs should be paid out of the estate. Therefore as to costs the question is whether or not (and I speak loosely) there was a case for inquiry. That there was such a case is urged by Miss Hargreaves, drawing attention to various of the matters I have referred to in describing the background. But if there was such a case, there still is: there has been no dramatic change in the strength of the case since the outset. It is here that the difficulty arises. (i) If on the one hand, a serious issue has been raised as to the due execution of the 2003 will, it would quite probably be inappropriate to allow discontinuance. (ii) If on the other hand, no serious issue has been raised, it is difficult to see why the claimant should avoid having to pay the costs of the action on the action being discontinued.

[24] Shortly stated, do the matters put forward by Miss Hargreaves to show that there should be no order as to costs on discontinuance lead to the conclusion that there should be no permission to discontinue?

[25] There are three documents which set out on behalf of the claimant matters said to raise concerns about the deceased's knowledge and approval of the 2003 will or its due execution. These are (a) a letter dated 13 April 2003 from the claimant's solicitors, (b) the particulars of claim in this action, and (c) the skeleton argument provided for the present hearing. In each case the points made have been broadly similar. In effect these are: (i) the circumstances surrounding the making of the 2003 will, in particular the facts that the 2003 will was written out by a principal beneficiary and was purportedly witnessed by someone the deceased did not like, whose signature did not seem to be genuine, following a telephone conversation the deceased was unlikely to have made; (ii) the fact that probate was obtained so promptly; (iii) discrepancy between the contents of the 2003 will and what was supposedly told to Kevin Wylde and what was said by the deceased at the Boxing Day dinner; (iv) the fact that the sale of the house had been progressed in a secretive manner and with apparent haste to distribute the proceeds of sale; and (v) the lack of explanation for the decision of the deceased to replace the 1991 will.

[26] Of these points there is nothing in the second or the fourth. What was done does not, on examination, suggest anything sinister or underhand. The fifth I find unimpressive. The fact is that by 2003 it would have been quite reasonable for the deceased to change the dispositions contemplated by the 1991 will. For one thing she now had more grandchildren than in 1991. It is quite understandable that she might have decided to be more discriminating in the selection of beneficiaries.

[27] In relation to the third of these points Mr Bromilow has rightly drawn attention to the fact that there is a conflict of evidence concerning the conversation between the defendant and Kevin Wylde. As he rightly submits, I cannot assume that Kevin Wylde's version of events is correct. Indeed, given that the claimant is now seeking to discontinue the case, it may possibly be that I should treat the defendant's version as more likely to be true. As to the Boxing Day dinner announcement, even if made as suggested, there are possible explanations that are consistent with the 2003 will having been duly made as the deceased's last will. The evidence of the announcement does not compel, and barely advances, the conclusion that the deceased had not duly executed the 2003 will with full knowledge and approval of its contents.

[28] What then of the matters in sub-para (i)? Whatever grounds these might provide for questioning the making of the 2003 will they do not in my judgment raise a serious issue which should lead me to refuse permission to discontinue and instead to make directions for a trial. As in the case of conversation between Mr Kevin Wylde and the defendant, parts of what is relied upon (as, for example, the deceased's alleged dislike of Mrs Doris Hiscock and her unwillingness to use the telephone) turn on disputed evidence. For the rest, though it may be possible that cross-examination will demolish the statements and written evidence of the defendant, Mrs Doris Hiscock and Mr Patrick Hiscock, that result does not look likely on the materials at present before the court.

[29] I am therefore satisfied that permission to discontinue may appropriately be given. But this then leads to the questions of costs. If there is not a serious issue, was there ever? If not, on what ground can the claimant possibly avoid having to pay the defendant's costs, much less obtain an order for costs? This, in a nutshell, is Mr Bromilow's argument

COSTS

[30] Rule 57.11 of the CPR differs from r 38.6, the general rule dealing with discontinuance, in that in probate actions there is no stated presumption that a discontinuing claimant should pay the costs down to the discontinuance. However I approach the question of costs on the basis that the claimant, in seeking to discontinue, should ordinarily pay the costs, and that the onus lies with him to show why there should be some different order. Shortly stated, in the absence of some good reason for a different order, it can be taken that the action was wrongly brought. This, after all, would be the starting point if the action went to trial and was dismissed.

[31] Earlier in this judgment I have rejected the argument that the claimant's costs should be paid out of the estate. Little needs to be said about this submission. In my judgment the deceased did nothing of consequence to invite or encourage the claimant to challenge the 2003 will. I fail to see that the defendant or her siblings did anything to justify their having to bear the claimant's costs of these proceedings.

[32] I have found the question whether there should be no order as to costs much harder.

[33] I can see how the claimant might reasonably have thought it right to start the action; and I can also see how the claimant might reasonably have thought it right to begin and continue the action. The point here is that in starting and continuing the action the claimant may very well have been reasonable in believing that Mr Kevin Wylde's description of the conversation with the defendant was true, that the deceased did dislike Mrs Doris Hiscock and that the deceased did not use the telephone, and that Mrs Hiscock's signature on the 2003 will was suspicious. In short, so the argument runs, the claimant acted reasonably in seeking to challenge the 2003 will.

[34] In the event I have concluded that this argument is to be accepted. I am not inclined to doubt the sincerity of the claimant; and on this basis I have decided that the claimant should not be ordered to pay the costs on discontinuance.

[35] As it seems to me, the 'case for inquiry no order as to costs' principle requires examination of the conduct of the claimant in bringing and pursuing the action. The principle is given particular expression in one rule in the CPR. Special provision is made for the case where a defendant to a probate action gives a notice in his defence along the lines given in the Green v Briscoe case, that he will not raise any positive case but nevertheless insists on the will being proved in solemn form and the attesting witnesses being cross-examined in such a case according to r 57.7(5)(b) of the CPR, 'the court will not make an order for costs against him unless it considers that there was no reasonable ground for opposing the will'. In my judgment, a reasonable but nevertheless ultimately mistaken belief in a state of affairs which if not mistaken would lead to a will being pronounced against does amount to a reasonable ground for opposing a will.

[36] The principle is not confined to cases where a defendant has given such a notice as referred to in r 57.7(5). It is of general application. And in its general application also it at the least allows, if it does not require, the conduct of the unsuccessful party to be looked at. This is supported by the editors of Parry and Clark Law of Succession (11th edn, 2002) p 457 (para 19-45): this contains the statement that 'It is . . . necessary to consider whether the losing party had reasonable grounds, looking to his knowledge and means of knowledge, for the issues he raised'.

[37] In other words the dilemma postulated by Mr Bromilow is not so stark as he would have it. This is because the considerations are in fact different. As to discontinuance the question is whether, viewed objectively, there is at the time of discontinuance a serious issue to be resolved in relation to the will. As to costs the question is whether viewed from the perspective of the discontinuing party the opposition has been on reasonable grounds.

[38] Were it not for one matter I would have had no hesitation in concluding that there should be no order as to costs. This is that the claimant is now discontinuing. Although he did not quite articulate the point in this way, Mr Bromilow argued that the discontinuance shows that the claimant has no faith in his case, that therefore the claimant cannot have had any faith in the case, and that therefore the case should never have been brought. This is in effect the argument used by Mr Bromilow to support a submission that the claimant should be ordered to pay costs assessed on an indemnity basis. a [39] The explanation given on behalf of the claimant for the decision to discontinue is not detailed. What I gain from what has been said by his solicitor and by Miss Hargreaves is that the claimant has got cold feet: his perception of the case now is that it is weak, and he is plainly worried about costs. But I do not think it right to believe that the claimant never had faith in the case or that he has at any time pursued the case in bad faith, believing the case to be unjustified. As I mentioned above, I am not inclined to doubt the claimant's sincerity. b

[40] In the event, therefore, I shall give permission to discontinue but shall make no order as to costs.

[41] Given this decision, it is not necessary to consider what basis of assessment should be ordered or whether any third parties should be joined in the proceedings. c

Order accordingly.

Rakesh Rajani Barrister.

R v Coutts

[2006] UKHL 39

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HUTTON, LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY AND LORD MANCE

14, 15 JUNE, 19 JULY 2006

Criminal law – Murder – Manslaughter – Reduction to manslaughter – Facts raising possibility of manslaughter verdict – Judge in murder trial asking counsel whether he should direct jury on manslaughter because evidence had arisen to support such a verdict – Prosecution and defence counsel both declining to invite judge to direct jury on manslaughter – Judge directing jury only on murder – Whether judge having duty to direct jury on obvious alternative offence arising on the evidence irrespective of parties' wishes.

The deceased died at the defendant's flat. He stored her body first in his car, then in his shed and then in a commercial storage facility. More than a month after her death, he took the body to some woodland and set fire to it. When the deceased's body was found burning and unclothed, it had a ligature made from a pair of tights tied twice around the neck, with a knot on the right-hand side. The defendant was charged with murder on an indictment which contained that charge alone. At his trial, the defendant testified that he and the deceased had had consensual asphyxial sex, and that her death had been a tragic accident. During the course of the trial, evidence was adduced which would have enabled a rational jury, if they accepted it, to convict the defendant of manslaughter. At the close of evidence, the judge asked counsel whether he should direct the jury that a verdict of guilty of manslaughter was open to them. Prosecuting counsel submitted that it would be unfair to do so, stating that the Crown had throughout put forward a case of deliberate killing and nothing else, and if that were not proved the defendant was entitled to be acquitted. Counsel for the defendant subsequently discussed the issue with his client. After being advised of the sentence he would receive if convicted of manslaughter, the defendant agreed that counsel should not ask the judge to leave manslaughter to the jury in the hope that they would acquit him if faced with a stark choice between murder and accident. The judge duly made no mention of manslaughter in his direction to the jury, directing them instead to acquit if they thought that the death had or might have been an accident. The defendant was convicted. He appealed, contending that the judge ought to have left a verdict of manslaughter for the jury's consideration, irrespective of the parties' wishes, since there was evidence to support it. The Court of Appeal rejected that contention and dismissed the appeal. The defendant appealed to the House of Lords.

Held – In order to achieve the public interest objective that defendants are neither over-convicted nor under-convicted, nor acquitted when they had committed a lesser offence of the type charged, a jury had to be alerted in some cases to the options open to it, and that was the responsibility not of the prosecutor or defence counsel but of the trial judge. Thus the public interest in the administration of justice was best served if, in any trial on indictment, the trial judge left to the jury, subject to any appropriate caution or warning, but irrespective of the wishes of trial counsel, any obvious alternative offence which there was evidence to support and was more than trifling. That rule would not be extended to summary proceedings since, for all their potential importance to individuals, they did not engage the public interest to the same degree. It would also be confined to alternative verdicts obviously raised by the evidence, ie alternatives which would suggest themselves to the mind of any ordinarily knowledgable and alert criminal judge, excluding alternatives which ingenious counsel might identify through diligent research after trial. Application of that rule might in some cases benefit the defendant, protecting him against an excessive conviction. In other cases, it might benefit the public by providing for the conviction of a lawbreaker who deserved punishment. A defendant might, quite reasonably from his point of view, choose to roll the dice. But the interests of society should not depend on such a contingency. It was, of course, fundamental that the duty to leave lesser verdicts to the jury should not be exercised so as to infringe a defendant's right to a fair trial. That might be so if it were shown that decisions were made at trial which would not have been made had the possibility of such a verdict been envisaged. If the prejudice were significant and could not be avoided or mitigated at that stage, the overall interests of justice might mean that the duty to direct on the alternative verdict would not apply. There might also be unfairness if the jury first learned of the alternative from the judge's summing-up, when counsel had not had the opportunity to address it in their closing speeches. However, that risk would be met if the proposed direction was indicated to counsel at some stage before they made their closing speeches. In the instant case, the judge's failure to leave a manslaughter verdict to the jury was a material irregularity. No appellate court could be sure that a jury, fully directed, would not have convicted of manslaughter. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed, and the matter remitted to the Court of Appeal which would be invited to quash the conviction and could also deal with any application for a retrial (see [12], [23], [24], [27], [28], [40], [43]–[45], [61]–[63], [76], [78], [80]–[85], [92], [93], [100], [102], below).

Dicta of Lord Clyde in Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232 at 237 applied.

Notes

For the judge's summing up, see 11(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1014.

Cases referred to in opinions

A-G's Ref (No 3 of 1994) [1997] 3 All ER 936, [1998] AC 245, [1997] 3 WLR 421, HL.
Beck v Alabama (1980) 447 US 625, US SC.
Berra v US (1956) 351 US 131, US SC.
Bullard v R [1961] 3 All ER 470n, [1957] AC 635, [1957] 3 WLR 656, PC.
DPP v Daley [1980] AC 237, [1979] 2 WLR 239, PC.
DPP v Newbury [1976] 2 All ER 365, [1977] AC 500, [1976] 2 WLR 918, HL.
Gilbert v R (2000) 170 ALR 88, Aus HC.
Gillard v R (2003) 202 ALR 202, Aus HC.
Hunter v R [2003] UKPC 69, [2004] 2 LRC 719.
Keeble v US (1973) 412 US 205, US SC.
Kwaku Mensah v R [1946] AC 83, PC.
Mancini v DPP [1941] 3 All ER 272, [1942] AC 1, HL.
Mraz v R (1955) 93 CLR 493, Aus HC.
Muir v HM Advocate 1933 JC 46, HC Just.

Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107, Aus HC.
R v Bergman [1996] 2 Cr App R 399, CA.
R v Brown [1993] 2 All ER 75, [1994] 1 AC 212, [1993] 2 WLR 556, HL.
R v Church [1965] 2 All ER 72, [1966] 1 QB 59, [1965] 2 WLR 1120, CCA.
R v Cox [1995] 2 Cr App R 513, CA.
R v Dhillon [1997] 2 Cr App R 104, CA.
R v Emmett [1999] EWCA Crim 1710.
R v Fairbanks [1986] 1 WLR 1202, CA.
R v Hopper [1915] 2 KB 431, CCA.
R v Jackson [1993] 4 SCR 573, Can SC.
R v Larkin [1943] 1 All ER 217, [1943] KB 174, CCA.
R v Maxwell [1988] 1 WLR 1265, CA; affd [1990] 1 All ER 801, [1990] 1 WLR 401, HL.
R v Maxwell (Nolan) [1994] Crim LR 848, CA.
R v McCormack [1969] 3 All ER 371, [1969] 2 QB 442, [1969] 3 WLR 175, CA.
R v Parrott (1913) 8 Cr App R 186, CA.
R v Porritt [1961] 3 All ER 463, [1961] 1 WLR 1372, CCA.
R v Shaw [2001] NIJB 269, NI CA.
Stevenson v US (1896) 162 US 313, US SC.
Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232, [2000] 1 WLR 1270, PC.
Xavier v The State (17 December 1998, unreported), PC.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Commonwealth v Vasquez (1989) 542 NE 2d 296, Mass CA.
Commonwealth v Woodward (1998) 694 NE 2d 1277, Mass SC.
DPP v Walker [1974] 1 WLR 1090, PC.
Fazal Mohammed v The State [1990] 2 AC 320, PC.
Gammage v R (1969) 122 CLR 444, Aus HC.
Hobbins v HM Advocate 1997 SLT 428, HC Just.
Hopkins v Reeves (1998) 118 S Ct 1895, US SC.
McBrearty v HM Advocate General 1999 SLT 1333, HC Just.
Nathan L, Re (2001) 776 A 2d 1277, NH SC.
R v Acott [1997] 1 All ER 706, [1997] 1 WLR 306, HL.
R v Adomako [1994] 3 All ER 79, [1995] 1 AC 171, [1994] 3 WLR 288, HL.
R v Bonnick (1977) 66 Cr App R 266, CA.
R v Cascoe [1970] 2 All ER 833, CA.
R v Clegg [1995] 1 All ER 334, [1995] 1 AC 482, [1995] 2 WLR 80, HL.
R v Dica [2004] EWCA Crim 1103, [2004] 3 All ER 593, [2004] QB 1257, [2004] 3 WLR 213.
R v Elfar (2000) 115 A Crim R 64, NSW CCA.
R v Griffiths [2005] EWCA Crim 237, [2005] All ER (D) 30 (Feb).
R v Hodgson [1973] 2 All ER 552, [1973] 1 QB 565, [1973] 2 WLR 570, CA.
R v Kachikwu (1968) 52 Cr App R 538, CA.
R v Kanaan (2005) 157 A Crim R 238, NSW CCA.
R v Kane (2001) 123 A Crim R 385, Vic SC.
R v Kearney (1988) 88 Cr App R 380, CA.
R v King (2004) 144 A Crim R 405, NSW CCA.
R v Lamb [1967] 2 All ER 1282, [1967] 2 QB 981, CA.
R v Le Doan (2001) 124 A Crim R 45, Vic SC.
R v McCready [1978] 3 All ER 967, [1978] 1 WLR 1376, CA.
R v McIntosh [1999] VSC 358, Vic SC.

R v Morrison [2003] EWCA Crim 1722, [2003] 1 WLR 1859.
R v Naylor (1910) 5 Cr App R 19, CCA.
R v Rehavi [1999] 2 Qd R 640, Qld CA.
R v Saunders [1987] 2 All ER 973, [1988] AC 148, [1987] 3 WLR 355, HL.
R v Warburton-Pitt (1990) 92 Cr App R 136, CA.
R v Willersdorf [2001] QCA 183, Qld CA.
R v Williams (1994) 99 Cr App R 163, CA.
R v Wilson (Clarence), R v Jenkins (Edward John) [1983] 3 All ER 448, [1984] AC 242, [1983] 3 WLR 686, HL.
Sooklal v The State [2000] 1 LRC 136, [1999] 1 WLR 2011, PC.
State of Nebraska v White (1993) 508 NW Rep 2d 554, Neb SC.
Sutton London Borough Council v S [2004] EWHC 2876 (Admin), [2005] ELR 276.
Templeton v HM Advocate 1961 JC 62, HC Just.
Varley v R (1976) 51 ALJR 243, Aus HC.
Whiteside v HM Advocate 1995 JC 201, HC Just.

Appeal

Graham James Coutts appealed with leave of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 18 April 2005 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) (Lord Woolf CJ, Cresswell and Simon JJ) on 21 January 2005 ([2005] EWCA Crim 52, [2005] 1 WLR 1605) dismissing his appeal against his conviction for murder in the Crown Court at Lewes on 4 February 2004 following a trial before Judge Brown and a jury. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

Edward Fitzgerald QC and Paul Taylor (instructed by Fisher Meredith) for the appellant.
John Kelsey-Fry QC and Mark Summers (instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service) for the Crown.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

19 July 2006. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, the appellant, Mr Coutts, was convicted of murder on an indictment charging him with that crime alone. Evidence was adduced at the trial which would have enabled a rational jury, if they accepted it, to convict him of manslaughter. But the trial judge, with the support of the prosecution and the consent of the defence, did not leave an alternative count of manslaughter to the jury. He directed the jury that they should convict of murder if satisfied that the appellant had committed that offence and, if not so satisfied, acquit. On his appeal to the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) the appellant contended that a manslaughter verdict should have been left to the jury for their consideration, irrespective of the parties' wishes, since there was evidence to support it. The Court of Appeal rejected that contention, and by leave of the House the appellant now challenges its decision. The narrow question raised by the appeal is whether, on the facts of this case, the trial judge should have left an alternative verdict of manslaughter to the jury. The broader question, of more general public importance, concerns the duty and discretion of trial judges to leave alternative verdicts of lesser-included offences to the jury where there is evidence which a rational jury could accept to support such a verdict but neither prosecution nor defence seek it.

THE FACTS AND THE PROCEEDINGS

[2] The facts of the case were summarised at some length by the Court of Appeal ([2005] EWCA Crim 52, [2005] 1 WLR 1605), and are the subject of a fairly detailed statement agreed between the parties for the purpose of this appeal. For present purposes a bare outline will suffice.

[3] The deceased (Jane Longhurst) lived with her male partner in Brighton. The appellant and his girlfriend Lisa Stephens lived in a flat in Hove. Lisa Stephens was a friend of the deceased, with whom the appellant became acquainted. On 14 March 2003 the deceased died at the appellant's flat. He stored her body first in his car, then in his shed, then in a commercial storage facility. On 19 April he took her body to an area of woodland some distance away and set fire to it. When found, the body was burning and unclothed. It had a ligature made from a pair of tights tied twice around the neck, with a knot on the right-hand side. The appellant was interviewed by the police before and after discovery of the body, but prevaricated for reasons which he later sought to explain and justify. Some weeks later he told a legal representative that he had not intended to kill the deceased or cause her serious harm, and that he had never caused harm to anybody in the past when using ligatures in sexual activities. He was charged with murder and in due course tried before Judge Brown and a jury in the Crown Court at Lewes.

[4] The expert pathologists called by the prosecution and the defence respectively at the trial were agreed that the cause of the deceased's death was compression of her neck by the ligature, causing her to be asphyxiated. But they disagreed on the most likely mechanism. The prosecution expert thought vascular strangulation or respiratory strangulation the most likely mechanisms, and considered vagal inhibition to be less likely. The defence expert thought vagal inhibition the most likely explanation. Both experts gave reasons for holding the opinions which they did, which were fully explored in evidence before the jury. The evidence suggested that death, if caused by vascular or respiratory strangulation, would have occurred within about 2–3 minutes; if by vagal inhibition, it would have occurred more quickly, possibly within 1–2 seconds.

[5] Much of the evidence at trial was directed to the appellant's sexual habits and propensities. One witness, called by the prosecution, had had a seven-year relationship with the appellant, during which he had, with her consent, placed his hand around her neck, before and during intercourse, and had used tights and knickers around her neck. Another witness had had a shorter and more recent relationship. The appellant had asked her to put her hands around his neck during intercourse, and he had put pressure on her windpipe, sometimes using a stocking tied round her neck, which he would pull from both sides. She had allowed him to do this because of the pleasure it gave him but she had never enjoyed it herself and he had always stopped when she asked. With his current partner, Lisa Stephens, he had on a few occasions indulged in what he called 'breath control play'. There was some evidence, which was denied, that the deceased had engaged in similar activity with a partner other than the appellant.

[6] The appellant said that he had been fascinated by women's necks for about 20 years, but that he had no interest in violence and his fetish did not extend to strangulation. He testified that on 14 March 2003 he and the deceased had had consensual asphyxial sex and her death had been a tragic accident. He had put his hand around her neck, and she had squeezed his hand to tighten his grip. He had then, with her consent, tied a pair of tights round her neck and tied a knot in them. At some point he had closed his eyes and released the tights. He did not know how the deceased had died.

[7] The prosecution led evidence to show that before and after 14 March 2003 the appellant had visited a number of pornographic websites, showing violence towards women. Reliance was also placed on certain websites and on repeated visits by the appellant to the storage facility where the body of the deceased had been stored to suggest that he had necrophiliac propensities.

[8] At the close of the evidence the trial judge very properly invited the submissions of counsel on whether he should direct the jury that a verdict of guilty of manslaughter was open to them. Prosecuting counsel submitted that it would be unfair to do so. He said:

> 'It is true that one could mount an argument in law to suggest that the defence account, even if accepted, might amount either to gross negligence, on the one hand, or, arguably, an unlawful and dangerous act on the other; and so there would be room, arguably, for an alternative verdict, even on the defence account, of manslaughter . . .'

But he submitted that the Crown had throughout put forward the case that this was a deliberate killing and nothing else. If that was not proved, the appellant was entitled to be acquitted. It would be wrong to put the case on any alternative basis. Counsel then representing the appellant agreed, although he later ventilated the possibility of a verdict of 'no intent manslaughter' as opposed to 'unlawful act or gross negligence manslaughter'. The judge asked counsel directly whether he was inviting him to put manslaughter on any basis to the jury, and counsel gave a provisional answer in the negative, while reserving the right to discuss the question with the appellant and raise the matter again. He did not raise the matter with the judge again, but did discuss it with the appellant. According to a statement of the appellant, seen and not controverted by counsel then acting, the latter asked him 'Do you want us to make representation, or do you want to roll the dice and be home with Lisa and the boys?' The appellant was advised that if convicted of manslaughter he would receive a sentence of as long as 15 years, and agreed that counsel should not ask the judge to leave manslaughter to the jury. Thus the judge directed the jury on the ingredients of murder in terms of which no complaint is made, and directed them to acquit if they thought that the death was or might have been an accident. No mention was made of manslaughter. The jury convicted the appellant of murder.

[9] In the Court of Appeal it was submitted for the appellant that a trial judge ought in the ordinary way and save in some exceptional cases to leave to the jury an alternative count of manslaughter which there is evidence to support, and that the trial judge in this case should have done so whether or not that was the course which counsel on both sides preferred. The Court of Appeal (Lord Woolf CJ, Cresswell and Simon JJ), having reviewed the leading authorities, rejected that submission ([2005] 1 WLR 1605 at [81]–[84]). The court did not recognise a risk that a jury in a case of this kind, faced with a stark choice between convicting of murder and acquitting altogether, might improperly convict. It would have been unfair and unjust to leave the alternative count 'for the very good reason that it involved a different and inconsistent case from that put forward by the prosecution'. To have introduced an alternative count would have made the jury's task far more complicated without enhancing the interests of justice.

THE PARTIES' SUBMISSIONS

[10] Mr Fitzgerald QC (who did not appear at the trial) submitted for the appellant that if in a trial for murder there is credible evidence which would, if accepted, support a verdict not of murder but of manslaughter, the trial judge ought in the ordinary way to leave manslaughter to the jury for their consideration, unless it would for any reason be unfair to do so. The judge should follow that course even though the defence has not advanced such a case or sought such a verdict, and even though the prosecution has not raised, or has rejected, that possibility. The jury, as the tribunal of fact and arbiter of guilt, ought in principle to be invited to consider all issues properly raised by the evidence. If in a horrific case such as this the jury are faced with a stark choice between convicting of murder and acquitting a defendant whose conduct might be thought not only repulsive but dangerous, and are not alerted to an intermediate verdict which might (depending on their assessment of the evidence) best fit the facts as they find them, the risk arises that the jury may convict of murder because, consciously or subconsciously, they are unwilling to acquit. If the trial judge fails to leave to the jury a verdict which is raised by credible evidence, that is an irregularity which will ordinarily render the verdict unsafe, unless in all the circumstances the Court of Appeal concludes that the jury would inevitably have convicted even if the alternative verdict had been left.

[11] Mr Kelsey-Fry QC for the Crown took issue with this approach. Accepting, as he had throughout, that the evidence, if accepted, supported a possible verdict of gross negligence manslaughter, he pointed out that neither the Crown nor the defence had asked that such a verdict be left to the jury and it was not a course the judge had favoured. The Crown had taken its stand that this was a deliberate, sadistic killing. The defence said that the death was an accident. The judge had given the jury a clear and accurate direction. If the jury thought that the death might have been an accident, they were to acquit. The integrity of jury trial depended on acceptance that a properly instructed jury would heed and follow the instructions of the judge. It must therefore be accepted that the jury, having deliberated, had found the full elements of murder to be established. There is no reason to suggest that the jury may, despite their oaths, have convicted improperly, and there is nothing to render the conviction unsafe. The Court of Appeal were right to dismiss the appeal for the reasons they gave.

DISCUSSION

[12] In any criminal prosecution for a serious offence there is an important public interest in the outcome (see R v Fairbanks [1986] 1 WLR 1202 at 1206). The public interest is that, following a fairly conducted trial, defendants should be convicted of offences which they are proved to have committed and should not be convicted of offences which they are not proved to have committed. The interests of justice are not served if a defendant who has committed a lesser offence is either convicted of a greater offence, exposing him to greater punishment than his crime deserves, or acquitted altogether, enabling him to escape the measure of punishment which his crime deserves. The objective must be that defendants are neither over-convicted nor under-convicted, nor acquitted when they have committed a lesser offence of the type charged. The human instrument relied on to achieve this objective in cases of serious crime is of course the jury. But to achieve it in some cases the jury must be alerted to the options open to it. This is not ultimately the responsibility of the prosecutor, important though his role as a minister of justice undoubtedly is. Nor is it the responsibility of defence counsel, whose proper professional concern is to serve what he and his client judge to be the best interests of the client. It is the ultimate responsibility of the trial judge (see Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232 at 237, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 at 1275; Hunter v R [2003] UKPC 69 at [27], [2004] 2 LRC 719 at [27]).

[13] Statutory rules (building in part on rules developed at common law) have been enacted to facilitate achievement of this important objective. Subsections (2) and (3) of s 6 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 provide:

> '(2) On an indictment for murder a person found not guilty of murder may be found guilty—(a) of manslaughter, or of causing grievous bodily harm with intent to do so; or (b) of any offence of which he may be found guilty under an enactment specifically so providing, or under section 4(2) of this Act [assisting offenders]; or (c) of an attempt to commit murder, or of an attempt to commit any other offence of which he might be found guilty; but may not be found guilty of any offence not included above.
>
> (3) Where, on a person's trial on indictment for any offence except treason or murder, the jury find him not guilty of the offence specifically charged in the indictment, but the allegations in the indictment amount to or include (expressly or by implication) an allegation of another offence falling within the jurisdiction of the court of trial, the jury may find him guilty of that other offence or of an offence of which he could be found guilty on an indictment specifically charging that other offence.'

Thus, to take familiar examples, a defendant accused of murder may be convicted of manslaughter if the evidence shows that he was or may have been provoked, and a defendant accused of wounding with intent may be convicted of unlawful wounding if the evidence establishes the wounding but leaves room for doubt about the intent.

[14] These statutory rules are reinforced by two principles developed in the cases. The first of these principles, relating to manslaughter on grounds of provocation in the context of a count of murder, was expressed by Lord Reading CJ in the Court of Criminal Appeal in R v Hopper [1915] 2 KB 431 at 435:

> 'We do not assent to the suggestion that as the defence throughout the trial was accident, the judge was justified in not putting the question as to manslaughter. Whatever the line of defence adopted by counsel at the trial of a prisoner, we are of opinion that it is for the judge to put such questions as appear to him properly to arise upon the evidence even although counsel may not have raised some question himself. In this case it may be that the difficulty of presenting the alternative defences of accident and manslaughter may have actuated counsel in saying very little about manslaughter, but if we come to the conclusion, as we do, that there was some evidence—we say no more than that—upon which a question ought to have been left to the jury as to the crime being manslaughter only, we think that this verdict of murder cannot stand.'

This passage was quoted with approval by Viscount Simon LC giving the unanimous opinion of the House in Mancini v DPP [1941] 3 All ER 272 at 276, [1942] AC 1 at 7–8. It was again cited with approval by Lord Tucker, giving the reasons of the Privy Council in Bullard v R [1957] AC 635 at 642, [1957] 3 WLR 656 at 659–660, who held that it had—

> 'long been settled law that if on the evidence, whether of the prosecution or of the defence, there is any evidence of provocation fit to be left to a jury, and whether or not this issue has been specifically raised at the trial by counsel for the defence and whether or not the accused has said in terms that he was provoked, it is the duty of the judge, after a proper direction, to leave it open to the jury to return a verdict of manslaughter if they are not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the killing was unprovoked.'

Lord Tucker went on to say (at 644 and 661 respectively):

> 'Every man on trial for murder has the right to have the issue of manslaughter left to the jury if there is any evidence upon which such a verdict can be given. To deprive him of this right must of necessity constitute a grave miscarriage of justice and it is idle to speculate what verdict the jury would have reached.'

Lord Tucker's ruling first quoted above was itself quoted with approval by the Court of Criminal Appeal in R v Porritt [1961] 3 All ER 463 at 468, [1961] 1 WLR 1372 at 1376–1377. It has since been applied in many cases. But the fullest statement of the principle is that given by Lord Clyde on behalf of the Privy Council in Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232 at 237, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 at 1275, when, in a case where there was evidence throwing doubt on the defendant's capacity to form the intent necessary for murder, he said:

> 'The function and responsibility of the judge is greater and more onerous than the function and the responsibility of the counsel appearing for the prosecution and for the defence in a criminal trial. In particular, counsel for a defendant may choose to present his case to the jury in the way which he considers best serves the interest of his client. The judge is required to put to the jury for their consideration, in a fair and balanced manner, the respective contentions which have been presented. But his responsibility does not end there. It is his responsibility not only to see that the trial is conducted with all due regard to the principle of fairness, but to place before the jury all the possible conclusions which may be open to them on the evidence which has been presented in the trial, whether or not they have all been canvassed by either of the parties in their submissions. It is the duty of the judge to secure that the overall interests of justice are served in the resolution of the matter and that the jury is enabled to reach a sound conclusion on the facts in light of a complete understanding of the law applicable to them. If the evidence is wholly incredible, or so tenuous or uncertain that no reasonable jury could reasonably accept it, then of course the judge is entitled to put it aside. The threshold of credibility in this context is, as was recognised in Xavier v The State (17 December 1998, unreported), a low one and, as was also recognised in that case, it would only cause unnecessary confusion to leave to the jury a possibility which can be seen beyond reasonable doubt to be without substance. But if there is evidence on which a jury could reasonably come to a particular conclusion then there can be few circumstances, if any, in which the judge has no duty to put the possibility before the jury. For tactical reasons, counsel for a defendant may not wish to enlarge upon, or even to mention, a possible conclusion which the jury would be entitled, on the evidence, to reach in the fear that what he might see as a compromise conclusion would detract from a more stark choice between a conviction on a serious charge and an acquittal. But if there is evidence to support such a compromise verdict it is the duty of the judge to explain it to the jury and leave the choice to them. In Xavier v The State the defence at trial was one of alibi. But it was observed by Lord Lloyd of Berwick in that case that, "If accident was open on the evidence, then the judge ought to have left the jury with the alternative of manslaughter". In the present case the earlier statements together with their qualifications amply justified a conclusion of manslaughter and that alternative should have been left to the jury.'

This ruling has been applied by the Privy Council in Hunter v R [2004] 2 LRC 719 and by the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland in R v Shaw [2001] NIJB 269. The judge's duty to leave a possible manslaughter defence arising on the evidence to the jury, even though such defence has not been advanced or has been expressly disavowed at the trial, is clear (see, for example, R v Cox [1995] 2 Cr App R 513 at 516–517; R v Dhillon [1997] 2 Cr App R 104 at 114).

[15] The second principle is closely allied with the first (and is not, as counsel for the appellant insisted, engaged on the facts of this case). It is that ordinarily, and subject to limited exceptions, a trial judge should leave to the jury the possibility of convicting of lesser-included offences, that is, lesser offences within s 6(3) of the 1967 Act but not all the ingredients of the offence charged. In R v McCormack [1969] 3 All ER 371, [1969] 2 QB 442 a defendant accused of unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under the age of 16 denied that charge but admitted in evidence an act which was in law an indecent assault. The judge left that alternative to the jury, holding that he had no discretion to do otherwise, and the defendant was convicted of the lesser offence. His argument that the judge should not have left that alternative to the jury was rejected on appeal, although a discretion not to do so was held to exist. Fenton Atkinson LJ, giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal (which also included Melford Stevenson and James JJ), said ([1969] 3 All ER 371 at 373–374, [1969] 2 QB 442 at 445–446):

'It is said that the prosecution had not specifically run indecent assault as a possible verdict for the jury to consider, and it is said, therefore, that the learned deputy chairman had a discretion whether or not to leave that matter to the jury, and there was some discussion about that and counsel for the Crown submitted to the deputy chairman that it was his duty to put all the alternatives. The deputy chairman said: "I would like to know whether I have a discretion not to do it. Frankly, I would exercise that discretion". In fact, he went on to decide that he had no discretion in the matter, he left the alternative of indecent assault to the jury and the jury convicted. Indeed, on our view as to what constitutes an indecent assault on a girl under 16, and in face of the defendant's own evidence, there was no possible answer to such a lesser charge.

The view this court has formed is that the learned deputy chairman did have a discretion in the matter. Cases vary so infinitely that one can well envisage a case where the possibility of conviction of some lesser offence has been completely ignored by both prosecution and defence—it may be that the accused has never had occasion to deal with the matter, has lost a chance of giving some evidence himself about it or calling some evidence to cover or guard against the possibility of conviction of that lesser offence—and in such a case, where there might well be prejudice to an accused, it seems to this court there must be a discretion in the trial judge whether or not to leave the lesser offence to the jury.

But that was not the situation here, and on the facts of this case we think plainly it would have been a wrong exercise of discretion not to leave this question of indecent assault to the jury, because this was a case where the defendant himself had given evidence and had said on oath "True I did not have intercourse, but I did do that which amounts to an indecent assault". In view of that perfectly plain evidence which he had given, we think the only right course for the learned deputy chairman to take was to do what he did and to leave that matter to the jury.'

[16] In R v Fairbanks [1986] 1 WLR 1202 the question before the Court of Appeal was whether, on an indictment charging a single count of causing death by reckless driving, an alternative of driving without due care and attention should have been left to the jury. Giving the reserved judgment of the court, Mustill LJ (sitting with Hodgson and Wood JJ) cited earlier authority on the leaving of lesser counts to the jury, including (at 1205) R v Parrott (1913) 8 Cr App R 186 where Phillimore J had said (at 193):

'There may be cases where, in the interests of the prisoner, a judge ought to do so; there are certainly many cases where the interests of justice are not met unless it is pointed out to the jury that they may convict of a lesser offence, or, thinking it a case of "neck or nothing", they may acquit altogether.'

Mustill LJ continued ([1986] 1 WLR at 1205–1206):

'These cases bear out the conclusion, which we should in any event have reached, that the judge is obliged to leave the lesser alternative only if this is necessary in the interests of justice. Such interests will never be served in a situation where the lesser verdict simply does not arise on the way in which the case had been presented to the court: for example if the defence has never sought to deny that the full offence charged has been committed, but challenges that it was committed by the defendant. Again there may be instances where there was at one stage a question which would, if pursued, have left open the possibility of a lesser verdict, but which, in the light of the way the trial has developed, has simply ceased to be a live issue. In these and other situations it would only be harmful to confuse the jury by advising them of the possibility of a verdict which could make no sense. a

We can also envisage cases where the principal offence is so grave and the alternative so trifling, that the judge thinks it best not to distract the jury by forcing them to consider something which is remote from the real point of the case: and this may be so particularly where there are already a series of realistic alternatives which call for careful handling by judge and jury, and b where the possibility of conviction for a trivial offence would be an unnecessary further complication.

On the other hand the interests of justice will sometimes demand that the lesser alternatives are left to the jury. It must be remembered that justice serves the interests of the public as well as those of the defendant, and if the c evidence is such that he ought at least to be convicted of the lesser offence, it would be wrong for him to be acquitted altogether merely because the jury cannot be sure that he was guilty of the greater.'

The conviction was quashed. d

[17] The Court of Appeal (Mustill LJ, Farquharson and Tucker JJ) returned to this issue in R v Maxwell [1988] 1 WLR 1265. In that case the defendant had been charged with and convicted of robbery. He had denied that charge but had expressed willingness to plead guilty to burglary, a charge which the prosecution declined to prefer (and which was not a lesser-included offence). The judge e rejected a submission by counsel for the defendant that the lesser offence of theft should be left to the jury. The jury, during their deliberations, asked whether there was a lesser charge than robbery of which the defendant could be convicted, having burglary in mind. The judge answered, correctly, that burglary was not an alternative and, incorrectly, that there was no available lesser charge: the defendant could in law have been convicted of theft. The issue on appeal was f whether this lesser count should have been left. The court adhered to its general observations in R v Fairbanks [1986] 1 WLR 1202, observing (at 1270) that while the right course would vary from case to case 'the judge should always use his powers to ensure, so far as practicable, that the issues left to the jury fairly reflect the issues which arise on the evidence'. That precept had not been observed. Considering what consequences should flow from that conclusion, the court g ruled (at 1270):

'To interfere with the verdict would require us to identify solid grounds for suspecting that the members of the jury had foresworn their oaths by h deliberately returning a verdict of guilty when they were not sure of it, simply to avoid an unwanted outcome.'

Since no such grounds were established, the appeal was dismissed. On further appeal to the House of Lords ([1990] 1 All ER 801, [1990] 1 WLR 401), the Court j of Appeal's decision in R v Fairbanks was approved, as was the court's ruling on the judge's use of his powers (at 1270, quoted above), although the House shared the view of the trial judge that theft, as compared with robbery, had been too trifling an offence to leave to the jury. But counsel's criticism of the passage of the court's ruling (at 1270, quoted above) was accepted. Lord Ackner, speaking for the House, said ([1990] 1 All ER 801 at 807, [1990] 1 WLR 401 at 408):

'What is required in any particular case where the judge fails to leave an alternative offence to the jury, is that the court, before interfering with the verdict, must be satisfied that the jury may have convicted out of a reluctance to see the defendant get clean away with what, on any view, was disgraceful conduct.'

[18] R v Maxwell was applied by the Court of Appeal in R v Maxwell (Nolan) [1994] Crim LR 848. The judgment of the court was delivered by Hobhouse LJ, sitting with Garland and Curtis JJ, and at pp 5–6 of the transcript he said:

'We consider that, in a case such as this, where there is a factual situation which requires a jury to consider the extent of the joint enterprise and whether all the ingredients of the offence have been proved against one of the defendants, and the fact that the evidence was capable of showing that different offences may have been committed by him, the jury should have that opportunity to consider the alternatives. This is not a case, such as often occurs, where there is a single main clear count charging an offence, and the alternatives to it are not viable alternatives. This is a case where the alternatives were, on the evidence before the jury, clearly viable as regards the appellant . . .

The present case undoubtedly involved disgraceful conduct on the part of this appellant. He had been identified as one of the men in the minicab. It was clear and undisputed on the evidence that he had taken part in a joint attack on the minicab driver in the early hours of the morning and had, on any view, inflicted some injuries upon him. Indeed, on one view, he was the person who had started the actual violence. It was disgraceful conduct, and it would cause outrage if the appellant, having been identified as one of the men involved, were to "get clean away". If the jury were to have a proper opportunity to consider all the alternatives which were open to them in respect of the appellant, they should have had further directions from the judge upon the alternative verdicts that were open to them. The judge laid the ground in his directions about what was involved in a joint enterprise, and the different views that might be taken of how far the joint enterprise went. He referred to the facts, which indicated the increased gravity of the later parts of the incident, and the role of Oakley in aggravating the assault, as well as being involved in the robbery. But he did not then go on to direct the jury that there were alternative verdicts which were open to them.

In our judgment, that did amount to a material irregularity in the conduct of this trial, and makes the appellant's conviction unsafe.'

[19] R v Maxwell is not an easy authority, for although, as already noticed, the defendant failed both in the Court of Appeal ([1988] 1 WLR 1265) and in the House of Lords ([1990] 1 All ER 801), he did so on different grounds, neither of which is unproblematical. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal because the jury were not shown to have returned an improper verdict. But given the restraint on disclosure of jury deliberations this is ordinarily very hard to show. Mr Kelsey-Fry was disposed to agree that the only basis for drawing an inference that the jury had returned an improper verdict would ordinarily be a question asked by the jury. Yet in R v Maxwell the jury did ask such a question and the inference was not drawn. The House dismissed the appeal because the lesser alternative offence was relatively trifling. Theft is, of course, a much less serious offence than robbery, lacking the aggravating feature of violence. But it carried a maximum sentence of ten years' imprisonment, and the discrepancy in terms of gravity between the offence charged and the lesser alternative was scarcely greater than in R v Fairbanks [1986] 1 WLR 1202, where the defendant's appeal succeeded.

[20] In Gilbert v R (2000) 170 ALR 88 the defendant was charged with murder and the trial judge directed the jury, incorrectly under the law as later laid down, that manslaughter was not an alternative verdict. The jury, correctly directed on the ingredients of murder, convicted. The issue in the High Court of Australia was whether a substantial miscarriage of justice had occurred. Mr Kelsey-Fry relied on strong statements by McHugh and Hayne JJ, very much in line with his own submission, that the verdict of a properly directed jury should be respected (see in particular [30]–[31] and [52]). But these were dissenting judgments. Gleeson CJ and Gummow J (at [6]) recognised the difficulty of knowing whether a misdirection is advantageous to one party or the other and held (at [13]) that while it could, as a general rule, be assumed that juries understand and follow judicial directions, it need not be assumed that juries were unaffected by matters of possible prejudice when making their decisions. An appellate court should not (see [16]) assume that juries adopted a mechanistic approach to the task of fact-finding, oblivious of the consequences of their conclusion. Callinan J, agreeing, recognised (at [96]) that a jury room might not be a place of undeviating intellectual and logical rigour, and concluded (at [101]):

> 'The appellant was entitled to a trial at which directions according to law were given. It is contrary to human experience that in situations in which a choice of decisions may be made, what is chosen will be unaffected by the variety of the choices offered, particularly when, as here, a particular choice was not the only or inevitable choice.'

[21] In Australia, as here, the trial judge's duty to direct the jury on alternative verdicts which there is evidence to support is not removed by the decisions of trial counsel. In Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107 at 117–118 Barwick CJ said:

> 'Whatever course counsel may see fit to take, no doubt bona fide but for tactical reasons in what he considers the best interest of his client, the trial judge must be astute to secure for the accused a fair trial according to law. This involves, in my opinion, an adequate direction both as to the law and the possible use of the relevant facts upon any matter upon which the jury could in the circumstances of the case upon the material before them find or base a verdict in whole or in part . . .
>
> Here, counsel for the defence did not merely not rely on the matters now sought to be raised; he abandoned them and expressly confined the defence to the matters he did raise. However, in my opinion, this course did not relieve the trial judge of the duty to put to the jury with adequate assistance any matters on which the jury, upon the evidence, could find for the accused.'

[22] It appears that the approach of the majority of the High Court of Australia in Gilbert v R reflects the principle generally applied in the United States (see Stevenson v US (1896) 162 US 313 at 323, Berra v US (1956) 351 US 131 at 134, Keeble v US (1973) 412 US 205 at 212–213). In the last of these authorities Brennan J, giving the opinion of the Supreme Court, said:

> 'Moreover, it is no answer to petitioner's demand for a jury instruction on a lesser offense to argue that a defendant may be better off without such an instruction. True, if the prosecution has not established beyond a reasonable doubt every element of the offense charged, and if no lesser offense instruction is offered, the jury must, as a theoretical matter, return a verdict of acquittal. But a defendant is entitled to a lesser offense instruction—in this context or any other—precisely because he should not be exposed to the substantial risk that the jury's practice will diverge from theory. Where one of the elements of the offense charged remains in doubt, but the defendant is plainly guilty of some offense, the jury is likely to resolve its doubts in favor of conviction. In the case before us, for example, an intent to commit serious bodily injury is a necessary element of the crime with which petitioner was charged, but not of the crime of simple assault. Since the nature of petitioner's intent was very much in dispute at trial, the jury could rationally have convicted him of simple assault if that option had been presented. But the jury was presented with only two options: convicting the defendant of assault with intent to commit great bodily injury, or acquitting him outright. We cannot say that the availability of a third option—convicting the defendant of simple assault—could not have resulted in a different verdict.'

But the approach to the decisions of trial counsel appears to differ. While the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure provide that '[t]he defendant may be found guilty of an offense necessarily included in the offense charged . . .' this has been universally interpreted as granting a defendant a right to a requested lesser-included offence instruction if the evidence warrants it (see Beck v Alabama (1980) 447 US 625 at 635, n 11). In the Supreme Court of Canada, the failure of the trial judge to direct the jury on the possibility of a manslaughter conviction has been held to be, following the language of Lord Tucker in Bullard v R [1957] AC 635 at 644, [1957] 3 WLR 656 at 661, a grave miscarriage of justice (see R v Jackson [1993] 4 SCR 573 at 593).

[23] The public interest in the administration of justice is, in my opinion, best served if in any trial on indictment the trial judge leaves to the jury, subject to any appropriate caution or warning, but irrespective of the wishes of trial counsel, any obvious alternative offence which there is evidence to support. I would not extend the rule to summary proceedings since, for all their potential importance to individuals, they do not engage the public interest to the same degree. I would also confine the rule to alternative verdicts obviously raised by the evidence: by that I refer to alternatives which should suggest themselves to the mind of any ordinarily knowledgeable and alert criminal judge, excluding alternatives which ingenious counsel may identify through diligent research after the trial. Application of this rule may in some cases benefit the defendant, protecting him against an excessive conviction. In other cases it may benefit the public, by providing for the conviction of a lawbreaker who deserves punishment.

A defendant may, quite reasonably from his point of view, choose to roll the dice. But the interests of society should not depend on such a contingency. a [24] It is of course fundamental that the duty to leave lesser verdicts to the jury should not be exercised so as to infringe a defendant's right to a fair trial. This might be so if it were shown that decisions were made at trial which would not have been made had the possibility of such a verdict been envisaged. But no such infringement has ordinarily been found where there is evidence of provocation b not relied on by the defence, nor will it ordinarily be unfair to leave an alternative where a defendant who, resisting conviction of a more serious offence, succeeds in throwing doubt on an ingredient of that offence and is as a result convicted of a lesser offence lacking that ingredient. There may be unfairness if the jury first learns of the alternative from the judge's summing-up, when counsel have not had the opportunity to address it in their closing speeches. But that risk is met if c the proposed direction is indicated to counsel at some stage before they make their closing speeches. They can continue to discount the alternative in their closing speeches, but they can address the jury with knowledge of what the judge will direct. Had this course been followed in the present case there would have been no unfairness to the appellant, and while taking a contrary view the Court d of Appeal did not identify the unfairness which it held would arise. It is not unfair to deprive a defendant, timeously alerted to the possibility, of what may be an adventitious acquittal.

[25] The Court of Appeal rightly recognised the high sense of public duty which juries customarily bring to their task. I would not wish to belittle that in any way. But one does not belittle it to decline (as the High Court of Australia e has done) to attribute to juries an adherence to principle and an obliviousness to consequences which is scarcely attainable.

[26] Nor, with respect, is it an objection that the jury's task would have been more complicated had a manslaughter direction been given. Compared with many directions given to juries, a manslaughter direction in this case would not f have been complicated. But even if it would, that cannot be relied on as a reason for not leaving to the jury a verdict which they should on the facts have considered. If juries are to continue to command the respect of the public, they must be trusted to understand the issues raised even by a case of some complexity. For reasons already given, the wishes of counsel cannot override the judge's duty. g

[27] I am of opinion that the judge should have left a manslaughter verdict to the jury. His failure to do so, although fully understandable in the circumstances, was a material irregularity. While the murder count against the appellant was clearly a strong one, no appellate court can be sure that a jury, fully directed, would not have convicted of manslaughter. For these reasons, and those given h by my noble and learned friends Lord Hutton, Lord Rodger of Earlsferry and Lord Mance, with which I agree, I would accordingly allow the appeal. I would remit the matter to the Court of Appeal and invite that court to quash the conviction. It may also deal with any application for a retrial which may be made, the appellant remaining in custody meanwhile.

j

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[28] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Lord Hutton, Lord Rodger of Earlsferry and Lord Mance. For the reasons they give, with which I agree, I too would allow this appeal.

LORD HUTTON.

[29] My Lords, the appellant in this case was convicted of the murder of Jane Longhurst. At his trial his defence was that she had died by accident when he and she had been engaged in consensual sexual activity. The only issue left to the jury was whether he was guilty of murder. The question which arises on this appeal to the House is whether the issue of manslaughter should have been left to the jury as an alternative verdict which they could return under s 6(2) of the Criminal Law Act 1967, the appellant's contention that this issue should have been left having been rejected by the Court of Appeal ([2005] EWCA Crim 52, [2005] 1 WLR 1605).

[30] An outline of the facts of the case are set out in the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill and in order to state my opinion on the point before the House it is relevant to refer to two particular parts of the evidence at the trial. One matter which was established was that in the past when the appellant engaged in sexual activity with a female partner by reason of his fetish with women's necks he would frequently restrict her breathing with her consent, telling her that it would heighten her feelings. On occasions he would put tights round her neck which he would pull tight from both sides. Two women who had had a relationship with the appellant, one between 1989 and 1996 and the other between 1996 and 1997, gave evidence of this consensual asphyxial sex with him. One of them said that she often had to tell the appellant to stop putting pressure on her neck and he always stopped when asked, and there was no suggestion that he continued putting pressure on the neck of the other woman if she asked him to stop.

[31] The second part of the evidence to which I refer is the evidence of the forensic pathologist, Dr Richard Shepherd, called for the defence, as to the danger of pressure being put on the neck. In the course of his examination-in-chief he said:

> 'Q. So it rather looks as if pressure to the neck is a pretty dangerous business?
>
> A. It—certainly from my practice I know and from reports recorded in the forensic literature, there is no safe way to squeeze someone's neck. It always carries with it the risk of this stimulating these receptors and producing this vagal response.
>
> Q. We can all understand that if you are choking someone, in the sense that you are restricting either the blood flow or the airflow in either of the first two ways, the vascular or the respiratory are potential ways of strangling someone but it is going to take time?
>
> A. Yes.
>
> Q. And there may be some sort of struggle or the opportunity to say: "I can't breathe"?
>
> A. Yes.
>
> Q. What about the vagal inhibition method, how does that affect that scenario?
>
> A. If it kicks in at the level that we have mentioned, where there is a severe effect on the heart, causing it to slow right down or causing it to beat abnormally or causing it to stop, there is no prior warning to that; that will occur out of the blue.
>
> Q. And is the situation therefore that someone may literally drop dead?

A. They may literally drop dead with the pressure being applied to their neck, and there are recorded cases of that occurring within the forensic literature.' a

In the course of his cross-examination he said:

'Q. Doctor, I want to ask you about something else, please, and that is blood, not bruising blood, but blood in the way I am about to describe. If I have understood you correctly, vagal inhibition, stimulating the bearer (?) receptors, can make you drop dead? b

A. Yes.

Q. Presumably if what you were saying earlier was right, that would mean anywhere on the neck that might happen? c

A. Absolutely. Pressure anywhere on the neck is an extremely dangerous action. Extremely dangerous action.'

[32] Therefore if one of the appellant's sexual partners in the years between 1989 and 1997 had died as a result of his putting tights round her neck and pulling them tight and there had been no additional evidence, as there was at his trial, of his visits to pornographic websites showing extreme violence towards women under headings such as 'asphyxiation and strangulation' and his visits to the place where he had stored the body of the deceased, which suggested that he had necrophiliac propensities, I consider it to be clear that if he had been charged with murder the defence could have advanced a case of some force that he had not intended to kill or cause grievous bodily harm and was, at most, guilty of manslaughter. d e

[33] At the close of the evidence prosecuting counsel, Mr Kelsey-Fry QC, raised the issue of manslaughter: f

'Mr Kelsey-Fry: May I raise what perhaps might be the first and most important topic. Ordinarily, of course, in a charge of murder there is an alternative verdict available.

Judge Brown: Yes.

Mr Kelsey-Fry: The way the Crown have put the case, from start to finish, is that this was a deliberate killing, and it is a contest between the Crown's allegation of a deliberate killing on the one hand, and accident on the other. It is true that one could mount an argument in law to suggest that the defence account, even if accepted, might amount either to gross negligence, on the one hand, or, arguably, an unlawful and dangerous act on the other; and so there would be room, arguably, for an alternative verdict, even on the defence account, of manslaughter. The Crown's view is that that would be quite unfair and quite wrong in this case. Having set the case out as a contest between deliberate killing and the defence version, if we failed to prove the deliberate killing, in our submission the defendant is entitled to a full acquittal.' g h j

[34] A discussion then took place between the judge and prosecution and defence counsel, and the judge put the specific question to defence counsel whether he invited him to put manslaughter on any basis to the jury. Counsel replied that his provisional answer was that he did not, but that he had not, as yet, had the opportunity to discuss the matter in detail with the appellant. He asked permission, if the position changed, to raise the matter with the judge the next morning, which permission the judge granted. Defence counsel made no reference to the matter the next day and therefore with the agreement of both counsel the judge did not leave manslaughter to the jury.

[35] In a statement which the appellant made for the purposes of his appeal to the Court of Appeal he said (and defence counsel accepts that it correctly represents the gist of his discussion with the appellant) that after the discussion between the judge and counsel, defence counsel said to him: 'Do you want us to make representation, or do you want to roll the dice and be home with Lisa and the boys?' The appellant also said that he was advised that he would receive a sentence as long as 15 years on a conviction for manslaughter. Therefore it is apparent that rather than accept the strong probability of a conviction for manslaughter with a lengthy sentence, the appellant decided that he would bank on an acquittal on the count of murder with consequent release, although that course involved running the risk of a conviction for murder.

[36] It is clear that there was evidence at the trial which enabled the Crown to advance a strong case that the appellant deliberately and intentionally killed Jane Longhurst to satisfy his fantasies of sexual violence. But I also consider that there were parts of the evidence to which I have referred above which raised the reasonable possibility that he lacked the necessary intent either to kill or to cause grievous bodily harm and that he was guilty of manslaughter. When he raised the matter with the judge, prosecuting counsel accepted that the appellant's account of what had happened might amount either to manslaughter by gross negligence or, 'arguably', manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act. In the absence of a finding of an intent to kill or cause grievous bodily harm, I consider that on the facts of this case the death would come more appropriately within the category of manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act than within the category of death by gross negligence. Quite apart from the evidence of Dr Shepherd, ordinary common sense indicates that putting tights round a woman's neck and pulling them tight is a dangerous act which creates a realistic risk of serious harm.

[37] The appellant's actions in doing so were unlawful because of the danger involved and because consent does not prevent such a dangerous act in the course of sex being unlawful. In R v Emmett [1999] EWCA Crim 1710 (which the judge very properly drew to the attention of counsel in his discussion with them) the appellant in the course of sexual activity with his female partner and with her consent covered her head with a plastic bag which he tied at her neck with a ligature and which he then tightened to her point of endurance. She suffered distress because of loss of oxygen and was found by a doctor to have suffered subconjunctival haemorrhages in both eyes and some petechial bruising around the neck. The appellant was charged with assault occasioning actual bodily harm. The Crown Court judge ruled that the defence of consent was not available to the appellant and he appealed to the Court of Appeal against this ruling. In dismissing the appeal the court (constituted by Rose LJ and Wright and Kay JJ) stated:

> 'Accordingly, whether the line beyond which consent becomes immaterial is drawn at the point suggested by Lord Jauncey and Lord Lowry [in R v Brown [1993] 2 All ER 75, [1994] 1 AC 212], the point at which common assault becomes assault occasioning actual bodily harm, or at some higher level, where the evidence looked at objectively reveals a realistic risk of a more than transient or trivial injury, it is plain, in our judgment, that the activities [engaged] in by this appellant and his partner went well beyond that line. The learned judge, in giving his ruling said:

> "In this case, the degree of actual and potential harm was such and also the degree of unpredictability as to injury was such as to make it a proper cause [for] the criminal law to intervene. This was not tattooing, it was not something which absented pain or dangerousness and the agreed medical evidence is in each case, certainly on the first occasion, there was a very considerable degree of danger to life; on the second, there was a degree of injury to the body."
>
> With that conclusion, this court entirely agrees.'

[38] In DPP v Newbury [1976] 2 All ER 365 at 367, [1977] AC 500 at 506–507 Lord Salmon in a speech with which all the other members of the House agreed stated:

> 'The direction which [the trial judge] gave is completely in accordance with established law, which, possibly with one exception to which I shall presently refer, has never been challenged. In R v Larkin [1943] 1 All ER 217 at 219, Humphreys J said:
>
> "Where the act which a person is engaged in performing is unlawful, then if at the same time it is a dangerous act, that is, an act which is likely to injure another person, and quite inadvertently he causes the death of that other person by that act, then he is guilty of manslaughter."

I agree entirely with Lawton LJ that that is an admirably clear statement of the law which has been applied many times. It makes it plain (a) that an accused is guilty of manslaughter if it is proved that he intentionally did an act which was unlawful and dangerous and that that act inadvertently caused death and (b) that it is unnecessary to prove that the accused knew that the act was unlawful or dangerous. This is one of the reasons why cases of manslaughter vary so infinitely in their gravity. They may amount to little more than pure inadvertence and sometimes to little less than murder.

I am sure that in R v Church [1965] 2 All ER 72, [1966] 1 QB 59 Edmund Davies J, in giving the judgment of the court, did not intend to differ from or qualify anything which had been said in R v Larkin. Indeed he was restating the principle laid down in that case by illustrating the sense in which the word "dangerous" should be understood. Edmund Davies J said ([1965] 2 All ER 72 at 76, [1966] 1 QB 59 at 70):

> "For such a verdict [guilty of manslaughter] inexorably to follow, the unlawful act must be such as all sober and reasonable people would inevitably recognise must subject the other person to, at least, the risk of some harm resulting therefrom, albeit not serious harm."

a The test is still the objective test. In judging whether the act was dangerous the test is not did the accused recognise that it was dangerous but would all sober and reasonable people recognise its danger.'

In A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1994) [1997] 3 All ER 936 at 956–957, [1998] AC 245 at 270–271 Lord Salmon's statement of the law was approved and followed by b Lord Hope of Craighead. Therefore, I consider that there was a viable defence case that the death of Jane Longhurst constituted manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act.

[39] There is a long line of authority that the trial judge is bound to put to the jury such questions as appear to him properly to arise on the evidence even though defence counsel may not have raised a particular issue himself. Two of c those cases are R v Hopper [1915] 2 KB 431 and Mancini v DPP [1941] 3 All ER 272, [1942] AC 1. In R v Hopper Lord Reading CJ said (at 435):

'Whatever the line of defence adopted by counsel at the trial of a prisoner, we are of opinion that it is for the judge to put such questions as appear to d him properly to arise upon the evidence although counsel may not have raised some question himself.'

In Mancini v DPP Viscount Simon LC said ([1941] 3 All ER 272 at 276, [1942] AC 1 at 7):

e

'The fact that a defending counsel does not stress an alternative case before the jury (which he may well feel it difficult to do without prejudicing the main defence) does not relieve the judge from the duty of directing the jury to consider the alternative, if there is material before the jury which would f justify a direction that they should consider it.'

[40] This principle was applied by the Privy Council in Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232 at 237, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 at 1275 and in delivering the judgment of the Board the rationale of the principle was fully stated by Lord Clyde:

g 'The function and responsibility of the judge is greater and more onerous than the function and the responsibility of the counsel appearing for the prosecution and for the defence in a criminal trial. In particular, counsel for a defendant may choose to present his case to the jury in the way which he considers best serves the interest of his client. The judge is required to put h to the jury for their consideration, in a fair and balanced manner, the respective contentions which have been presented. But his responsibility does not end there. It is his responsibility not only to see that the trial is conducted with all due regard to the principle of fairness, but to place before the jury all the possible conclusions which may be open to them on the evidence which has been presented in the trial, whether or not they have all j been canvassed by either of the parties in their submissions. It is the duty of the judge to secure that the overall interests of justice are served in the resolution of the matter and that the jury is enabled to reach a sound conclusion on the facts in light of a complete understanding of the law applicable to them . . . if there is evidence on which a jury could reasonably come to a particular conclusion then there can be few circumstances, if any, in which the judge has no duty to put the possibility before the jury. For tactical reasons, counsel for a defendant may not wish to enlarge upon, or even to mention, a possible conclusion which the jury would be entitled, on the evidence, to reach, in the fear that what he might see as a compromise conclusion would detract from a more stark choice between a conviction on a serious charge and an acquittal. But if there is evidence to support such a compromise verdict it is the duty of the judge to explain it to the jury and leave the choice to them.'

Lord Clyde's judgment was applied by the Privy Council in Hunter v R [2003] UKPC 69, [2004] 2 LRC 719 and by the Court of Appeal of Northern Ireland in R v Shaw [2001] NIJB 269.

[41] In their judgment ([2005] 1 WLR 1605) the Court of Appeal in the present case referred to two features which they considered distinguished the present case from the authorities relied on by Mr Fitzgerald QC for the appellant (who did not appear at the trial). At [58] they said:

'It is to be noted that there are two critical features of this case, which distinguish it from the previous cases. First, as we have seen, it is the fact that both counsel for the prosecution and the defence thought that it would not be in the interests of the fair trial of the defendant, if the offence of manslaughter was left to the jury. The second distinction is that the only basis upon which the jury could convict the appellant of manslaughter, was factually wholly different from the case that the prosecution was advancing in order to obtain a conviction of murder. It was not, for example, a case where it would be possible for the jury to come to the conclusion that the appellant was not guilty of murder but guilty of manslaughter on the case for the prosecution.'

They further said (at [61]):

'In addition, at that stage of the case all the evidence, on behalf of both the prosecution and the defence, had been given so it could well have caused unfairness to the appellant to change fundamentally the nature of the case against him during the summing up. While it is conceded that there was a viable basis for a verdict of manslaughter based upon the appellant's account, namely that it involved an unlawful and dangerous act of tightening the ligature around the victim's neck during consensual asphyxial sex, such a view of the facts would be wholly inconsistent with the case for the prosecution. So, for the judge to introduce the possibility of a verdict of manslaughter on these grounds would have transformed the nature of the case that the appellant was required to meet. The jury would not only have had to decide whether the victim may have died in the course of consensual sexual intercourse, but they would also have had to come to a conclusion as to the degree of danger that consensual asphyxial sexual intercourse, as practised by the appellant, involved.'

[42] Later in their judgment the Court of Appeal said:

'[83] . . . What is important here is that the judge accepted it would be unfair, and therefore unjust, to leave the alternative count for the very good reason that it involved a different and inconsistent case from that put forward by the prosecution. If, in this case, manslaughter had been included, and the jury convicted the appellant of this offence, an appeal would almost inevitably have followed, and it is doubtful whether the conviction could have been regarded as safe. There may be cases where the approach based upon not withdrawing a defence from the jury should be extended to situations where the alternative verdict would not be a defence, but this case is not that situation. The judge's task is, as far as practical and appropriate, to simplify the task of the jury, not to make it more complicated than it would otherwise be.

[84] As our detailed consideration earlier in this judgment of the facts is intended to make clear, the case for the prosecution required the jury to consider a formidable body of circumstantial evidence. The critical issue for the jury to determine, however, was whether it was possible for the victim's death to have been an accident. In this situation, to introduce an alternative count would make the jury's task far more complicated without enhancing the interests of justice. Properly understood, the authorities only require a jury to be directed as to manslaughter, as an alternative to murder, when it is in the interests of justice for this to happen. It is not in the interests of justice for this to happen where it would result in unfairness to a defendant, or where it would make the task of the jury far more difficult without there being any sufficient countervailing benefit which justifies an additional burden being placed upon the jury.'

[43] I am, with respect, unable to agree with the reasons given by the Court of Appeal for not following the principle applied in Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232, [2000] 1 WLR 1270. As regards the first reason, although defence counsel did not wish the judge to leave manslaughter to the jury it is clear that this was because of a tactical decision by the appellant to go for a complete acquittal notwithstanding that this involved the risk of a conviction for murder. But, although it appears distasteful that a defendant can ask the judge not to leave a lesser alternative count to the jury and then, when convicted on the greater count, complain to an appellate court that the alternative count was not left, the interests of justice require, as Lord Clyde stated, that the jury should be able to reach a sound conclusion on the facts in the light of a complete understanding of the law applicable to them.

[44] As regards the second reason given by the Court of Appeal, I consider that the leaving of relevant issues to the jury which may result in the jury coming to the conclusion which is the most just one on the evidence cannot depend on the way in which the prosecution chooses to present its case but must depend on all the evidence; as Lord Clyde stated in Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232 at 238, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 at 1276, 'the issues in a criminal trial fall to be identified in light of the whole evidence led before the jury'.

[45] I am also unable to agree with the view of the Court of Appeal that it would have been unfair to the defendant to leave manslaughter to the jury and that a conviction for manslaughter would almost inevitably have led to an appeal which might have succeeded. If the judge had decided to leave manslaughter to the jury he would have told counsel of his decision and they would have referred to the issue in their closing speeches to the jury. The actions and mental attitude of the defendant at the time of sexual activity with the deceased were relevant to the issue of manslaughter as they were to the issue of murder, and the defendant had given a full account of his actions and mental attitude to the jury. Not infrequently in a murder case, the defendant advances a defence which, if not disproved by the prosecution, would entitle him to a complete acquittal, as when the defendant claims that he used a weapon in self-defence, but the judge, pursuant to his duty, leaves the issue of provocation to the jury if it arises on the evidence, notwithstanding that defence counsel has not wished that issue to be left, and a verdict of manslaughter by reason of provocation does not necessarily mean that the defendant has had an unfair trial. In R v McCormack [1969] 3 All ER 371 at 373, [1969] 2 QB 442 at 446 the Court of Appeal said:

> 'Cases vary so infinitely that one can well envisage a case where the possibility of conviction of some lesser offence has been completely ignored by both prosecution and defence—it may be that the accused has never had occasion to deal with the matter, has lost a chance of giving some evidence himself about it or calling some evidence to cover or guard against the possibility of conviction of that lesser offence—and in such a case, where there might well be prejudice to an accused, it seems to this court there must be a discretion in the trial judge whether or not to leave the lesser offence to the jury.'

Whilst there will be cases, as the Court of Appeal recognised in R v McCormack, where it would be unfair to the defendant to leave an alternative verdict to the jury, I am satisfied that this is not such a case. Nor do I think that the task of the jury would have been unduly complicated by leaving the issue of manslaughter to them. Therefore, although it was understandable why he failed to do so, I consider that the judge should have left the issue of manslaughter to the jury. The question then arises whether the conviction for murder should be quashed as unsafe.

[46] In the authorities which consider whether a conviction should be quashed on appeal when the judge has erred in failing to leave an alternative verdict to the jury two lines of reasoning have been adopted. One line of cases has followed the reasoning of Lord Ackner in R v Maxwell [1990] 1 All ER 801, [1990] 1 WLR 401 (with whose judgment the other members of the House agreed). In that case the appellant had been tried and convicted on a count of robbery. Under s 6(3) of the 1967 Act on the count of robbery the jury could return the alternative verdict of theft, but an alternative verdict of burglary could not be returned. The prosecution declined to add a count of burglary to the indictment, a decision which Lord Ackner considered to have been justified (see [1990] 1 All ER 801 at 807, [1990] 1 WLR 401 at 408). The appellant appealed on the ground that the judge should have left the alternative verdict of theft to the jury and the House dismissed the appeal, Lord Ackner stating (at 807 and 408 respectively) that—

> 'on the facts of this case the judge was entitled to conclude that the alternative of theft was relatively so trifling that the jury's attention upon the essential issue, did the appellant intend violence to be used?, should not be distracted.'

Lord Ackner therefore held that he could find no vitiating error or reason for regarding the verdict as unsafe or unsatisfactory, but he went on to state (by way of obiter):

> 'What is required in any particular case, where the judge fails to leave an alternative offence to the jury, is that the court, before interfering with the verdict, must be satisfied that the jury may have convicted out of a reluctance to see the defendant get clean away with what, on any view, was disgraceful conduct. If they are so satisfied then the conviction cannot be safe or satisfactory.'

[47] A second line of cases makes no reference to the concern that a jury, properly directed by the judge as to the law on the count left to them, may nevertheless have convicted, not on a sound basis in accordance with the judge's directions and on their honest assessment of the facts, but from a reluctance to see the defendant get clean away with disgraceful conduct. These cases take a more direct approach to the issue and hold that where a lesser alternative verdict which was reasonably open on the evidence should have been left, but was not left, there has been a serious miscarriage of justice and the conviction must be quashed as unsafe.

[48] Mr Kelsey-Fry relied on Lord Ackner's judgment and submitted that even if the judge should have left the manslaughter issue to the jury, nevertheless the conviction for murder was safe and should be upheld because the judge had properly directed the jury as to the relevant law, and on the facts of the case the House could not be satisfied that the jury had convicted out of a reluctance to see the appellant get clean away.

[49] A considerable number of authorities have followed Lord Ackner's judgment in R v Maxwell [1990] 1 All ER 801, [1990] 1 WLR 401. In R v Maxwell (Nolan) [1994] Crim LR 848 in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal Hobhouse LJ after citing Lord Ackner's judgment said at p 6 of the transcript:

> 'The present case undoubtedly involved disgraceful conduct on the part of this appellant. He had been identified as one of the men in the minicab. It was clear and undisputed on the evidence that he had taken part in a joint attack on the minicab driver in the early hours of the morning and had, on any view, inflicted some injuries upon him. Indeed, on one view, he was the person who had started the actual violence. It was disgraceful conduct, and it would cause outrage if the appellant, having been identified as one of the men involved, were to "get clean away". If the jury were to have a proper opportunity to consider all the alternatives which were open to them in respect of the appellant, they should have had further directions from the judge upon the alternative verdicts that were open to them. The judge laid the ground in his directions about what was involved in a joint enterprise, and the different views that might be taken of how far the joint enterprise went. He referred to the facts, which indicated the increased gravity of the later parts of the incident, and the role of Oakley in aggravating the assault, as well as being involved in the robbery. But he did not then go on to direct the jury that there were alternative verdicts which were open to them.'

[50] In Hunter v R [2004] 2 LRC 719 Lord Hope said (at [28]):

> 'Their Lordships consider that the trial judge was wrong to deprive the jury of the opportunity of considering whether, in the light of the mixed statements, the Crown had proved in the case of each appellant that the "triggerman" test was satisfied. He ought to have directed the jury to consider this question, and to have left with them the alternative verdict that the appellants were guilty of non-capital murder which would have been open to them on the evidence if they were satisfied that the appellants were acting in pursuance of a joint enterprise. They were, of course, left with the alternative verdict of not guilty [of capital murder]. But, as Lord Ackner explained in R v Maxwell [1990] 1 All ER 801 at 807, if the judge fails to leave an alternative offence to the jury, the court must consider whether the jury may have convicted out of a reluctance to see the defendant get clean away with what, on any view, was disgraceful conduct. That was a very real possibility in this case. There was ample evidence that the appellants had guns in their hands, and that they had been using them during their running battle which they and their companions had started with the police. According to the police witnesses, all four men had been attempting to inflict grievous bodily harm on them from the start of this incident.'

[51] In Gilbert v R (2000) 170 ALR 88 in the High Court of Australia Gleeson CJ and Gummow J, who were in the majority with Callinan J, delivered a judgment which acknowledged some degree of validity in the concern which underpins the approach stated by Lord Ackner in R v Maxwell. They said (at [13]):

> 'The system of criminal justice, as administered by appellate courts, requires the assumption, that, as a general rule, juries understand, and follow, the directions they are given by trial judges. It does not involve the assumption that their decision-making is unaffected by matters of possible prejudice.'

And after citing passages in the judgments in Mraz v R (1955) 93 CLR 493, delivered at a time when murder attracted the death penalty, including the statement of Fullagar J (at 513) that: 'A jury which would hesitate to convict of murder may be only too glad to take a middle course which is offered to them', they said (at [16]):

> 'These statements are inconsistent with the notion that an appellate court must assume, on the part of a jury, a mechanistic approach to the task of fact-finding, divorced from a consideration of the consequences. Indeed, juries are ordinarily asked to return a general verdict. They make their findings of fact in the context of instructions as to the consequences of such findings, and for the purpose of returning a verdict which expresses those consequences.'

[52] However, McHugh J and Hayne J, dissenting, rejected the view taken by Gleeson CJ and Gummow J as to how a jury might come to their decision. McHugh J said (at [30]–[31]):

'[30] The argument for the appellant is a claim that this court should proceed on one of two bases, each of which necessarily involves an assumption that, if manslaughter had been left as an issue, the jury might have disregarded their sworn duty to give a verdict in accordance with the evidence. The first assumption is that, if manslaughter had been left, the jury might have convicted of manslaughter even though they knew, because of the trial judge's directions, that the appellant was guilty of murder. The second assumption is that the jurors were not convinced beyond reasonable doubt that the appellant knew that his brother intended to kill or to inflict grievous bodily harm on Linsley, that they knew therefore that he was not guilty of murder, but that they nevertheless convicted him of murder rather than acquit him and see him go free. In my respectful opinion, as a matter of legal policy, no court of justice can entertain either assumption.

[31] The criminal trial on indictment proceeds on the assumption that jurors are true to their oath, that, in the quaint words of the ancient oath, they hearken to the evidence and that they obey the trial judge's directions. On that assumption, which I regard as fundamental to the criminal jury trial, the common law countries have staked a great deal. If it was rejected or disregarded, no one—accused, trial judge or member of the public—could have any confidence in any verdict of a criminal jury or in the criminal justice system whenever it involves a jury trial. If it was rejected or disregarded, the pursuit of justice through the jury system would be as much a charade as the show trial of any totalitarian state. Put bluntly, unless we act on the assumption that criminal juries act on the evidence and in accordance with the directions of the trial judge, there is no point in having criminal jury trials.'

[53] Hayne J said (at [51]–[52]):

'[51] Nor does the conclusion which I have reached depend upon some judicial assessment of what was acknowledged to be a strong case against the appellant. It is a conclusion which depends entirely upon giving due weight to the verdict of the jury in light of what they were told by the judge and assuming (there being no basis for suggesting otherwise) that they did their duty conscientiously.

[52] The trial to which the appellant was entitled was a trial according to law. There were two questions for the Court of Appeal. First, was there a trial according to law (and all agreed that there was not). Secondly, and no less important, was the question whether a substantial miscarriage of justice had actually occurred. That second question is not concluded by pointing to the fact that there was a misdirection and that there was, therefore, not a trial according to law. The existence of the proviso denies that the fact of misdirection will, in every case, require an order for retrial. Nor can this second question be answered by making an assumption that the jury might have chosen to disregard what they were told by the judge. Such an assumption is unwarranted. It is an assumption which suggests that emotion (whether induced by the eloquence of counsel or otherwise) might have supplanted the collective common sense and careful reasoning that jurors bring to bear upon a difficult task. It is an assumption which, if effect is given to it, turns the judge's charge to a jury into a ritual incantation which appellate courts must examine for formal correctness but which appellate courts are free (if not bound) to assume a jury may have disregarded.' a

[54] Callinan J in giving his reasons for allowing the appeal expressed a view (at [101]) which I think does not involve acceptance that a jury may fail to carry out their duty: b

'The appellant was entitled to a trial at which directions according to law were given. It is contrary to human experience that in situations in which a choice of decisions may be made, what is chosen will be unaffected by the variety of the choices offered, particularly when, as here, a particular choice was not the only or inevitable choice.' c

[55] In the later case of Gillard v R (2003) 202 ALR 202 at [133], Hayne J described the effect of the decision of the majority in Gilbert v R (2000) 170 ALR 88 as follows: d

'In Gilbert, a majority of the court concluded that if manslaughter should have been, but was not, left to a jury as an available verdict on the appellant's trial for murder, the verdict of guilty of murder did not preclude the possibility that the jury may have failed to apply the instructions they were given. No party in this appeal sought to reopen the decision in Gilbert. It e follows from what was decided in Gilbert that, in deciding here whether no substantial miscarriage of justice has actually occurred and thus, whether the proviso to s 353(1) of the Criminal Law Consolidation Act applies, account may not be taken of the findings implicit in the jury's verdicts at the appellant's trial. It must be assumed that the jury may have chosen to disregard the instructions they were given, and convict the appellant of f murder and attempted murder, rather than return verdicts of not guilty. Once it is accepted that the jury may have disregarded the instructions they were given, it is not permissible to reason, as the respondent submitted, from the fact that the jury returned verdicts of guilty on all three counts to the conclusion that the jury must therefore be taken to have applied the trial g judge's instructions. Once it is said, as it was in Gilbert, that the jury may have disregarded the instructions they were given, it cannot be said that some levels of disobedience may be less probable than others.'

Therefore the view taken by the High Court of Australia is that if, on a trial for h murder, manslaughter was not left when it should have been, it must be assumed by the appellate court (contrary to Lord Ackner's requirement that the appellate court must be satisfied) that the jury may have chosen to disregard the instructions they were given.

[56] The second line of cases does not follow the R v Maxwell [1990] 1 All ER j 801, [1990] 1 WLR 401 approach but takes the more direct view that if a lesser alternative verdict could reasonably have been come to on the evidence, justice to the defendant requires that the jury should have been given the opportunity to return that verdict and the conviction must be quashed, and does not take into account the question whether the jury may have convicted out of a reluctance to see the defendant get clean away. In delivering the judgment of the Privy Council in Bullard v R [1957] AC 635 at 644, [1957] 3 WLR 656 at 661, Lord Tucker said:

> 'Every man on trial for murder has the right to have the issue of manslaughter left to the jury if there is any evidence upon which such a verdict can be given. To deprive him of this right must of necessity constitute a grave miscarriage of justice and it is idle to speculate what verdict the jury would have reached.'

[57] In the High Court of Australia in Pemble v R (1971) 124 CLR 107 at 117–118 Barwick CJ said:

> 'Whatever course counsel may see fit to take, no doubt bona fide but for tactical reasons in what he considers the best interest of his client, the trial judge must be astute to secure for the accused a fair trial according to law. This involves, in my opinion, an adequate direction both as to the law and the possible use of the relevant facts upon any matter upon which the jury could in the circumstances of the case upon the material before them find or base a verdict in whole or in part.'

[58] In R v Jackson [1993] 4 SCR 573 at 593 in delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada McLachlin J said:

> 'It is true that the trial judge charged the jury clearly and correctly on the mental state required to find Davy guilty of murder. It is also true that the jury found Davy guilty of murder. Nevertheless, I agree with the Court of Appeal [of Ontario] that one cannot be satisfied the verdict is just, given the failure of the trial judge to set out the basis for convicting Davy of manslaughter under ss 21(1) and 21(2) [of the Criminal Code] and the absence of any instruction that a party may be guilty of manslaughter even though the perpetrator is guilty of murder.'

[59] In Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232 at 238, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 at 1276 Lord Clyde made no reference to the R v Maxwell approach and said that it was the duty of the judge 'to secure that a just result is obtained in the whole circumstances disclosed in the evidence'. In the context of the importance of ensuring a just result in the whole circumstances disclosed in the evidence, I consider, with respect, that there is much force in the perceptive observation of Callinan J in Gilbert v R (2000) 170 ALR 88 at [101] which I have already cited that: 'It is contrary to human experience that in situations in which a choice of decisions may be made, what is chosen will be unaffected by the variety of the choices offered . . .' It is also relevant to observe that in addition to ensuring fairness to the defendant, the leaving of a lesser alternative verdict to the jury is in the public interest. As Mustill LJ said in R v Fairbanks [1986] 1 WLR 1202 at 1206:

> 'It must be remembered that justice serves the interests of the public as well as those of the defendant, and if evidence is such that he ought at least to be convicted of the lesser offence, it would be wrong for him to be acquitted altogether merely because the jury cannot be sure that he was guilty of the greater.' a

[60] I was a member of the Board which followed the R v Maxwell [1990] 1 All ER 801, [1990] 1 WLR 401 approach in Hunter v R [2004] 2 LRC 719, but I now consider that that approach is an unsatisfactory one and should no longer be taken. It requires the appellate court, without having material before it to enable b a proper assessment to be made, to attempt to make an assessment whether a jury has returned a verdict of guilty, not on a proper and fair weighing of the evidence in the light of the judge's directions as to the law, but from reluctance to see a defendant, who has behaved disgracefully, get clean away. In reality, it appears to oblige the appellate court to engage in speculation as to the factors which may have influenced the jury's decision. And it is relevant to observe that c in following a course somewhat similar to the R v Maxwell approach the High Court of Australia has arrived at the point at which, if the judge has erred in not leaving an alternative verdict of manslaughter to the jury, it is to be assumed by the appellate court that the jury may have chosen to convict of murder in disregard of the instructions they were given. d

[61] Therefore I consider that the House should follow the reasoning in the second line of cases and hold that, save in exceptional circumstances, an appellate court should quash a conviction, whether for murder or for a lesser offence, as constituting a serious miscarriage of justice where the judge has erred in failing to leave a lesser alternative verdict obviously raised by the evidence.

[62] In conclusion I refer briefly to one further matter. The authorities make e it clear that an alternative verdict should only be left if it is one to which 'a jury could reasonably come' (per Lord Clyde in Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232 at 237, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 at 1275; see also Mustill LJ in R v Fairbanks [1986] 1 WLR 1202 at 1205: 'unless the alternatives really arise on the issues as presented at the trial'). Therefore I am in full agreement with the test proposed by Lord Bingham f (at [23], above) that the alternative or alternatives 'should suggest themselves to the mind of any ordinarily knowledgeable and alert criminal judge, excluding alternatives which ingenious counsel may identify through diligent research after the trial'. I also agree that the rule discussed by Lord Bingham should not be extended to summary proceedings.

[63] Therefore for the reasons which I have given, and also for the reasons g given by Lord Bingham and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry with which I agree, I would allow this appeal and make the order which Lord Bingham proposes.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[64] My Lords, in July 2003 the appellant, Graham James Coutts, was charged h with the murder of Jane Katherine Longhurst earlier that year. After trial in the Crown Court at Lewes he was convicted of her murder and sentenced to life imprisonment with a recommendation that he serve a minimum of 30 years before being considered for release. He appealed to the Court of Appeal against his conviction, inter alia on the ground that the judge had wrongly failed to direct j the jury that it was open to them to return an alternative verdict of manslaughter. The Court of Appeal dismissed his appeal against conviction, but allowed his appeal against sentence to the extent of substituting a minimum period of 25 years two months to be served by him before being considered for release.

[65] The reason for the very long period to be served by the appellant before being considered for release becomes obvious when the nature of the murder of which the appellant was convicted is understood. The case for the Crown as presented to the jury was that he had murdered the deceased in order to obtain sexual stimulation and that, having strangled her with a pair of tights, he did indeed have some kind of sexual contact with her body. The prosecution led evidence, which was not disputed, that the appellant was in the habit of visiting various websites which related to sex and violence and which contained images under headings such as 'asphyxiation and strangulation', 'rape, torture and violent sex'. In particular, the day before the deceased's death, he had logged on to a website 'Death by asphyxia' for approximately an hour and three quarters.

[66] The appellant did not dispute that the deceased had died in his flat, nor that, following her death, he had concealed her body in a storage unit, before eventually setting fire to it on an area of open land. His position at trial was that the deceased had died by accident when he and she had been engaged in consensual sexual activity. With her consent, when they were face to face on his bed, he had put a ligature, in the form of a pair of tights, round the deceased's neck. The sight of the ligature was intended to stimulate him sexually and the restriction of oxygen to the deceased's brain was intended to heighten her sexual pleasure. According to the appellant, when he was on his back and she was above him, he held the ends of the tights behind her neck with his left hand, while masturbating with his right hand. At some time before he ejaculated, he must have closed his eyes. When he opened them again, he was aware of the deceased lying over him and not moving. In fact, she was dead. He could not remember what had happened in the moments before her death. The appellant said that he had not pulled the ends of the ligature sufficiently strongly to cut off her blood supply and to kill her. Her death had just been an accident in the course of this consensual sexual activity.

[67] There was evidence, led by the Crown but relied on by the defence, from two women with whom the appellant had had relationships, to the effect that they had sometimes engaged in consensual sexual activities with him which involved him putting some kind of pressure on their necks. Another woman spoke to having had a consensual sexual encounter with him in which he bound her wrists with masking tape.

[68] Both counsel for the prosecution and counsel for the defence conducted the trial on the basis that the jury had to choose between these two starkly different versions of events, one involving a particularly horrendous murder, the other involving an accident in the course of a consensual sexual encounter. But after the evidence was over, and before speeches, in the absence of the jury the judge raised with counsel the possibility of an alternative verdict of manslaughter. On an indictment for murder a jury can, of course, return a verdict of manslaughter in an appropriate case (see s 6(2) of the Criminal Law Act 1967). Prosecuting counsel, Mr Kelsey-Fry QC, immediately acknowledged that one could mount an argument in law to suggest that the defence account, even if accepted, might amount to manslaughter on the basis either of gross negligence or, arguably, of an unlawful and dangerous act. On either version there would be room, arguably, for an alternative verdict of manslaughter. The Crown's view, however, was that it would be quite unfair and quite wrong to allow for such a verdict in this case: 'Having set the case out as a contest between deliberate killing and the defence version, if we failed to prove the deliberate killing, in our submission the defendant is entitled to a full acquittal.' Under reference to the decision in R v Emmett [1999] EWCA Crim 1710, the judge raised concerns which he had about that approach, but he eventually indicated that, if the Crown took the view that this was a case where, the Crown having opened the case in the way that it had, it would be unfair to proceed down an alternative, then it was not for the judge to enter into unfair approaches. Prosecuting counsel reiterated that, from the Crown's point of view, the case was about a deliberate and macabre murder: they had never advanced the case on the alternative basis and it would be wrong to do so now. Defence counsel readily agreed with the judge that he could not be expected to argue against that approach.

[69] Subsequently, when the judge specifically asked defence counsel whether he was inviting him to put manslaughter on any basis to the jury, counsel said that he could provisionally answer the question, 'No, I am not'. He indicated that he had not had an opportunity to discuss the matter in detail with the appellant and asked to be allowed to raise it briefly the following morning if the position changed. Counsel did not subsequently raise the matter with the judge.

[70] In a statement prepared for the purposes of his appeal to the Court of Appeal, the appellant said that the issue of manslaughter had been discussed in the preparation of the case, when he was advised that, if convicted of manslaughter, he would receive a lengthy sentence. He was also certain that he had discussed the matter further with defence counsel after the exchange in court. He recalled counsel saying 'Do you want us to make representation, or do you want to roll the dice and be home with Lisa and the boys?' He had been told that he would receive a sentence of as long as 15 years if convicted of manslaughter. The appellant followed his counsel's advice and agreed that they should not ask for manslaughter to be left to the jury. Trial counsel accepted that the appellant's statement correctly reflected the gist of their conversation. It is therefore clear that the appellant took a tactical decision not to ask the judge to give the jury directions on manslaughter in the hope that, faced with a stark choice between murder and accident, the jury would acquit him and he would immediately be free to go home.

[71] In the light of the submissions made to him by counsel, the judge did not give the jury any direction on manslaughter. His direction on the law was to this effect:

> 'As you know, of course, his defence is that this was an accident taking place during the course of consensual asphyxial sexual activities between himself and Jane, and therefore it follows that he is saying to you that he never had any intention to kill her or to cause her any really serious bodily harm. If her death was or may have been an accident, then, of course, he is not guilty of this allegation. The reason for that would be that you would not be satisfied that he intended to kill her or at least to cause her some really serious bodily harm. If, having considered all of the evidence in the case, you are sure that it was not an accident and that he did intend to kill her, or at least to cause her really serious bodily harm, then it would then follow that he is guilty of murder.'

[72] Despite the tactical decision which the appellant and his trial counsel took, not to ask the judge to direct the jury on manslaughter, he now contends that actually the judge was bound to give such a direction in the circumstances of this case and that his failure to do so amounted to a material misdirection in law. On behalf of the Crown Mr Kelsey-Fry contends that the judge was under no duty to give a direction on manslaughter but that, even if he was, the failure to do so did not make the jury's verdict unsafe since, in order to convict the appellant of murder, the jury must have been satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he had intended to kill the deceased or at least to cause her serious bodily harm.

[73] My Lords, the inconsistency in the appellant's attitude at trial and on appeal is striking, not to say disturbing. But he is not the first defendant to have placed an appeal court in this predicament. In R v Dhillon [1997] 2 Cr App R 104, where the trial judge had consulted counsel and, in the light of their submissions, had not given a direction on provocation when he should have done, the Court of Appeal held that his failure to do so was an unfortunate material misdirection. Ward LJ aptly concluded (at 114):

> 'The result, making some mockery of our hallowed adversarial procedure which strives to do justice to both sides, is that the appellant is able both to have his cake at trial and also to eat it on appeal.'

In R v Cox [1995] 2 Cr App R 513 at 518, Glidewell LJ had been forced to a similar conclusion where the judge had failed to leave the issue of provocation to the jury. In Gillard v R (2003) 202 ALR 202, at trial counsel for the defendant had successfully resisted an attempt by the prosecution to persuade the judge to direct the jury that verdicts of manslaughter were available. The appellant had fully exploited the forensic advantages of the jury being presented with a straight choice between murder and nothing. But, in the event, the jury convicted him. He appealed on the ground that the judge should indeed have directed the jury that manslaughter verdicts were available. Kirby J commented (at [41]):

> 'Having secured, but lost, the advantages of the dichotomy which he urged at his trial, the appellant now wants another trial with a further chance to contest the indictment under new rules. It is easy to feel a sense of distaste about allowing such a course to succeed.'

Nevertheless, Kirby J came to the view that the failure to give a direction on manslaughter constituted a wrong decision on a question of law and that there would indeed have to be a new trial.

[74] These authorities help to identify the attitude which an appeal court must adopt in a case such as this, despite any justifiable feeling of distaste for the appellant's approach. If the court concludes that there was a material misdirection which rendered the jury's verdict unsafe, then it must give effect to that conclusion and quash the conviction. An unsafe verdict cannot stand just because the appellant was partly to blame for its being unsafe.

[75] At the hearing before the House Mr Fitzgerald QC, who did not appear in the trial, submitted on behalf of the appellant that a verdict of manslaughter would have been available on the basis of the defence version of events. So far as the Crown is concerned, as I have explained, when the trial judge raised the question of manslaughter, Mr Kelsey-Fry immediately acknowledged that, on the defence account, there would be room for an alternative verdict of manslaughter, on the basis that the victim's death had resulted either from gross negligence or, arguably, from an unlawful and dangerous act. Before the House he similarly acknowledged that a verdict of manslaughter would have been open on the defence version—though he submitted that the proper basis would have been gross negligence, rather than an unlawful and dangerous act. It is therefore common ground that, on the totality of the evidence, if directed on the law of manslaughter, the jury would have been entitled to find the appellant guilty of manslaughter. I agree with that view. In these circumstances, it is unnecessary to determine whether one, rather than the other, legal basis for such a verdict would have been the more appropriate.

[76] The issue accordingly is whether, given that a verdict of manslaughter would have been available on the evidence before the jury, the trial judge should have directed the jury on manslaughter. Here the judge raised the issue with counsel and their common position was that he should not do so. While the judge was fully entitled to take account of counsel's attitude, ultimately any trial judge is responsible for ensuring a fair trial in which the defendant is convicted of a crime only if his guilt is proved according to law. That duty is not compromised or qualified by the strategy or tactics adopted by counsel on either side—although these may affect what the judge has to do in fulfilment of his duty.

[77] Appeal courts have frequently had to consider whether on a murder indictment a trial judge needed to put the alternative verdict of manslaughter before the jury. In Mancini v DPP [1941] 3 All ER 272 at 276, [1942] AC 1 at 7 Viscount Simon LC said:

> 'Although the appellant's case at the trial was in substance that he had been compelled to use his weapon in necessary self-defence—a defence which, if it had been accepted by the jury, would have resulted in his complete acquittal—it was undoubtedly the duty of the judge, in summing up to the jury, to deal adequately with any other view of the facts which might reasonably arise out of the evidence given, and which would reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter. The fact that a defending counsel does not stress an alternative case before the jury (which he may well feel it difficult to do without prejudicing the main defence) does not relieve the judge from the duty of directing the jury to consider the alternative, if there is material before the jury which would justify a direction that they should consider it . . . "Whatever the line of defence adopted by counsel at the trial of a prisoner, we are of opinion that it is for the judge to put such questions as appear to him properly to arise upon the evidence, even although counsel may not have raised some question himself . . ."'

Viscount Simon added ([1941] 3 All ER 272 at 276–277, [1942] AC 1 at 8):

> 'The possibility of a verdict of manslaughter instead of murder only arises when the evidence given before the jury is such as might satisfy them as the judges of fact that the elements were present which would reduce the crime to manslaughter, or, at any rate, might induce a reasonable doubt as to whether this was, or was not, the case.'

In Kwaku Mensah v R [1946] AC 83, the judge had failed to give a direction on provocation in a case where the issue properly arose. Delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, Lord Goddard said (at 91–92):

> 'But if on the whole of the evidence there arises a question whether or not the offence might be manslaughter only, on the ground of provocation as well as on any other ground, the judge must put that question to the jury. This was distinctly laid down in R v Hopper [1915] 2 KB 431, a case in some respects resembling the present, more especially in that the line of defence adopted was that the killing was accidental and no attempt had been made at the trial to rely on provocation. The ruling was expressly approved by the House of Lords in Mancini v DPP [1941] 3 All ER 272, [1942] AC 1. The reason for the rule is that on an indictment for murder it is open to the jury to find a verdict of either murder or manslaughter, but the onus is always on the prosecution to prove that the offence amounts to murder if that verdict is sought. If on the whole of the evidence there is nothing which could entitle a jury to return the lesser verdict the judge is not bound to leave it to them to find murder or manslaughter. But if there is any such evidence then, whether the defence have relied on it or not, the judge must bring it to the attention of the jury, because if they accept it or are left in doubt about it the prosecution have not proved affirmatively a case of murder.'

The Privy Council adopted and applied this statement of the law in DPP v Daley [1980] AC 237 at 244, [1979] 2 WLR 239 at 244.

[78] In Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 the appellant had been convicted of murdering a woman by stabbing her. On being arrested, he admitted killing her. In the course of the trial the Crown led evidence of that admission and of a statement in which the appellant said that he and the deceased woman had been taking drugs in his hotel room when he suddenly had a knife in his hand and, although he did not know exactly what had happened, he remembered seeing her on the ground and thinking she was dead. In an unsworn statement at his trial the appellant did not mention taking cocaine but said that he did not know what had happened. The judge withdrew the appellant's pre-trial statements from the consideration of the jury on the ground that they were inconsistent with what he had said at his trial. The Privy Council allowed his appeal and, by agreement, substituted a conviction of manslaughter. In the course of giving the judgment of the Board Lord Clyde said ([2000] 4 LRC 232 at 237, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 at 1275):

'The function and responsibility of the judge is greater and more onerous than the function and the responsibility of the counsel appearing for the prosecution and for the defence in a criminal trial. In particular, counsel for a defendant may choose to present his case to the jury in the way which he considers best serves the interest of his client. The judge is required to put to the jury for their consideration, in a fair and balanced manner, the respective contentions which have been presented. But his responsibility does not end there. It is his responsibility not only to see that the trial is conducted with all due regard to the principle of fairness, but to place before the jury all the possible conclusions which may be open to them on the evidence which has been presented in the trial whether or not they have all been canvassed by either of the parties in their submissions. It is the duty of the judge to secure that the overall interests of justice are served in the resolution of the matter and that the jury is enabled to reach a sound conclusion on the facts in light of a complete understanding of the law applicable to them. If the evidence is wholly incredible, or so tenuous or uncertain that no reasonable jury could reasonably accept it, then of course the judge is entitled to put it aside. The threshold of credibility in this context is, as was recognised in Xavier v The State (17 December 1998, unreported), a low one, and, as was also recognised in that case, it would only cause unnecessary confusion to leave to the jury a possibility which can be seen beyond reasonable doubt to be without substance. But if there is evidence on which a jury could reasonably come to a particular conclusion then there can be few circumstances, if any, in which the judge has no duty to put the possibility before the jury. For tactical reasons counsel for a defendant may not wish to enlarge upon, or even to mention, a possible conclusion which the jury would be entitled, on the evidence to reach, in the fear that what he might see as a compromise conclusion would detract from a more stark choice between a conviction on a serious charge and an acquittal. But if there is evidence to support such a compromise verdict it is the duty of the judge to explain it to the jury and leave the choice to them. In Xavier v The State the defence at trial was one of alibi. But it was observed by Lord Lloyd of Berwick in that case that, "If accident was open on the evidence, then the judge ought to have left the jury with the alternative of manslaughter." In the present case the earlier statements together with their qualifications amply justified a conclusion of manslaughter and that alternative should have been left to the jury.'

[79] The statement of the law in Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 was applied by Sir Robert Carswell LCJ in the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland in R v Shaw [2001] NIJB 269 and by Lord Hope of Craighead, giving the judgment of the Privy Council, in Hunter v R [2004] 2 LRC 719 at [27].

[80] In the present case, however, the Court of Appeal ([2005] EWCA Crim 52 at [69], [2005] 1 WLR 1605 at [69]) suggested that in Von Starck v R Lord Clyde had expressed his views in terms that were more extensive than was necessary for the decision in that case. They did not believe that he would have expressed himself in those terms if he had had in mind the sort of situation being considered here. In my view Lord Clyde's observations, while not specifically phrased in terms of murder and manslaughter, are simply a fuller version of the statements of law to be found in the earlier decisions which I have quoted. I would respectfully endorse his formulation of the law.

[81] As these authorities make clear, the duty of the trial judge to direct the jury on manslaughter arises if a jury might reasonably return such a verdict on the whole of the evidence, whether led by the Crown or by the defence. Contrary to what the Court of Appeal said at [83] of their judgment, the duty applies even though the result may be that the jury convict the defendant of manslaughter on a basis which is different from, and inconsistent with, the case put forward by the prosecution. That is a necessary implication of the judge's duty to direct on manslaughter when it arises on all the evidence, even if the prosecution case is that the jury should accept particular elements of the evidence, on the basis of which they should find the defendant guilty of nothing less than murder. The stance of prosecuting counsel cannot be determinative of the range of verdicts fairly open to the jury on the evidence.

[82] Directing the jury on the way that the law applies to any reasonable view of the facts disclosed by the evidence ensures that they have a proper understanding of the way that the law is intended to work, depending on the view of the facts which they take. Therefore, by omitting to mention manslaughter in a case where it could apply on a reasonable view of the facts, the judge will misrepresent the position by making the law seem more rigid and less nuanced than it actually is. While, for tactical reasons, it may suit counsel on either or both sides to represent the law in this way, as offering a stark alternative between murder and acquittal, with nothing in between, in fact the law provides for an intermediate position. The jury are entitled to be told of that intermediate position, whenever it might come into play on a reasonable view of the evidence. The intermediate position may not be to the liking of either the prosecution or the defence, but the jury are still entitled to be told of it, so that they may reach their conclusions 'in light of a complete understanding of the law applicable to them' (see Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232 at 237, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 at 1275). Where the duty of the judge is to give a direction on the alternative verdict, counsel have to adjust their speeches to the jury to take account of that prospective direction.

[83] As Lord Clyde points out, this approach secures that the overall interests of justice are served in the resolution of the matter committed to the jury. If the jury are not aware that the law provides for conviction of manslaughter on the view of the evidence which they form, there is a risk that they may go wrong in either of two ways. On the one hand, the jury may convince themselves that, despite what the judge has told them, a conviction of murder must be open even in circumstances where it is not actually the lawful verdict because the crime of manslaughter comes into play; on the other hand, they may conclude that the defendant is entitled to be acquitted completely, say, on the ground of accident, in circumstances where the law actually requires that he should be convicted of manslaughter. The first eventuality harms the defendant, the second harms the wider public interest. But both are unacceptable. And our system guards against them by requiring the judge to explain the law of manslaughter to the jury so that they are aware of it in any appropriate case. Omitting the direction removes the safeguard.

[84] Since the duty to put the possibility of a viable alternative verdict before the jury exists to promote the interests of justice in this way, it will not apply in circumstances where giving the direction would not serve those interests and might indeed undermine the fairness of the trial. For instance, there might be cases where it could properly be said that one or other of the parties was prejudiced because, if they had realised that the alternative verdict was going to be left to the jury, they would have examined or cross-examined the witnesses differently or would have led other evidence. If the prejudice was significant and could not be avoided or mitigated at that stage, the overall interests of justice might mean that the duty to direct on the alternative verdict would not apply. There could also be cases, other than murder-manslaughter, where the alternative verdict would be so trivial that the jury would be unlikely to be misled by not knowing about it and the public interest would not suffer if the defendant were not convicted of the offence. In such a case, as Mustill LJ envisaged in R v Fairbanks [1986] 1 WLR 1202 at 1206, the judge could properly conclude that it was best not to introduce an unnecessary complication and distract the jury by forcing them to consider something which was remote from the real point of the case. Again, the duty would not apply. But, in a case such as the present, the duty applies and any additional complications in the directions to the jury are the necessary price of ensuring that they have all the information on the law which they need to discharge their responsibilities.

[85] Since, in order to discharge those responsibilities, the jury requires to be directed on manslaughter whenever (as in this case) it arises as a viable issue on a reasonable view of the evidence, a failure by the judge to give the direction will amount to a material misdirection in law. In terms of s 2(1) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 an appellate court will therefore have to quash the conviction if they think that, by reason of the misdirection, the conviction is unsafe. This is just to reach virtually the same position as is succinctly stated in the judgment of Lord Tucker in the Privy Council in Bullard v R [1957] AC 635 at 644, [1957] 3 WLR 656 at 661:

> 'Every man on trial for murder has the right to have the issue of manslaughter left to the jury if there is any evidence upon which such a verdict can be given. To deprive him of this right must of necessity constitute a grave miscarriage of justice and it is idle to speculate what verdict the jury would have reached.'

[86] Mr Kelsey-Fry submitted, however, that, even if your Lordships concluded—as I have concluded—that the judge had been wrong not to give the jury directions on the alternative verdict of manslaughter, this would not be a sufficient basis for quashing the appellant's conviction of murder. In effect, his argument was that, when a jury has been properly directed on a more serious offence and has convicted the defendant of that more serious offence, the failure to direct on a lesser alternative offence does not of itself render the conviction unsafe. In the words of Lord Ackner in R v Maxwell [1990] 1 All ER 801 at 807, [1990] 1 WLR 401 at 408, 'the court, before interfering with the verdict, must be satisfied that the jury may have convicted out of a reluctance to see the defendant get clean away with what, on any view, was disgraceful conduct'.

[87] Despite its authoritative provenance, the test propounded by Lord Ackner is problematical, to say the least. So far as murder-manslaughter is concerned, it appears to be inconsistent with Lord Tucker's approach in Bullard v R. The test is also difficult to apply. Since the appeal court cannot inquire into what went on in the jury room, it is very far from clear how they are meant to satisfy themselves in any given case that a jury may have convicted out of a reluctance to see the defendant get clean away. Moreover, the test supposes that the jury will have consciously convicted the defendant in the face of the judge's directions. Yet the foundation of the system of trial by jury is the assumption, which is thought to be borne out by experience, that juries apply the directions which the judge gives them. In R v Bergman [1996] 2 Cr App R 399 the Court of Appeal suggested that Lord Ackner's test might be satisfied if the jury had asked whether an alternative verdict was open to them—but Hutchison LJ pointed out that this had not actually availed the defendant in R v Maxwell. Mr Kelsey-Fry suggested that protracted deliberations by the jury might be a pointer to the jury having ultimately gone wrong in this way—but the lengthy deliberations could equally point to the jury having taken particular care in applying the directions which they had been given. The reality is that the test is so uncertain that it is likely to produce inconsistent results, however conscientiously it may be applied.

[88] In any event, the test is wrong in principle. In Bullard v R [1957] AC 635 at 644, [1957] 3 WLR 656 at 661 the Privy Council regarded the direction on manslaughter as essential in an appropriate case and as leading to a grave and irremediable miscarriage of justice if it was omitted. This can only be because the direction is necessary if the jury are to consider their verdict on the proper basis and to avoid the risk of being misled into an inappropriate verdict. So it must be assumed that giving or omitting the direction affects the way that the jury consider the issues in the case. In the words of Callinan J in Gilbert v R (2000) 170 ALR 88 at [101]:

> 'The appellant was entitled to a trial at which directions according to law were given. It is contrary to human experience that in situations in which a choice of decisions may be made, what is chosen will be unaffected by the variety of the choices offered, particularly when, as here, a particular choice was not the only or inevitable choice.'

[89] The present case provides a good illustration of the point. The jury were told that they had to choose between convicting the appellant of murder and acquitting him on the ground that the victim had died as a result of an accident. On that basis they chose to convict of murder. But the jury should also have been told that, depending on their view of the facts, they could convict him of manslaughter. Mr Kelsey-Fry says that the additional choice is irrelevant since the jury convicted the appellant of murder and so they would never have reached the question of manslaughter, which only arose if they were not prepared to convict of murder. But that is to make an unreal assumption that, at all stages of their deliberations, the jury would keep the various issues in separate boxes, to be considered in a prescribed order. The reality is that, in the course of their deliberations, a jury might well look at the overall picture, even if they eventually had to separate out the issues of murder, manslaughter and accident. So, introducing the possibility of convicting of manslaughter could have changed the way the jury went about considering their verdict.

[90] Mr Kelsey-Fry further objects that, in any event, when reaching their verdict, the jury would have considered all the relevant facts—it made no difference that they were unaware that the law attached the label of manslaughter to one version of those facts. But experience shows that, as in this case, counsel deliberately choose not to mention manslaughter to the jury on the view that this may indeed influence the way that the jury react to the facts. At the very least, Mr Kelsey-Fry's submission ignores the possibility that the jury's approach might have been different if they had known that the appellant's version of events might better be regarded as constituting the crime of manslaughter, rather than as involving a mere accident. In Muir v HM Advocate 1933 JC 46 at 50, where the jury in a murder trial had not been directed on the possible verdict of culpable homicide on the ground of diminished responsibility, Lord Sands, who agreed that the appeal should be allowed, noted: 'A brutal crime had been committed, and a measure of mental weakness might have been regarded from quite a different angle if the jury were aware that its affirmance did not involve complete acquittal.' In much the same way, in the present case the jury might have regarded the defendant's version of events from quite a different angle if they had been aware that accepting it did not involve his complete acquittal.

[91] In my view therefore, in a case where the judge has wrongly omitted to direct the jury on a viable alternative verdict, the failure to give the direction must be regarded as a material misdirection. In Bullard v R [1957] AC 635 at 644, [1957] 3 WLR 656 at 661 the Privy Council considered that failure to give the appropriate direction on manslaughter in a case of murder would always be irremediable. In the absence of detailed argument on that particular point, it is enough to say that a failure to give the necessary direction must usually make the verdict unsafe since the appeal court will have no sufficient basis for concluding that a reasonable jury would inevitably have convicted the appellant of murder if they had been given the appropriate direction.

[92] In the present case I am certainly unable to say that, if given a direction on manslaughter, a reasonable jury would inevitably have convicted the appellant of murder. I think accordingly that the verdict is unsafe. For these reasons, as well of those given by my noble and learned friends, Lord Bingham of Cornhill, Lord Hutton and Lord Mance, I would allow the appeal and make the order which Lord Bingham proposes.

LORD MANCE.

[93] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the judgments prepared by my noble and learned friends, Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Rodger of Earlsferry. I agree with their reasoning and conclusions and add only a few words of my own out of deference to the careful submissions of Mr Kelsey-Fry QC for the Crown and because our decision marks a change from the approach taken in previous authority in both this House and the Privy Council to the safety of a verdict of guilty of a particular offence where the jury has not been directed as to the possibility of a finding of guilt of some alternative lesser offence.

[94] Many of the cases cited to the House concerned failure by a judge to direct the jury about the possibility of circumstances which would reduce the charge laid to some lesser offence, eg provocation or self-defence which would reduce a murder charge to manslaughter (see eg Mancini v DPP [1941] 3 All ER 272, [1942] AC 1 and Bullard v R [1957] AC 635, [1957] 3 WLR 656). The Privy Council decision in Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 falls to my mind into the same category—the judge directed the jury not to consider the issue of intoxication by cocaine, thus withdrawing from them the possibility of a finding that the defendant, because of such intoxication, lacked the specific intent necessary for a conviction for murder, while retaining the basic intent which is sufficient for a conviction for manslaughter (cf Blackstone's Criminal Practice (15th edn, 2006) pp 42–44 and 157 (paras A3.10 and B1.35)). Depriving a defendant of the benefit of an answer to the Crown's case, so leaving him or her exposed in law to conviction for an offence which he did not commit, must render any verdict unsafe.

[95] But there have been some cases considering the situation where an alternative offence presents itself not as an answer to the Crown's case, but as a possibility which (although not canvassed by either side) arises in law on the defendant's own case if and only if the Crown's case is rejected. In this situation, a direction by the judge to the jury to consider the alternative offence may lead to conviction in circumstances when otherwise the jury would in law have had completely to acquit. Not surprisingly, there are cases in which defendants have complained that the judge should not have left an alternative offence to the jury in these circumstances (see eg R v McCormack [1969] 3 All ER 371, [1969] 2 QB 442; where, equally unsurprisingly, the complaint was rejected (although the court pointed out (at 373 and 446) that a trial judge must have a discretion not to leave an alternative to a jury, if to do so might cause undue prejudice, as where the defendant had lost the chance of giving or calling evidence to cover or guard against the alternative)). An important public interest is served by the conviction of offenders of offences which they have committed, and the judge is not bound by the way in which either side has presented its case, if an alternative offence can without injustice be left to the jury.

[96] In the present case the appellant's complaint is the reverse. The appellant was content at trial that the jury should be left with a choice between being satisfied of murder and the possibility of accident. But a criminal judge has to ensure a fair trial, irrespective of the attitude taken at trial by either side (see Von Starck v R [2000] 4 LRC 232 at 237, [2000] 1 WLR 1270 at 1275 per Lord Clyde). The appellant now therefore complains that the judge should have insisted on directing the jury that, even on the defence case of accident, they should consider whether the appellant's conduct amounted to manslaughter, at least by gross negligence, and that the verdict is unsafe because he did not.

[97] It can be said with some force that our jury system rests on the hypothesis that juries follow the directions and decide between the options they are given loyally and dispassionately (see eg the dissenting judgments of McHugh and Hayne J in Gilbert v R (2000) 170 ALR 88 (High Court of Australia)). There are after all many circumstances in which no alternative verdict is possible, but the jury may, on the defendant's own account of events, feel very considerable disgust regarding his conduct (as they did no doubt in the present case with regard to the defendant's conduct after the deceased's death). The jury is in such circumstances trusted, nevertheless, to approach the question of guilt or innocence in respect of the offence charged loyally and dispassionately.

[98] However, in the limited number of previous cases in the United Kingdom, a different general approach has been taken in a context where an alternative verdict presents itself as possible. The approach has been (a) to recognise that there can be a real risk of the absence of a direction regarding the possibility of an intermediate alternative verdict influencing a jury to convict of the more serious charge laid by the Crown, out of reluctance to let the appellant 'get clean away' with a complete acquittal, and (b) to seek to identify whether in the particular circumstances of the case that real risk actually arose (see eg R v Fairbanks [1986] 1 WLR 1202, R v Maxwell [1990] 1 All ER 801, [1990] 1 WLR 401, R v Maxwell (Nolan) [1994] Crim LR 848, Hunter v R [2003] UKPC 69, [2004] 2 LRC 719 (cf also R v Shaw [2001] NIJB 269)). The test involved in part (b) of this approach was advanced by Lord Ackner in R v Maxwell [1990] 1 All ER 801 at 807, [1990] 1 WLR 401 at 408 in the following terms:

> 'What is required in any particular case, where the judge fails to leave an alternative offence to the jury, is that the court, before interfering with the verdict, must be satisfied that the jury may have convicted out of a reluctance to see the defendant get clean away with what, on any view, was disgraceful conduct.'

[99] I am persuaded that this is an unworkable test to apply to a jury trial. There is no reliable means by which an appellate court can, on so particular a basis, measure whether or how a jury may react to an unnatural limitation of the choices put before it. One is entitled to assume that juries go about their task in the utmost good faith, but the concern is with subconscious as well as conscious reactions. Like my noble and learned friends, I find persuasive the reasoning of Callinan J in Gilbert v R (2000) 170 ALR 88 at [101], to the effect that, as a matter of human experience, a choice of decisions may be affected 'by the variety of choices offered, particularly when . . . a particular choice [is] not the only or inevitable choice'. (In the present case, the possibility that the decision not to leave manslaughter to the jury might conceivably play out against, rather than for, the appellant is also inherent in defence counsel's apparent remark to the appellant at the time about 'rolling the dice'.) a

[100] Accordingly, in my view, where, as Lord Bingham has said, an obvious alternative verdict presents itself in respect of some more than trifling offence and can without injustice be left for the jury to consider, the judge should in fairness ensure that this is done, even if the alternative only arises on the defence case in circumstances where as a matter of law there should apart from that alternative be a complete acquittal. b

[101] Mr Kelsey-Fry submits, with some force, that the charge of murder laid by the Crown and any alternative offence of manslaughter which may be suggested would, despite its deplorable nature, still be of a very different order of seriousness. Nevertheless the latter could not conceivably be regarded as anywhere near trifling—a point which defence counsel's advice at trial that a conviction for manslaughter could attract a sentence as long as 15 years amply demonstrates. c

[102] It follows that the present verdict of guilt, arrived at when the jury was presented with a stark choice between murder and complete acquittal, cannot be regarded as safe, and I too would therefore allow this appeal and remit the case to the Court of Appeal on the basis indicated by Lord Bingham. d

Appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Majrowski v Guy's and St Thomas's NHS Trust

[2006] UKHL 34

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, BARONESS HALE OF RICHMOND, LORD CARSWELL AND LORD BROWN OF EATON-UNDER-HEYWOOD

10, 11 MAY, 12 JULY 2006

Vicarious liability – Employer and employee – Prohibited act by employee – Statutory prohibition – Harassment – Whether employer vicariously liable for harassment committed by employee in course of employment in breach of statutory prohibition – Protection from Harassment Act 1997, ss 3, 10.

The claimant brought proceedings against the defendant NHS trust in the county court, claiming damages pursuant to s 3[a] of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 for distress, anxiety and consequential losses caused by harassment that he had suffered, at the hands of his departmental manager, while employed by the trust. His claim was based exclusively on the trust's vicarious liability for the alleged breach of the statutory prohibition of harassment by the manager who, he said, had at all times been acting in the course of her employment by the trust. The proceedings were struck out by the judge, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. The trust appealed to the House of Lords, contending that an employer could not be vicariously liable under s 3 for harassment committed by an employee. In determining the appeal, their Lordships considered, inter alia, a provision of the 1997 Act which applied only to Scotland—s 10[b]. That section inserted a new s 18B into the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973, providing that no action for harassment under the 1997 Act could be brought within a period of three years after, inter alia, the date on which the pursuer became aware, or on which it would have been reasonably practicable for him to have become aware, that the defender was a person responsible for the alleged harassment 'or the employer or principal of such a person'.

Held – An employer would be vicariously liable in damages under s 3 of the 1997 Act for harassment, in breach of that Act, committed by an employee in the course of his employment. It was impossible to avoid the conclusion that the effect of the phrase 'or the employer or principal of such a person' in s 18B of the 1973 Act was to show that it was the intention of Parliament that it was to be open to the court, in appropriate circumstances, to find an employer vicariously liable in damages to the victim of a course of conduct amounting to harassment, in breach of the relevant provision of the 1997 Act, where the person responsible was an employee. Although the provisions of the 1997 Act which applied to Scotland differed in various respects from those which applied to England and Wales, it was not suggested that Parliament had intended there to be any difference in substance between the two jurisdictions as to the scope of the civil remedy for harassment. It followed that the indication in s 10(1) of the

a Section 3 is set out at [20], below

b Section 10 is set out at [44], below

1997 Act—that vicarious liability was available in Scotland where damages were claimed for conduct by an employee amounting to harassment within the meaning of the 1997 Act—had to be taken to apply to England and Wales also. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [40], [41], [45], [52], [53], [58], [63], [73], [74], [79]–[81], below).

Per curiam. Unless the statute expressly or impliedly indicates otherwise, the principle of vicarious liability is applicable where an employee commits a breach of a statutory obligation sounding in damages while acting in the course of his employment (see [16], [17], [57], [72], [78], [81], below).

Notes

For vicarious liability of employers for breaches of statutory duty by their employees, see 45(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 406.

For the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, s 3, see 12(1) Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2005 reissue) 1754.

Cases referred to in opinions

Bartonshill Coal Co v McGuire (1858) 3 Macq 300, HL.

Bernard v A-G of Jamaica [2004] UKPC 47, [2005] IRLR 398.

Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co v Long (1956) 97 CLR 36, Aus HC.

Dixon v Rankine (1852) 14 D 420, Ct of Sess.

Dubai Aluminium Co Ltd v Salaam [2002] UKHL 48, [2003] 1 All ER 97, [2003] 2 AC 366, [2002] 3 WLR 1913.

Harrison v National Coal Board [1951] 1 All ER 1102, [1951] AC 639, HL.

Hollis v Vabu Pty Ltd [2002] 1 LRC 93, Aus HC.

Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd v Shatwell [1964] 2 All ER 999, [1965] AC 656, [1964] 3 WLR 329, HL.

Lister v Hesley Hall Ltd [2001] UKHL 22, [2001] 2 All ER 769, [2002] 1 AC 215, [2001] 1 WLR 1311.

MacMillan v Wimpey Offshore Engineers and Constructors Ltd 1991 SLT 515, Ct of Sess.

Mattis v Pollock (trading as Flamingos Nightclub) [2003] EWCA Civ 887, [2004] 4 All ER 85, [2003] ICR 1335, [2003] 1 WLR 2158.

Matuszczyk v National Coal Board 1953 SC 8, Ct of Sess.

McCann v McGurran 2002 SLT 592, Ct of Sess.

McGlennan v McKinnon 1998 SLT 494, HC of Just.

McGuire v Kidston 2002 SLT (Sh Ct) 66, Sheriff Ct.

National Coal Board v England [1954] 1 All ER 546, [1954] AC 403, [1954] 2 WLR 400, HL.

Nelson and Byron Price & Associates Ltd, Re (1981) 122 DLR (3d) 340, British Columbia CA.

Nicol v National Coal Board (1952) 102 L Jo 357, Ct of Sess.

Staveley Iron and Chemical Co Ltd v Jones [1956] 1 All ER 403, [1956] AC 627, [1956] 2 WLR 479, HL.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Adams v Bracknell Forest BC [2004] UKHL 29, [2004] 3 All ER 897, [2004] 3 WLR 89.

Banks v Ablex Ltd [2005] EWCA Civ 173, [2005] IRLR 357, [2005] ICR 819.

Barber v Somerset CC [2004] UKHL 13, [2004] 2 All ER 385, [2004] ICR 457, [2004] 1 WLR 1089.

Barlow v Broxbourne BC [2003] EWHC 50 (QB), [2003] All ER (D) 208 (Jan).

Barnard v Santam Bpk (1999) (1) SA 202, SA Sup CA.
Bazley v Curry (1999) 174 DLR (4th) 45, Can SC.
Bond v Chief Constable of Kent [1983] 1 All ER 456, [1983] 1 WLR 40, DC.
Burris v Azadani [1995] 4 All ER 802, [1995] 1 WLR 1372, CA.
Canadian Pacific Railway Co v Lockhart [1942] 2 All ER 464, [1942] AC 591, PC.
Capital and Counties plc v Hampshire CC, Digital Equipment Co Ltd v Hampshire CC, John Munroe (Acrylics) Ltd v London Fire and Civil Defence Authority, Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (GB) v West Yorkshire Fire and Civil Defence Authority [1997] 2 All ER 865, [1997] QB 1004, [1997] 3 WLR 331, CA.
Croft v Broadstairs & St Peter's Town Council [2003] EWCA Civ 676.
Cutler v Wandsworth Stadium Ltd [1949] 1 All ER 544, [1949] AC 398, HL.
Daiichi UK Ltd v Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty [2003] EWHC 2337 (QB), [2005] 1 BCLC 27, [2004] 1 WLR 1503.
Devon and Somerset Farmers Ltd, Re [1994] 1 All ER 717, [1994] Ch 57, [1994] 3 WLR 866.
DPP v Ramsdale [2001] EWHC Admin 106, DC.
DPP v Dziurzynski [2002] EWHC 1380 (Admin), (2002) Times, 8 July, DC.
Dyer v Munday [1895] 1 QB 742, [1895–9] All ER Rep 1022, CA.
Eastwood v Magnox Electric plc, McCabe v Cornwall CC [2004] UKHL 35, [2004] 3 All ER 991, [2005] 1 AC 503, [2004] 3 WLR 322.
Fraser v The State Hospitals Board for Scotland (11 July 2000, unreported), Ct of Sess (OH).
French v Chief Constable of Sussex Police [2006] EWCA Civ 312, [2006] All ER (D) 407 (Mar).
Garrett v London Borough of Camden [2001] EWCA Civ 395.
Grieves v FT Everard & Sons [2006] EWCA Civ 27.
Hartman v South Essex Mental Health and Community Care NHS Trust [2005] EWCA Civ 6, [2005] IRLR 293, [2005] ICR 782.
Hatton v Sutherland [2002] EWCA Civ 76, [2002] 2 All ER 1, [2002] ICR 613.
Hicks v Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 2 All ER 65, HL.
Hilton International Hotels (UK) Ltd v Protopapa [1990] IRLR 316, EAT.
Hinz v Berry [1970] 1 All ER 1074, [1970] 2 QB 40, [1970] 2 WLR 684, CA.
Howlett v Holding [2006] EWHC 41 (QB), [2006] All ER (D) 162 (Jan).
Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd, Hunter v London Docklands Development Corp [1997] 2 All ER 426, [1997] AC 655, [1997] 2 WLR 684, HL.
Huntingdon Life Sciences v Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty [2003] EWHC 1967 (QB).
Ilkiw v Samuels [1963] 2 All ER 879, [1963] 1 WLR 991, CA.
Jacobi v Griffiths [1999] 4 LRC 348, (1999) 174 DLR (4th) 71, Can SC.
Jarvis v Swan Tours Ltd [1973] 1 All ER 71, [1973] QB 233, CA.
Jones v Tower Boots Co Ltd [1997] 2 All ER 406, [1997] ICR 254, CA.
Kelly v Hennessy [1995] 3 IR 253.
Khorasandjin v Bush [1993] 3 All ER 669, [1993] QB 727, [1993] 3 WLR 476, CA.
Lynch v Knight (1861) 9 HL Cas 577, [1861–73] All ER Rep Ext 2344.
Marc Rich & Co AG v Bishop Rock Marine Co Ltd, The Nicholas H [1995] 3 All ER 307, [1996] AC 211, [1995] 3 WLR 227, HL.
McCall v Abelesz [1976] 1 All ER 727, [1976] QB 585, [1976] 2 WLR 151, CA.
McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961, [2000] 2 AC 59, [1999] 3 WLR 1301, HL.
McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298, [1983] 1 AC 410, [1982] 2 WLR 982, HL.

Meridian Global Funds Management Asia Ltd v Securities Commission [1995] 3 All ER 918, [1995] 2 AC 500, [1995] 3 WLR 413, PC.
Mount Isa Mines Ltd v Pusey (1970) 125 CLR 383, Aus HC.
NWL Ltd v Woods, NWL Ltd v Nelson [1979] 3 All ER 614, [1979] ICR 867, [1979] 1 WLR 1294, HL.
Page v Smith [1995] 2 All ER 736, [1996] AC 155, [1995] 2 WLR 644, HL.
Percy v Glasgow Corp [1922] 2 AC 299, HL.
Phelps v London Borough of Hillingdon, Anderton v Clwyd CC, Jarvis v Hampshire CC, Re G (a minor) [2000] 4 All ER 504, [2001] 2 AC 619, [2000] 3 WLR 776, HL.
Pidduck v Molloy [1992] 1 FCR 418, CA.
Potter v Price [2004] EWHC 781 (QB).
Potts v Reid [1942] 2 All ER 161, [1943] AC 1, HL.
Pratley v Surrey CC [2003] EWCA Civ 1067, [2003] IRLR 794, [2004] ICR 159, CA.
Pratt v DPP [2001] EWHC Admin 483, (2001) 165 JP 800, DC.
R v British Steel plc [1995] IRLR 310, [1995] ICR 586, [1995] 1 WLR 1356, CA.
R v Colohan [2001] EWCA Crim 1251, [2001] 3 FCR 409.
R v Ireland, R v Burstow [1997] 4 All ER 225, [1998] AC 147, [1997] 3 WLR 534, HL.
R v Nelson Group Services (Maintenance) Ltd [1998] 4 All ER 331, [1999] 1 WLR 1526, CA.
R (on the application of Jackson) v A-G [2005] UKHL 56, [2005] 4 All ER 1253, [2006] 1 AC 262, [2005] 3 WLR 733.
Racz v Home Office [1994] 1 All ER 97, [1994] 2 AC 45, [1994] 2 WLR 23, HL.
Reilly v Merseyside Health Authority [1995] 6 Med LR 246, CA.
Rhodes v Canadian National Railway (1990) 75 DLR (4th) 248, BC CA.
Robinson v St Helens Metropolitan Borough Council [2002] EWCA Civ 1099, [2003] PIQR P 128, CA.
Rorrison v West Lothian College 2000 SCLR 245, Ct of Sess (OH).
Rose v Plenty [1976] 1 All ER 97, [1975] ICR 430, [1976] 1 WLR 141, CA.
Sharma v Jay [2003] EWHC 1380 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 284 (Apr).
Shelley v Cunane [1983] FSR 390.
Simpson v Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd 1983 SLT 601, Ct of Sess.
Stanbury v Exeter Corp [1905] 2 KB 838, [1904–7] All ER Rep Ext 1401.
Stovin v Wise [1996] 3 All ER 801, [1996] AC 923, [1996] 3 WLR 388, HL.
Stubbings v Webb [1993] 1 All ER 322, [1993] AC 498, [1993] 2 WLR 120, HL.
Swain v Hillman [2001] 1 All ER 91, CA.
Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Nattrass [1971] 2 All ER 127, [1972] AC 153, [1971] 2 WLR 1166, HL.
The Queen v Moffat [2000] NZCA 252, NZ CA.
Thomas v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1233, [2002] EMLR 78.
Three Rivers DC v Bank of England (No 3) [2003] 3 All ER 1, [2003] 2 AC 1, [2000] 2 WLR 1220, HL.
Tuppen v Microsoft Corp Ltd (14 July 2000, unreported).
Vahidi v Fairstead House School Trust Ltd [2005] EWCA Civ 765.
Vento v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police [2002] EWCA Civ 1871, [2003] IRLR 102, [2003] ICR 318.
Wainwright v Home Office [2003] UKHL 53, [2003] 4 All ER 969, [2004] 2 AC 406, [2003] 3 WLR 1137.
Waters v Metropolitan Police Comr [2000] 4 All ER 934, [2000] ICR 1064, [2000] 1 WLR 1607, HL.
Wenlock v Maloney [1965] 2 All ER 871, [1965] 1 WLR 1238, CA.

White v Chief Constable of Sussex Police [1999] 1 All ER 1, [1999] 2 AC 455, [1998] 3 WLR 1509, HL.
Wigan BC v Davies [1979] IRLR 127, [1979] ICR 411, EAT.
Wong v Parkside Health NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 1721, [2003] 3 All ER 932.
X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633, [1995] 3 WLR 152, HL.
Young v Post Office [2002] EWCA Civ 661, [2002] IRLR 660.

Appeal

The defendant, Guy's and St Thomas' NHS Trust, appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 7 July 2005 from the order of the Court of Appeal (Auld and May LJJ, Scott Baker LJ dissenting) on 16 March 2005 ([2005] EWCA (Civ) 251, [2005] IRLR 340, [2005] QB 848) allowing an appeal by the claimant, William Majrowski, from the order of Judge Collins in Central London County Court on 24 February 2004 striking out, as showing no reasonable cause of action, proceedings for damages brought by Mr Majrowski against the trust under s 3 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

Mark Turner QC and David Platt (instructed by Berrymans Lace Mawer) for the trust.
Robin Allen QC, William Latimer-Sayer and Hannah Godfrey (instructed by Reynolds Williams, Poole) for Mr Majrowski.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

12 July 2006. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[1] My Lords, the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 prohibits harassment. A person must not pursue a course of conduct which amounts to harassment of another. A breach of this prohibition may be the subject, amongst other matters, of a claim for damages. The question raised by this appeal is whether an employer is vicariously liable for harassment committed by an employee in the course of his employment.

[2] The harassment in this case concerns two employees of Guy's and St Thomas's NHS Trust (the trust). In November 1998 the trust employed William Majrowski as a clinical auditor co-ordinator. His departmental manager was Mrs Sandra Freeman. Mr Majrowski was not happy with the way she treated him. He claimed she bullied and intimidated him. She was, he said, rude and abusive to him in front of other staff. She was excessively critical of his time-keeping and work. She imposed unrealistic performance targets for him and threatened him with disciplinary action if he failed to meet them. She isolated him by refusing to talk to him. This treatment, he said, was fuelled by homophobia: he is a gay man.

[3] On 20 April 1998 Mr Majrowski made a formal complaint of harassment against Mrs Freeman. The trust investigated this in accordance with its anti-harassment policy. The investigation resulted in a finding that harassment had occurred. Subsequently, on 7 June 1999 the trust dismissed Mr Majrowski for reasons unrelated to the circumstances of this case.

[4] Nearly four years later, on 13 February 2003 Mr Majrowski commenced these proceedings against the trust. He claimed damages pursuant to s 3 of the 1997 Act for distress and anxiety and consequential losses caused by the harassment he suffered while employed by the trust. Mrs Freeman, he said, was at all times acting in the course of her employment by the trust. He made no claim against Mrs Freeman herself. Nor did he make any claim against the trust for negligence or breach of his contract of employment. His claim was based exclusively on the trust's vicarious liability for Mrs Freeman's alleged breach of the statutory prohibition of harassment.

[5] The proceedings were struck out summarily by Judge Collins CBE sitting at the Central London County Court on 24 February 2004. He held that the 1997 Act was not designed to create another level of liability in employment law. Employees are already adequately protected by the common law.

[6] Mr Majrowski appealed. The appeal was heard by the Court of Appeal, comprising Auld, May and Scott Baker LJJ ([2005] EWCA Civ 251, [2005] IRLR 340, [2005] QB 848, [2005] 2 WLR 1503). On 16 March 2005, by a majority of two to one, Scott Baker LJ dissenting in part, the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. The case should be permitted to go to trial. The court would then have to determine whether Mrs Freeman did harass Mr Majrowski within the meaning of the 1997 Act in the ways he alleged. The trust has now appealed to your Lordships' House.

VICARIOUS LIABILITY AND STATUTORY OBLIGATIONS

[7] Vicarious liability is a common law principle of strict, no-fault liability. Under this principle a blameless employer is liable for a wrong committed by his employee while the latter is about his employer's business. The time-honoured phrase is 'while acting in the course of his employment'. It is thus a form of secondary liability. The primary liability is that of the employee who committed the wrong. (To a limited extent vicarious liability may also exist outside the employment relationship, for instance, in some cases of agency. For present purposes these other instances can be put aside.)

[8] This principle of vicarious liability is at odds with the general approach of the common law. Normally common law wrongs, or torts, comprise particular types of conduct regarded by the common law as blameworthy. In respect of these wrongs the common law imposes liability on the wrongdoer himself. The general approach is that a person is liable only for his own acts.

[9] Whatever its historical origin, this common law principle of strict liability for another person's wrongs finds its rationale today in a combination of policy factors. They are summarised in Professor Fleming's Law of Torts (9th edn, 1998) pp 409–410. Stated shortly, these factors are that all forms of economic activity carry a risk of harm to others, and fairness requires that those responsible for such activities should be liable to persons suffering loss from wrongs committed in the conduct of the enterprise. This is 'fair', because it means injured persons can look for recompense to a source better placed financially than individual wrongdoing employees. It means also that the financial loss arising from the wrongs can be spread more widely, by liability insurance and higher prices. In addition, and importantly, imposing strict liability on employers encourages them to maintain standards of 'good practice' by their employees. For these reasons employers are to be held liable for wrongs committed by their employees in the course of their employment.

[10] With these policy considerations in mind, it is difficult to see a coherent basis for confining the common law principle of vicarious liability to common law wrongs. The rationale underlying the principle holds good for equitable wrongs. The rationale also holds good for a wrong comprising a breach of a statutory duty or prohibition which gives rise to civil liability, provided always the statute does not expressly or impliedly indicate otherwise. A precondition of vicarious liability is that the wrong must be committed by an employee in the course of his employment. A wrong is committed in the course of employment only if the conduct is so closely connected with acts the employee is authorised to do that, for the purposes of the liability of the employer to third parties, the wrongful conduct may fairly and properly be regarded as done by the employee while acting in the course of his employment: see Lister v Hesley Hall Ltd [2001] UKHL 22 at [69], [2001] 2 All ER 769 at [69], [2002] 1 AC 215, per Lord Millett, and Dubai Aluminium Co Ltd v Salaam [2002] UKHL 48 at [23], [2003] 1 All ER 97 at [23], [2003] 2 AC 366. If this prerequisite is satisfied the policy reasons underlying the common law principle are as much applicable to equitable wrongs and breaches of statutory obligations as they are to common law torts.

[11] This approach accords with the trend of judicial decisions and observations and also academic writings. In the Dubai Aluminium case, your Lordships' House applied the principle of vicarious liability to an equitable wrong. In the shot-firing case of Harrison v National Coal Board [1951] 1 All ER 1102 at 1120, [1951] AC 639 at 671, Lord MacDermott observed:

> 'Vicarious liability is not confined to common law negligence. It arises from the servant's tortious act in the scope of his employment and there can now be no doubt that [the employee] breaking the shot-firing regulations committed a tort.'

In the following year Lord Guthrie, sitting in the Court of Session, followed this observation when deciding the shot-firing case of Nicol v National Coal Board (1952) 102 L Jo 357. In the further shot-firing case of National Coal Board v England [1954] 1 All ER 546 at 554, [1954] AC 403 at 422, Lord Oaksey expressed approval of Lord Guthrie's decision:

> 'Unless there is something in the statute which creates the obligation indicating the intention that no action shall be brought at common law in respect of its breach, the ordinary rules of the common law of tort are applicable, including the doctrine respondeat superior.'

In Canada Craig JA expressed a similar view in the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Re Nelson and Byron Price & Associates Ltd (1981) 122 DLR (3d) 340 at 347. So did Professor Atiyah in his well-known book Vicarious Liability in the Law of Torts (1967) pp 280–284. Like opinions are expressed in Fleming Law of Torts (9th edn 1998) p 567, and Clerk and Lindsell on Torts (18th edn, 2000) p 249 (para 5-47), and see also 19th edition (2006) p 352 (para 6-51).

[12] The sole reported exception to this trend appears to be the decision of the High Court of Australia in Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co v Long (1956) 97 CLR 36. In that case a regulation, reg 31, prescribed precautions which should be observed before loading or unloading a ship. In default a penalty was imposed on the person in charge. The High Court held the employer of the person in charge was not liable for the latter's breach of the regulations.

[13] Their Honours did not speak with one voice. There are two principal strands in their reasoning. Neither assists on the broad issue before your Lordships' House. The first strand concerned the interpretation of reg 31. The regulation imposed liability on the person in charge. To impose vicarious liability on his employer would give the regulation an operation not justified by its provisions.

[14] The second strand of reasoning was more general. The principle of vicarious liability imposes upon an employer liability for his employee's acts, not his wrongs. Vicarious liability exists not because the employee is liable but because of what the employee has done. Regulation 31 imposed no duty on the employer. The duty was imposed solely on the person in charge. So imputing his acts to the employer did not give rise to a claim against the employer.

[15] In times past this 'employer's tort' analysis of vicarious liability had respectable support in England. But since then your Lordships' House has firmly discarded this basis in favour of the 'employee's tort' approach. An employer's liability is not confined to responsibility for acts done by an employee in the course of his employment. An employer's liability goes further. He is liable for the wrongs of his employee committed in the course of employment. Reasons of policy so dictate. The employee's wrong is imputed to the employer: see Staveley Iron and Chemical Co Ltd v Jones [1956] 1 All ER 403, [1956] AC 627 and Imperial Chemical Industries Ltd v Shatwell [1964] 2 All ER 999, [1965] AC 656. This approach has received wide academic support: Fleming Law of Torts, p 412, Clerk and Lindsell on Torts p 351 (para 6-50), Markesinis and Deakin's Tort Law (5th edn, 2003) p 582, Salmond and Heuston Law of Torts (21st edn, 1996) pp 431–433, and Munkman on Employer's Liability (13th edn, 2001) p 114. In this country this approach is now settled law. It seems likely this is also the law in Australia: see Hollis v Vabu Pty Ltd [2002] 1 LRC 93 at 110 (paras 34–35).

[16] One further general question should be noted on the interpretation of statutory provisions in this context. The question can be framed this way. Does employers' vicarious liability arise unless the statutory provision expressly or impliedly excludes such liability? Or does employers' liability arise only if the statutory provision expressly or impliedly envisages such liability may arise? As already indicated, I prefer the first alternative. It is more consistent with the general rule that employers are liable for wrongs committed by employees in the course of their employment. The general rule should apply in respect of wrongs having a statutory source unless the statute displaces the ordinary rule. This accords with the approach adopted by Lord Oaksey in the passage cited above from National Coal Board v England [1954] 1 All ER 546 at 554, [1954] AC 403 at 422.

[17] Accordingly on this point I agree with the Court of Appeal. Unless the statute expressly or impliedly indicates otherwise, the principle of vicarious liability is applicable where an employee commits a breach of a statutory obligation sounding in damages while acting in the course of his employment.

THE 1997 ACT

[18] I turn to the material provisions of the 1997 Act. The purpose of this statute is to protect victims of harassment, whatever form the harassment takes, wherever it occurs and whatever its motivation. The Act seeks to provide protection against stalkers, racial abusers, disruptive neighbours, bullying at work and so forth. Section 1 prohibits harassment in these terms:

> '(1) A person must not pursue a course of conduct—(a) which amounts to harassment of another, and (b) which he knows or ought to know amounts to harassment of the other.

> (2) For the purposes of this section, the person whose course of conduct is in question ought to know that it amounts to harassment of another if a reasonable person in possession of the same information would think the course of conduct amounted to harassment of the other.'

Certain courses of conduct are excepted: where the course was pursued for the purpose of preventing or detecting crime, or was pursued under any enactment or rule of law, or where in the circumstances it was reasonable to pursue the course of conduct: s 1(3). Harassment is not defined in the Act, but it includes causing anxiety or distress. A course of conduct means conduct on at least two occasions: s 7(2), (3). Harassment may be of more than one person.

[19] This statutory prohibition applies as much between an employer and an employee as it does between any other two persons. Further, it is now tolerably clear that, although the victim must be an individual, the perpetrator may be a corporate body.

[20] Section 2 creates the criminal offence of harassment. The offence comprises pursuit of a course of conduct in breach of s 1. Criminal proceedings can deal only with offences which have been committed. Section 3 goes further. Section 3 affords victims a civil remedy in respect both of actual breaches of s 1 and also threatened breaches. For instance, a single act of harassment may have occurred, not in itself a course of conduct, and the victim may fear repetition. Section 3 provides:

> '(1) An actual or apprehended breach of section 1 may be the subject of a claim in civil proceedings by the person who is or may be the victim of the course of conduct in question.
>
> (2) On such a claim, damages may be awarded for (among other things) any anxiety caused by the harassment and any financial loss resulting from the harassment.'

Subsequent provisions in the section make plain that the court may grant an injunction for the purpose of restraining a defendant from pursuing any conduct which amounts to harassment. Breach, without reasonable excuse, of such an injunction is itself a criminal offence: sub-s (6).

[21] The trust, relying on the permissive 'may' in s 3(2), submitted that an award of damages under this section is discretionary. A claimant is not entitled to damages as of right. Hence, it was said, harassment cannot be equated with a common law tort.

[22] I do not agree. The effect of s 3(1) is to render a breach of s 1 a wrong giving rise to the ordinary remedies the law provides for civil wrongs. This includes an entitlement to damages for any loss or damage sustained by a victim by reason of the wrong. Ordinary principles of causation and mitigation and the like apply. Subsection (2) is consistent with this understanding of the section. The phrase 'among other things' assumes that damages are recoverable. The enabling language ('may be awarded') is apt simply to extend or clarify the heads of damage or loss for which damages are recoverable.

VICARIOUS LIABILITY AND HARASSMENT

[23] Against that legislative background I turn to the trust's case. The principal thrust of the trust's submissions is that the 1997 Act was primarily a legislative response to the public order problem of stalking. The Act was not aimed at the workplace. It is a public order provision designed to punish perpetrators for the anxiety and upset they cause to victims, not blameless employers who happen to be solvent and available as a target for litigation. Vicarious liability would have consequences for employers which Parliament cannot have intended. Vicarious liability would mean that a blameless employer would be liable in damages in respect of a cause of action wherein damages are recoverable for anxiety short of personal injury, foreseeability of damage is not an essential ingredient, and the limitation period is six years and not the usual period applicable to personal injury claims. The deterrent effect of ordering the perpetrator to pay compensation would be undermined by drawing litigation away from the very person guilty of the offence. Vicarious liability would increase very considerably the volume of claims based on stress, anxiety or other emotional problems at work. The courts would be unable to strike out unmeritorious claims. The burden on employers, insurers and the administration of justice would be wholly unjustified.

[24] I am not persuaded by these arguments. Neither the terms nor the practical effect of this legislation indicate that Parliament intended to exclude the ordinary principle of vicarious liability.

[25] As to the terms of the legislation, by s 3 Parliament created a new cause of action, a new civil wrong. Damages are one of the remedies for this wrong, although they are not the primary remedy. Parliament has spelled out some particular features of this new wrong: anxiety is a head of damage, the limitation period is six years, and so on. These features do not in themselves indicate an intention to exclude vicarious liability. Vicarious liability arises only if the new wrong is committed by an employee in the course of his employment, as already described. The acts of the employee must meet the 'close connection' test. If an employee's acts of harassment meet this test, I am at a loss to see why these particular features of this newly created wrong should be thought to place this wrong in a special category in which an employer is exempt from vicarious liability. It is true that this new wrong usually comprises conduct of an intensely personal character between two individuals. But this feature may also be present with other wrongs which attract vicarious liability, such as assault.

[26] Nor does imposition of criminal liability only on the perpetrator of the wrong, and on a person who aids, abets, counsels or procures the harassing conduct, point to a different conclusion. Conversion, assault and battery may attract criminal liability as well as civil liability, but this does not exclude vicarious liability.

[27] I turn to the practical effect of the legislation. Vicarious liability for an employee's harassment of another person, whether a fellow employee or not, will to some extent increase employers' burdens. That is clear. But, here again, this does not suffice to show Parliament intended to exclude the ordinary common law principle of vicarious liability. Parliament added harassment to the list of civil wrongs. Parliament did so because it considered the existing law provided insufficient protection for victims of harassment. The inevitable consequence of Parliament creating this new wrong of universal application is that at times an employee will commit this wrong in the course of his employment. This prompts the question: why should an employer have a special dispensation in respect of the newly-created wrong and not be liable if an employee commits this wrong in the course of his employment? The contemporary rationale of employers' vicarious liability is as applicable to this new wrong as it is to common law torts.

[28] Take a case where an employee, in the course of his employment, harasses a non-employee, such as a customer of the employer. In such a case the employer would be liable if his employee had assaulted the customer. Why should this not equally be so in respect of harassment? In principle, harassment arising from a dispute between two employees stands on the same footing. If, acting in the course of his employment, one employee assaults another, the employer is liable. Why should harassment be treated differently?

[29] As I see it, the matter of most concern to employers is the prospect of abuse in cases of alleged workplace harassment. Employers fear the prospect of a multiplicity of unfounded, speculative claims if they are vicariously liable for employees' harassment. Disgruntled employees or ex-employees, perhaps suffering from stress at work unrelated to harassment, perhaps bitter at being dismissed, will all too readily advance unmeritorious claims for compensation for harassment. Internal grievance procedures will not always satisfy an employee who is nursing a grievance. Although awards of damages for anxiety under the 1997 Act will normally be modest, a claimant may well pursue his present or erstwhile employer, not the alleged wrongdoer himself. The claim may be put forward for the first time years after the alleged harassment is said to have occurred. The alleged perpetrator may no longer be with the employer and may not be traceable.

[30] This is a real and understandable concern. But these difficulties, and the prospect of abuse, are not sufficient reasons for excluding vicarious liability. To exclude liability on these grounds would be, to use the hackneyed phrase, to throw the baby out with the bathwater. It would mean that where serious harassment by an employee in the course of his employment has occurred, the victim—who may not be a fellow employee—would not have the right normally provided by the law to persons who suffer a wrong in that circumstance, namely, the right to have recourse to the wrongdoer's employer. The possibility of abuse is not a good reason for denying that right. Courts are well able to separate the wheat from the chaff at an early stage of the proceedings. They should be astute to do so. In most cases courts should have little difficulty in applying the 'close connection' test. Where the claim meets that requirement, and the quality of the conduct said to constitute harassment is being examined, courts will have in mind that irritations, annoyances, even a measure of upset, arise at times in everybody's day-to-day dealings with other people. Courts are well able to recognise the boundary between conduct which is unattractive, even unreasonable, and conduct which is oppressive and unacceptable. To cross the boundary from the regrettable to the unacceptable the gravity of the misconduct must be of an order which would sustain criminal liability under s 2.

THE OVERLAP WITH THE EC DISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION

[31] I turn next to a difficult part of the case. The trust placed reliance on the overlap which exists between the harassment provisions in the 1997 Act and the harassment provisions in the series of non-discrimination regulations introduced to give effect to Council Directives (EC) 2000/43 (implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin) (OJ 2000 L180 p 22)), 2000/78 (establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation) (OJ 2000 L303 p 16) and 2002/73 (OJ 2002 L269 p 15). These directives were made pursuant to a new non-discrimination article, art 13 EC, inserted into the Treaty on European Union by the Amsterdam Treaty in 1997. The Amsterdam Treaty came into force on 1 May 1999. The directives established a common framework for tackling discrimination on six specific grounds: sex, race, disability, sexual orientation, religion or belief, and age. a [32] One example of the overlap will suffice. On the relevant point the several regulations are substantially to the same effect. The Race Relations Act 1976 (Amendment) Regulations 2003, SI 2003/1626 inserted into the Race Relations Act 1976 new provisions regarding harassment. The effect of s 4(2A), read with s 3A, is that it is unlawful for an employer to subject an employee to harassment b on the grounds of race or ethnic or national origins. Harassment means, in short, engaging in unwanted conduct which has the purpose or effect of violating another person's dignity or creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive environment for another person. Section 32, which was part of the statute as originally enacted in 1976, provides that anything done by a person in the course of his employment shall be treated as done by his employer c as well as by him, subject to the 'employer's defence', as it is known colloquially. The employer's defence is that in proceedings brought against an employer in respect of an act alleged to have been done by an employee the employer has a defence where he can prove he took such steps as were reasonably practicable to prevent the employee from doing that act or acts of that description: s 32(3). The d trust contrasted the availability of this defence in proceedings brought under the 1976 Act with the position under the 1997 Act if an employer is strictly liable under the 1997 Act for harassment committed by his employees in the course of their employment. The contrast means that if an employer's liability under the 1997 Act is strict, victims of racial harassment can in some circumstances bypass the defence intended to be available to employers under the amendments made e to the 1976 Act. Victims can do so by taking the simple step of bringing their harassment claims under the 1997 Act. By this means victims can also bypass the strict time limits applicable to discrimination claims.

[33] Had the amending regulations of 2003 been made before the 1997 Act was enacted this would have been a telling point. But they were not. In short the f historical explanation of how it comes about that the employer's defence is available in harassment claims brought under the 1976 Act is as follows.

[34] The employer's defence seems to have had its origin in s 13 of the Race Relations Act 1968. Employers were subject to non-discrimination obligations. But these obligations were qualified. Acts done by an employee in the course of g his employment were to be treated as done by his employer, subject to the employer being able to show he had taken all reasonably practicable steps to prevent his employee doing such acts. Harassment was not mentioned in this 1968 statute. In due course the employer's defence was brought forward into s 32 of the 1976 Act. That is the starting point.

[35] The next step was that Directive 2000/43 made provision for putting the h principle of equal treatment into effect in member states. For the purposes of this directive equal treatment means there should be no discrimination based on racial or ethnic origin. Harassment related to racial or ethnic origin is deemed to be discrimination for this purpose: art 2(3).

[36] The final step was that, as one would expect, effect was given to this j directive in this country by making appropriate amendments to the existing race discrimination legislation, namely, the 1976 Act. Harassment by an employer is deemed by the directive to be discrimination, and so harassment was treated in this country's legislation on much the same footing as discrimination. Accordingly the employer's defence was applied to acts of harassment in the same way as it already applied to acts of discrimination.

[37] The legislative history regarding harassment on grounds of sex or disability is essentially similar. Amendments were made by regulations to the existing discrimination legislation: the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. Both those statutes already included provision for the employer's defence in respect of discrimination claims. There was no discrimination legislation already in existence regarding sexual orientation, religion or belief, or age. In these cases corresponding provision was made by regulations which have to stand on their own feet.

[38] Given this history, the existence of the employer's defence in the discrimination legislation, embracing harassment as it now does pursuant to the requirements of the directives, and the absence of such a defence from the (earlier) 1997 Act, does not assist materially in the interpretation of the 1997 Act. The discrimination legislation, as it existed in 1997, is too removed from harassment for the inclusion of the employer's defence in that legislation to throw any light on the interpretation of the 1997 Act. The accretion of harassment to the discrimination legislation derives from the directives and came later.

[39] Although these later amendments to the discrimination legislation do not assist in the interpretation of the 1997 Act, it must be acknowledged that in the fields they cover they have produced a discordant and unsatisfactory overlap with the 1997 Act.

SCOTLAND

[40] A final point should be noted on the interpretation of the 1997 Act. Sections 1–7 of the 1997 Act apply to England and Wales. Sections 8–11 make corresponding provision for Scotland. During the oral hearing of this appeal my noble and learned friend Lord Hope of Craighead drew attention to s 10. Section 10 inserts a new section, s 18B, into the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973. As explained by Lord Hope in his speech, the new s 18B envisages that the employer of a person responsible for harassment may be the defender in an action of harassment. In other words, s 18B appears to assume that in Scotland an employer may be vicariously liable. This is confirmatory of the conclusion expressed above regarding England and Wales. Parliament cannot have intended that in this respect the position would be different north and south of the border.

[41] I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[42] My Lords, the question in this case is whether an employer may be held vicariously liable in damages under s 3 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 for a course of conduct by one of its employees which amounts to harassment in breach of s 1 of that Act. Underlying this question there is a broader issue. This is whether an employer may be vicariously liable for a breach of a statutory duty imposed only on his employee. But the Court of Appeal ([2005] EWCA Civ 251, [2005] IRLR 340, [2005] QB 848, [2005] 2 WLR 1503) held unanimously that in general an employer may be vicariously liable for a breach of statutory duty imposed on the employee which is committed in the course of his employment, and Mr Turner QC for the appellant NHS trust accepted that he could not succeed on that issue in his appeal to this House. So the question which has to be decided by your Lordships has been confined to the narrow issue. This is whether conduct by an employee in breach of s 3 of the 1997 Act is conduct for which the employer may be vicariously liable.

[43] Had it not been for the fact that the wording of the Act itself provides the answer, I would have found it hard to disagree with the reasons which Scott Baker LJ gave in his dissenting opinion in the Court of Appeal for answering this question in the negative. He said (at [113]) that the statutory duty which the Act imposed was personal in nature, that it was difficult to envisage circumstances in which it would be just and reasonable to hold an employer vicariously liable and that he did not think, viewing the statute as a whole, that it was Parliament's intention that an employee should be vicariously liable. It seemed to me that there were indeed powerful reasons for thinking that Parliament intended that liability in damages should be personal to the perpetrator of the harassment and that it should not be extended to his employer, if any, under the doctrine of vicarious liability. My noble and learned friend Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, whose speech I have had the advantage of reading in draft, has subjected them all to careful scrutiny. While I respectfully agree with the conclusions that he has reached, the issue nevertheless seems to me to be finely balanced and far from easy to decide.

[44] But in my opinion there is no escape from the fact that the statute when viewed as a whole includes ss 8–11, which provide for a new civil wrong of harassment extending only to Scotland, as well as ss 1–7 which extend only to England and Wales. For perfectly understandable reasons, it was to the provisions relating to England and Wales that the judges in the courts below directed their attention. Overlooked by everybody (including, it appears, A Barron 'Vicarious Liability for Employees and Agents' 2006 SLT (News) 79 in his comments on this case from the Scottish viewpoint at p 82), until attention was drawn to it in the course of Mr Turner's very attractive oral argument, is a phrase which appears in s 10(1) of the 1997 Act which deals with the limitation of actions of harassment in Scotland. This subsection provides:

> 'After section 18A of the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 there is inserted the following section—
>
> "18B Actions of harassment
>
> (1) This section applies to actions of harassment (within the meaning of section 8 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997) which include a claim for damages.
>
> (2) Subject to subsection (3) below and to section 19A of this Act, no action to which this section applies shall be brought unless it is commenced within a period of 3 years after—(a) the date on which the alleged harassment ceased; or (b) the date, (if later than the date mentioned in paragraph (a) above) on which the pursuer in the action became, or on which, in the opinion of the court, it would have been reasonably practicable for him in all the circumstances to have become, aware, that the defender was a person responsible for the alleged harassment or the employer or principal of such a person.
>
> (3) In the computation of the period specified in subsection (2) above there shall be disregarded any time during which the person who is alleged to have suffered the harassment was under legal disability by reason of nonage or unsoundness of mind.' (My emphasis.)

[45] For reasons that I must now explain, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the effect of the phrase 'or the employer or principal of such a person' in s 18B of the 1973 Act is to show that it was the intention of Parliament that it was to be open to the court, in appropriate circumstances, to find an employer vicariously liable in damages to the victim of a course of conduct amounting to harassment in breach of the relevant provision of the 1997 Act where the person responsible was an employee.

SECTION 18B OF THE 1973 ACT: THE STATUTORY CONTEXT

[46] It is necessary first to explain how s 18B of the 1973 Act fits into the system for the prescription of obligations and limitation of actions in Scots law. It is clear that a decision had to be taken as to how the action for harassment was to be accommodated in the Scottish system. Section 6 of the 1997 Act contains the provision about limitation that was thought appropriate for England and Wales. It provides simply that in s 11 of the Limitation Act 1980 there was to be inserted a new sub-s (1A) to the effect that that section was not to apply to any action brought for damages under s 3 of the 1997 Act. The effect of that provision is that an action brought under s 3 of the 1997 in England and Wales is subject to a six-year time limit. It is unnecessary for this purpose to decide whether the action is to be classified as founded on tort and or is for a sum recoverable by statute, as the time limit in both of these cases is the same: ss 2 and 9 of the 1980 Act. Mr Turner submitted that the right to claim damages in s 3 of the 1997 Act did not create a new tort. In my opinion it did, just as the equivalent remedy which it created for Scotland is properly classified as a delictual one. But in any event the solution that was thought appropriate for England and Wales could not be fitted in to the system which limits the time within which claims may be brought in Scotland, as Scots law does not have a six-year time limit equivalent to that which is to be found in the 1980 Act.

[47] The rules by which a right or a claim is extinguished after the lapse of a given time limit in Scotland are to be found in what is known as the law of prescription. Until the law was reformed by the 1973 Act these rules were set out in a series of Acts of the pre-Union Scottish Parliament, of which the most important was the Prescription Act 1469 which introduced the long negative prescription of 20 years. On the one hand there is the positive prescription, by which rights to land are fortified and rendered unchallengeable by the exclusion of all objections thereto after the lapse of a given time limit. On the other there are the negative prescriptions, by which rights of various kinds are extinguished after the expiry of the relevant prescriptive period. But Scots law has also adopted from English law the concept of limitation, the effect of which is not to extinguish claims but to render them unenforceable after a stated period. This system was introduced into Scots law by the Law Reform (Limitation of Actions) (Scotland) Act 1954 for actions of damages for personal injury or death in consequence of personal injury. As its short title indicates, the 1973 Act has retained these two concepts. Part I of the Act reforms the law of prescription. Part II of the Act, as amended by s 2 of the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1984, preserves the system of limitation of actions.

[48] For present purposes all that needs to be said is that the first choice that had to be made was whether actions of harassment should be subject to the five-year negative prescription or to the limitation system. Actions of damages for harassment of the kind contemplated by s 8 of the 1997 Act would have been subject to the five-year negative prescription provided in Pt I of the 1973 Act (see s 6 read with para 1(d) of Sch 1), had it not been for the amendment which is contained in s 10(1) of the 1997 Act. The effect of that amendment is to bring these actions within the limitation system in Pt II of the 1973 Act, as amended.

[49] Once it had been decided that the limitation system was to be applied to these actions the draftsman had to decide how the amendment to the 1973 Act ought to be worded. Part II of that Act, as amended, already contained three separate limitation provisions. Section 17, as substituted by s 2 of the 1984 Act, applies to actions in respect of personal injuries not resulting in death. Section 18, as substituted by s 2 of the 1984 Act, applies to actions where death has resulted from personal injuries. Section 18A, which was inserted by s 12(2) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1985, introduced a three-year limitation on actions for defamation. The three-year period referred to in s 18A is not capable of being extended, except to allow for any time during which the person alleged to have been defamed was under legal disability by reason of nonage or unsoundness of mind. But the three-year periods referred to in ss 17 and 18 are capable of being extended so that the period runs from the date when the pursuer was, or should have been, aware of certain facts. The draftsman could have chosen an absolute limit of three years, subject only to an extension on the ground of legal disability, following the precedent set by s 18A. But he chose instead to follow the precedents set by ss 17 and 18 and to allow for a more generous extension of the three-year period of the kind for which they provide.

[50] Among the facts which are relevant to the question whether the three-year period in ss 17 and 18 of the 1973 Act should be extended are the identity of the person against whom the action should be brought. Section 17(2)(b)(iii) and s 18(2)(b)(ii) use the same formula to describe this fact. It is in these terms:

> 'that the defender was a person to whose act or omission the injuries were attributable in whole or in part or the employer or principal of such a person.'

The new s 18B which s 10(1) of the 1997 Act inserts into Pt II of the 1973 Act for actions of harassment adopts, with modifications, the same formula in sub-s (2)(b). It provides for it in these terms: 'that the defender was a person responsible for the alleged harassment or the employer or principal of such a person.'

DOES THIS FORMULA CONTEMPLATE VICARIOUS LIABILITY?

[51] There is no doubt that the purpose of the formula which is to be found in ss 17(2)(b)(iii) and 18(2)(b)(ii) of the 1973 Act was to accommodate claims based on the employer's vicarious liability by permitting an extension of the limitation period to the date when the pursuer became aware, or it would have been reasonably practicable for him to become aware, of the identity of the employer of the person to whose act or omission the injuries were attributable. As Lord President Cooper explained in Matuszczyk v National Coal Board 1953 SC 8 at 17–18, a case based on the principle of vicarious liability which would have been hopelessly irrelevant so long as the defence of common employment was available had by then become a relevant one:

> '... now that common employment has been abolished, the law of Scotland must be back where it was in Dixon v. Rankine ((1852) 14 D 420), which was disapproved in the Bartonshill case ((1858) 3 Macq 266); and we

a can again rely after a prolonged eclipse upon the well-known judgment of Lord Justice-Clerk Hope from which I take this sentence in which his Lordship is referring to the victim's fellow servants: "For their careful and cautious attention to duty, for their neglect of precautions by which danger to life may be caused, he (the employer) is just as much responsible as for such misconduct on his own part, if he were actually working or present." b In other words, so far as regards conduct within the scope of the servant's employment, there is no limit in the general case to the rule respondeat superior.'

[52] There is no doubt that the principle of vicarious liability is available where c the employee is in breach of a duty owed by him to his fellow employee at common law. That fact provides a sufficient explanation for the use of the formula in ss 17(2)(b)(iii) and 18(2)(b)(ii) of the 1973 Act. The relief which is to be found in these provisions against a strict application of the three-year limitation period would have been incomplete without it. The use of the same formula in s 18B(2)(b) for actions of harassment seems to lead inevitably to the conclusion d that it was the intention that the principle of vicarious liability should be available in actions of harassment also. That is the conclusion which David Johnston draws in Prescription and Limitation (1999) (para 11.16) where in his analysis of s 18B he writes:

e 'These provisions bear a certain resemblance to those on the limitation of actions for personal injuries under sections 17 and 18 of the 1973 Act. They are, however, much simpler. First, there is only one 'normal' date for the start of the limitation period, namely the date when the harassment ceased. This seems reasonable, since by definition what is being complained of is a course of conduct. Second, it is awareness of only one fact, namely the f identity of the defender (whether liable personally or vicariously) which may be material in order to postpone the start of the limitation period.' (My emphasis.)

[53] The remedy which Parliament has provided in cases of harassment is, of g course, a statutory remedy. Nevertheless it recognised in s 10 of the 1997 Act that in harassment cases, as in a case of personal injury caused by a breach of the employee's duty at common law, the employer may be vicariously liable for conduct of the employee that amounts to harassment under the statute. At first sight this might seem surprising, in view of the paucity of authority to show that h the doctrine of vicarious liability applies to duties laid on the employee by statute. Reported examples of cases where the principle of vicarious liability has been applied, without express statutory authority, to a breach of a statutory duty laid on the employee personally are hard to find. Statutory provisions providing for the safety, health and welfare of employees in the work place normally include j provisions which impose a direct duty on the employer in such circumstances, of which reg 32(2) of the Offshore Installations (Operational Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations 1976, SI 1976/1019 is an example: see MacMillan v Wimpey Offshore Engineers and Constructors Ltd 1991 SLT 515. It provides:

'It shall be the duty of the employer of an employee employed by him for work on or near an offshore installation to ensure that the employee > complies with any provision of these Regulations imposing a duty on him or expressly prohibiting him from doing a specified act.'

A provision to the same general effect was included, 'for the removal of doubts', in s 159 of the Mines and Quarries Act 1954.

[54] Questions as to whether the employer was vicariously liable had however been raised under the legislation relating to coal mines prior to the enactment of the 1954 Act. Sections 75 and 102(8) of the Coal Mines Act 1911 had the effect of absolving the owner of the mine from direct responsibility for any contravention or non-compliance with a provision of the Act if he could prove that he had taken all reasonable precautions to prevent it or that it was not reasonably practicable to avoid or prevent the breach. This left open the possibility that the only route by which a remedy could be obtained against the employer for breach of a statutory duty laid on the employee was by applying the strict doctrine of vicarious liability.

[55] In Harrison v National Coal Board [1951] 1 All ER 1102, [1951] AC 639 the question was raised, but not decided because an answer to it was unnecessary, whether the effect of the abolition of the doctrine of common employment was that a plaintiff could succeed against the owner on the basis of vicarious liability for a shot-firer's breach of his statutory duty not to fire without having first ascertained that all persons in the vicinity had taken proper shelter. Lord MacDermott said that vicarious liability was not confined to common law negligence:

> 'It arises from the servant's tortious act in the scope of his employment and there can be no doubt that [the servant] in breaking the shot-firing regulations committed a tort.' (See [1951] 1 All ER 1102 at 1120, [1951] AC 639 at 671.)

Although Lord MacDermott was alone in expressing that view, Lord Guthrie adopted and applied the same reasoning in another case where it was contended that the owner of the mine was liable vicariously for a shot-firer's breach of the regulations. In Nicol v National Coal Board (1952) 102 L Jo 357 he held that the fireman in doing his work as a shot-firer was acting in the course of his employment by the defenders and that the firing of the shots was the work which he was employed by the defenders to do:

> 'His failure to take the precautions that Parliament has required of him [in doing that work] did not take him outwith the scope of his employment. Accordingly, his acts were still within the area in which the vicarious liability of a master operates.'

[56] The issue was raised again in Matuszczyk's case. In that case however the pursuer's case was based on duties said to have been owed to him by the shot-firer at common law. The defenders' argument was that these duties had been superseded by the duties laid down by statutory regulation, for which the employer was not vicariously liable. The argument that, if the regulation was not complied with, the failure was a duty in statutory duty only which could not also be a failure in common law duty was rejected. Lord President Cooper (at 18) found it unnecessary to discuss whether a case could be made against the owner of the mine for a breach of the statutory duty laid upon the shot firer. But Lord Keith said (at 15) that his first impression was that the employers would be vicariously liable, whether the breach of duty was at common law or under statute. He observed that Lord MacDermott's observation to the same effect in Harrison's case had attracted sympathetic comment from Lord Porter, and that Lord Reid said that he was not prepared to dismiss the argument as unworthy of consideration.

[57] In National Coal Board v England [1954] 1 All ER 546, [1954] AC 403, which was another shot-firing case, the House again reserved its decision on the issue. But Lord Porter said ([1954] 1 All ER 546 at 550, [1954] AC 403 at 416) that Lord Guthrie's opinion in Nicol's case expressed the view which he held, which was that the shot firer's failure to take the precautions required of him by the regulation did not take him outwith the scope of his employment. Lord Oaksey said ([1954] 1 All ER 546 at 553, [1954] AC 403 at 421) that he agreed with Lord Guthrie's judgment in Nicol's case. He added this comment:

> 'Unless there is something in the statute which creates the obligation indicating the intention that no action shall be brought at common law in respect of its breach, the ordinary rules of the common law of tort are applicable, including the doctrine respondeat superior.' (See [1954] 1 All ER 546 at 554, [1954] AC 403 at 422.)

This supports Lord Nicholls' conclusion, with which I agree, that employers are vicariously liable for wrongs having a statutory source unless the statutory provision expressly or impliedly excludes such liability: see para [17] of his speech.

[58] Against this background the decision to include a reference to the employer or principal of the person responsible for the harassment cannot be dismissed as based on a misunderstanding about the extent of the employer's vicarious liability. There is no rule in Scots law which precludes a finding that the employer is liable vicariously for a breach of a statutory duty imposed on his employee. So far as conduct within the scope of the employee's employment is concerned, the doctrine respondeat superior applies irrespective of whether the duty the employee has breached was laid on him by the common law or by statute. In Scots law too, therefore, the general rule applies in respect of wrongs having a statutory source unless it is displaced by the statute. Parliament could have chosen, had it wished, to exclude the application of the doctrine in the case of conduct by an employee amounting to harassment. But it chose not to do so. It provided expressly, and deliberately, in s 10(1) of the 1997 Act to the contrary. That subsection was included in the Bill from the outset of its passage through Parliament. We can take it that, according to the normal practice in those pre-devolution days, it would have been drafted in the Lord Advocate's department and that it would have been shown to the Parliamentary draftsman who was responsible for the part of the Bill that was to apply to England and Wales. It would have been removed from the Bill if it had been contrary to the instructions that had been given to the draftsman of that part.

SECONDARY, NOT VICARIOUS, LIABILITY?

[59] In a valiant attempt to meet this obstacle to his argument Mr Turner said that the purpose of s 10(1) of the 1997 Act was to deal only with situations where the employer was secondarily, and thus personally and not vicariously, responsible for conduct by his employee which amounted to harassment. He referred to Mattis v Pollock (trading as Flamingos Nightclub) [2003] EWCA Civ 887, [2004] 4 All ER 85, [2003] ICR 1335 as an example of that kind of liability. That was a case where the doorman at a nightclub, having been involved in a violent altercation with the claimant on the premises while performing his duties there, armed himself with a knife which he fetched from his flat a short distance away and attacked him in the street with it some time afterwards. The Court of Appeal held (at [32]) that the responsibility of the nightclub owner for the actions of his aggressive doorman was not extinguished by the separation in time and place from what had happened in the nightclub, and that vicarious liability was therefore established. But it went on to say that, although personal liability would not necessarily and always follow the establishment of vicarious liability, in that case it did. This was because the owner had chosen to employ the doorman, knowing and approving of his aggressive tendencies, which he had encouraged rather than curbed.

[60] It is by no means impossible to conceive of circumstances where an employer could be held to be secondarily liable for a course of conduct by an employee amounting to harassment. As the Court of Appeal indicated in Mattis's case, the encouragement or approval by the employer of such conduct could lead to that result. Indeed, s 7(3A) of the 1997 Act, inserted by s 44(1) of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, expressly provides for precisely such a situation. But I do not regard this a sufficient explanation for the reference to the employer in s 18B(2)(b) of the 1973 Act. The wording of that provision, when closely analysed, is a sufficient indication to the contrary. It refers to awareness that the defender was a person responsible for the alleged harassment or the employer or principal of such a person. The word 'or', which appears also in the corresponding provisions of ss 17 and 18, provides for the situation where the liability of the employer or the principal, as the case may be, comes in place of that of the employee. That is the essence of the doctrine of vicarious liability. So I would reject Mr Turner's argument that s 18B does not imply the existence of vicarious liability of the employer but provides merely for an extension of the limitation period in cases where a culpable employer is secondarily liable for the acts of a harassing employee.

THE 1997 ACT IN PRACTICE

[61] Among the arguments that persuaded Scott Baker LJ that the 1997 Act created a liability that was personal only to the perpetrator of the harassment was the fact that, if vicarious liability was imposed by it, this was done without any limitation as to the circumstances. As he said (at [111]), no statutory defence is provided. So the only control mechanisms on the employer's strict liability are those laid down by the common law, as explained in Lister v Hesley Hall Ltd [2001] UKHL 22, [2001] 2 All ER 769, [2002] 1 AC 215, Dubai Aluminium Co Ltd v Salaam [2002] UKHL 48, [2003] 1 All ER 97, [2003] 2 AC 366 and Bernard v A-G of Jamaica [2004] UKPC 47, [2005] IRLR 398. Mr Turner suggested that recognition that the employer could be vicariously liable would provide a strong incentive to the commencement of proceedings against employers, and that employers generally were particularly vulnerable to such claims for which their insurers might decline to provide cover.

[62] It may be worth noting however that there has been no sign of such a development in Scotland, despite the clear indication in the statute that employers may be vicariously liable in damages for harassment by their employees. This is not because opportunities which the statute provides for obtaining a civil remedy under the 1997 Act have gone entirely unnoticed. But the eight cases which have been reported so far deal only with the use of non-harassment orders. These were orders sought in civil proceedings in the sheriff court (eg McCann v McGurran 2002 SLT 592, where the order was sought against a former husband, and McGuire v Kidston 2002 SLT (Sh Ct) 66, where the parties had previously had a relationship) or orders sought in criminal proceedings under s 234A of the Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1995 following a conviction for an offence involving harassment (eg McGlennan v McKinnon 1998 SLT 494, where the accused, who was convicted of a breach of the peace by shouting at the complainer, had previously had a relationship with her). There are no reported instances of claims made under the Act for damages against an employer for harassment by an employee. The practice appears to have been to continue to use the employment tribunal as the forum for the making of claims based on conduct amounting to harassment in the employment context.

CONCLUSION

[63] Although the provisions of the 1997 Act which apply to Scotland differ in various respects from those which apply to England and Wales (see Sam Middlemiss 'Liability of Employers under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997' [2006] Edin LR 307), it was not suggested that the intention of Parliament was that there was to be any difference in substance as between the two jurisdictions as to the scope of the civil remedy for harassment. On the contrary, the Home Secretary, Michael Howard, said when introducing the Bill at second reading that the aims of the Bill as it applied to England and Wales were identical to those for Scotland: 287 HC Official Report (6th series) col 785. The indication in s 10(1) that vicarious liability is available in Scotland where damages are claimed for conduct by an employee amounting to harassment within the meaning of the 1997 Act must be taken to apply to England and Wales also. I would dismiss the appeal.

BARONESS HALE OF RICHMOND.

[64] My Lords, if we had been the promoters of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, we might have asked ourselves the policy question, 'Should the employers of people who harass others in the course of their employment be vicariously liable for any damages the court may order under the Act?' The legislators might have thought of a number of policy reasons why the answer should be 'no'.

[65] They might have considered that the principal purpose of the Act was prevention and protection rather than compensation. It begins with the prohibition of harassment in s 1. This is then made a criminal offence by s 2. Civil remedies, including damages and injunctions, are provided for in s 3. The aim, it might be thought, was to deter, to punish or to encourage the perpetrator to mend his ways by the wide range of criminal disposals available on summary conviction, including the restraining orders provided for in s 5, or by the sort of specific prohibitions which may be helpfully contained in an injunction.

[66] If this was the aim, it is easy to see why the definition of harassment was left deliberately wide and open-ended. It does require a course of conduct, but this can be shown by conduct on at least two occasions (or since 2005 by conduct on one occasion to each of two or more people): s 7(3). All sorts of conduct may amount to harassment. It includes alarming a person or causing her distress:

s 7(2). But conduct might be harassment even if no alarm or distress were in fact caused. A great deal is left to the wisdom of the courts to draw sensible lines between the ordinary banter and badinage of life and genuinely offensive and unacceptable behaviour.

[67] If prevention and protection were the aim, it is also easy to see why the mental element was framed as it was. A person is guilty of harassment if he knows or ought to know that his course of conduct amounts to harassment: s 1(1)(b). He ought to know this if a reasonable person in possession of the same information would think that it amounted to harassment: s 1(2). There is no requirement that harm, or even alarm or distress, be actually foreseeable, although in most cases it would be. This broad formulation helps the courts to intervene to warn the perpetrator and encourage him to mend his ways.

[68] The promoters of the Act might well have thought that this intense focus on the perpetrator and getting him to stop would not be helped, and might even be hindered, by making the employer vicariously liable. Vicarious liability, as my noble and learned friend, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, has so clearly explained, does not depend upon the employer having done anything wrong or even having broken any legal duty imposed upon him. It merely requires that the enterprise pay for damage done by its employees in the course of their employment, a concept which now has a very broad meaning, and certainly embraces conduct which the employer was actively trying to deter and could have done nothing more to prevent. On the facts of this case, the employer had a grievance procedure which was designed to prevent workplace harassment and the perpetrator resigned as a result.

[69] The promoters might have considered that our law does not generally award damages for anxiety and injury to feelings unless these are so severe as to amount to a recognised psychiatric illness. Discrimination and harassment are statutory exceptions to this rule. But the rule has a sound policy basis in limiting the scope for claiming compensation. There is already concern amongst some of our legislators that the scope for claiming compensation, even for recognised physical injuries, has gone too far. The avowed purpose of the Compensation Bill currently before Parliament is to rein in the so-called 'compensation culture'. The fear is that, instead of learning to cope with the inevitable irritations and misfortunes of life, people will look to others to compensate them for all their woes, and those others will then become unduly defensive or protective.

[70] The promoters might have thought that employers already owe a duty of care towards their employees, to take reasonable steps to protect them from foreseeable harm to their physical or mental health. There has been a rapid expansion in claims for psychiatric injury resulting from stress at work. Liability turns on the foreseeability of such injury to the particular employee and what the employer might reasonably have been expected to do to avoid it. If employers can be vicariously liable for anxiety and distress caused without any breach of duty on their part, such claims will not only be routinely added to stress at work claims, they will also found a quite separate stream of, admittedly probably small, claims for harassment at work. The promoters might have thought that there were better ways than a myriad of new small claims to encourage better practice in the workplace if such were needed.

[71] The promoters did address their minds to the appropriate limitation period and deliberately disapplied the ordinary three-year period for personal injury claims: s 6. Harassment can take place over very long periods and they would not have wanted the earlier conduct to be left out of account.

[72] But these were policy questions for the legislators. As Mr Robin Allen QC for Mr Majrowski points out, floodgates arguments may assist the courts in deciding how to develop the principles of the common law. They are of little help to us in construing the language which Parliament has used. Mr Mark Turner QC, on behalf of the appellant NHS trust, accepts that it is a question of construction. He argues that there should be no general presumption one way or the other that a statute aimed at prohibiting the conduct of one person should or should not import vicarious liability if that conduct is committed in the course of employment. However, Parliament must be assumed to legislate in the knowledge of the general law, which includes the law of vicarious liability, so that one must look for indications that Parliament did not intend it to apply to the particular duties or prohibitions it was imposing.

[73] But in this case there can be no doubt, for the reasons explained by my noble and learned friend, Lord Hope of Craighead, that Parliament contemplated vicarious liability. Despite Mr Turner's valiant efforts, the Scottish limitation provisions can be explained in no other way. Although the Scottish limitation rules are different from the English, there is no indication that the substantive liabilities created by the Act were intended to be any different.

[74] As we are not policy-makers and legislators, but judges construing the language used by Parliament, in the context of the general law of vicarious liability of which Parliament must be presumed to have been aware, I am driven to conclude, in agreement with my noble and learned friends, Lord Nicholls and Lord Hope, that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD CARSWELL.

[75] My Lords, three of the classic methods of interpretation of a statutory provision are construction of the language of the enactment, consideration of the mischief at which the provision was aimed and weighing of the consequences of the conflicting interpretations of the provision in question. All are designed to assist the object of the tribunal interpreting the provision, to determine the meaning which Parliament intended in enacting it.

[76] The wording of the enactment, not merely individual provisions, but the whole enactment, is the first resort of the interpreter, and in many, if not most, cases it will resolve the question. The Court of Appeal in the present case ([2005] EWCA Civ 251, [2005] IRLR 340, [2005] QB 848, [2005] 2 WLR 1503) did not find sufficient indications in the language of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 to determine the question whether an employer was to be liable for harassment committed by his employee in the course of his employment. It therefore resorted to consideration of the statutory objective and the consequences of adopting either interpretation.

[77] All three members of the Court of Appeal held, on what they described as the broad issue, that an employer's vicarious liability can extend as a matter of principle to breaches of statutory duty by an employee. In common with your Lordships, I am in agreement with that conclusion. Where they differed was on the narrow issue, whether an employer would be liable under the 1997 Act for harassment committed by his employee in the course of his employment. In their judgments there was a thorough and penetrating discussion of the policy of the legislation, the statutory objective and the consequences of adopting either answer to the question posed. The majority, Auld and May LJJ, came down in favour of finding that the employer would be vicariously liable, while Scott Baker LJ's consideration, particularly of the statutory policy, took him to the opposite conclusion.

[78] If we had no other aids to construction but these factors, I should myself regard them as very evenly balanced. I can see considerable force in the respective arguments which prevailed with the majority and the minority. The matter might be concluded by the operation of a presumption: on the existence of such a presumption I respectfully agree with the view expressed by my noble and learned friend Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead at paras [16] and [17] of his opinion. I would observe, however, that the 1997 Act is not confined in its scope to the workplace and, as its history shows, its original focus was not the workplace at all. One can envisage situations in which it is desirable in which there should be vicarious liability for the acts of an employee towards a member of the public, where the victim cannot identify the employee or obtain redress from him.

[79] Be that as it may, the question of construction is in my opinion determined by the terms of s 10, which inserted a new s 18B into the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973. This part of the Act, the significance of which had not been brought to the attention of the Court of Appeal, furnishes an indication of the statutory intention by resort to the primary source of interpretation, the wording of the enactment itself. It is quite apparent, as my noble and learned friend Lord Hope of Craighead has demonstrated, that in its use of the words in s 18B(2)(b) 'the defender was a person responsible for the alleged harassment or the employer or principal of such a person', Parliament envisaged that an employer would be vicariously liable for his employee's harassment of another person. I cannot suppose that it was contemplated that that should be the position only in Scotland and that the same should not apply to England and Wales (Northern Ireland has its own legislation, the material parts of which are virtually in identical terms to the 1997 Act, and the same interpretation will apply to that). It therefore seems to me the most direct and compelling indication of the intention of Parliament that there should be vicarious liability in a case such as the present. The other approaches accordingly recede into the background. As I have stated, I would myself regard the factors weighed up in consideration of these other approaches as evenly balanced; certainly, they cannot be said to point away from the conclusion indicated by the wording of the Act with sufficient strength to require one to question that conclusion.

[80] I accordingly agree with your Lordships that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD BROWN OF EATON-UNDER-HEYWOOD.

[81] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, Lord Hope of Craighead and Baroness Hale of Richmond. I respectfully agree with Lord Nicholls that the principle of vicarious liability is applicable where an employee commits a breach of a statutory obligation sounding in damages while acting in the course of his employment unless the statute expressly or impliedly indicates otherwise (para [17], above). That said, but for the virtually conclusive inference that the vicarious liability principle is indeed here applicable which arises from s 10 of the 1997 Act (identified by Lord Hope in the course of the hearing), I would have been strongly inclined to conclude, consistently with Scott Baker LJ's persuasive dissenting judgment in the court below ([2005] EWCA Civ 251, [2005] IRLR 340, [2005] QB 848, [2005] 2 WLR 1503), that the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 did impliedly indicate otherwise. I agree, therefore, with Lord Hope that there seemed 'indeed powerful reasons for thinking that Parliament intended that liability in damages should be personal to the perpetrator of the harassment' (para [43], above), and I agree equally with Baroness Hale's suggested policy reasons as to why that might have been so. In the end, however, I too feel driven to conclude that that was not after all what Parliament intended and that this appeal, therefore, must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Bristol City Council v Hassan and another
Bristol City Council v Glastonbury

[2006] EWCA Civ 656

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

BROOKE, DYSON AND JACOB LJJ

2, 23 MAY 2006

Landlord and tenant – Recovery of possession – Order for possession – Secure tenancy – Suspended order for possession on conditions as to payment of arrears of rent – Whether date for possession having to appear on face of order – Appropriate form of order – Housing Act 1985, s 85(2).

The defendants were secure tenants of the claimant local authority. Each was in arrears of rent. The claimant sought suspended possession orders with conditions as to payment of arrears. Section 85(2)[a] of the Housing Act 1985 provided that on the making of an order for possession of a dwelling house let under a secure tenancy the court could stay or suspend the execution of the order, or postpone the date of possession for such period or periods as the court thought fit. The defendants did not oppose the granting of possession orders or the proposed conditions but contended that no date for possession should be fixed. The effect of a recent decision of the Court of Appeal was that when a local authority landlord had established that statutory grounds for making a possession order existed and that it was reasonable to make such an order, the standard form[b] in use in the county courts had the effect of terminating the tenant's secure tenancy on the date set out on the face of the order. If the court also directed that the possession order was not to be enforced so long as the tenant complied with the requirements set out in the order, the tenant enjoyed the status of a 'tolerated trespasser' and not of a secure tenant so long as he remained in possession of the premises after the date for giving possession had passed. In the first case, the district judge took the view that the court was required to fix a date for possession on the face of the order, and in the second case, the district judge made an order in the standard form, which required a date to be fixed. The defendants appealed, submitting that the status of 'tolerated trespasser' was unsatisfactory for both landlord and tenant. The court considered (i) whether a date for possession had to appear on the face of the order; and (ii) the lawful and appropriate form of the order.

Held – (1) A judge was not obliged to set an absolute date for possession on the face of the order. It followed that it was lawful for him to make an order which set out a date for possession but provided that the date would be postponed and the tenancy would continue so long as the conditions set out in the order continued to be satisfied. The court would be postponing the date of possession for a fixed period in the first instance and thereafter for such period as the tenant complied with his obligations under the order. That fitted naturally with the statutory language in s 85(2) of the 1985 Act (see [10], [29], [30], below);

a Section 85, so far as material, is set out in Appendix 2, below

b The standard form (Form N28), so far as material, is set out in Appendix 1, below

Harlow DC v Hall [2006] EWCA Civ 156 and Sherrin v Brand (orse Phelps) [1956] 1 All ER 194 considered.

(2) It was lawful and appropriate to make an order providing that: (i) the defendant was to give up possession of the property to the claimant; (ii) the date on which the defendant was to give up possession of the property was postponed to a date to be fixed by the court on an application by the claimant; (iii) the defendant had to pay the claimant a specified sum for rent arrears and a specified sum for costs; the specified total judgment debt was to be paid by instalments as specified; (iv) the claimant was not to be entitled to make an application for a date to be fixed for the giving up of possession and the termination of the defendant's tenancy so long as the defendant paid the claimant the current rent together with instalments of the specified sum per week towards the judgment debt; (v) the first payment of the current rent and the instalment had to be made on or before a specified date; (vi) any application to fix the date on which the defendant was to give up possession could be determined on the papers without a hearing (unless the district judge considered that such a hearing was appropriate) provided that (a) the claimant had written to the defendant at least 14 days before making its application giving details of the current arrears and its intention to request that a date be fixed; and (b) a copy of that letter and the defendant's response, if any, together with the rent account showing any transactions since the date of the order were attached to the application; and (vii) the order was to cease to be enforceable on a specified date/when the judgment debt was satisfied (see [37]–[40], below).

(3) In the instant cases, the district judges had fettered their discretion too narrowly. The appeals would therefore be allowed; in each case the district judge's order for possession and money judgment would stand but the claim would be remitted to the county court to determine what, if any, terms of postponement of possession were appropriate (see [45], below).

Notes

For extended discretion of the court in certain proceedings for possession, see 27(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1172.

For the Housing Act 1985, s 85, see 21 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2005 reissue) 137.

Cases referred to in judgment

American Economic Laundry Ltd v Little [1950] 2 All ER 1186, [1951] 1 KB 400, CA.
Burrows v Brent London BC [1996] 4 All ER 577, [1996] 1 WLR 1448, HL.
Harlow DC v Hall [2006] EWCA Civ 156, [2006] All ER (D) 393 (Feb).
Lambeth LBC v O'Kane, Helena Housing Ltd v Pinder [2005] EWCA Civ 1010, [2006] HLR 21.
Manchester City Council v Finn [2002] EWCA Civ 1998, [2003] HLR 596.
Marshall v Bradford Metropolitan DC [2001] EWCA Civ 594, [2002] HLR 428.
McPhail v persons, names unknown, Bristol Corp v Ross [1973] 3 All ER 393, [1973] Ch 447, [1973] 3 WLR 71, CA.
Sheffield City Council v Hopkins [2001] EWCA Civ 1023, [2002] HLR 237.
Sherrin v Brand (orse Phelps) [1956] 1 All ER 194, [1956] 1 QB 403, [1956] 2 WLR 131, CA.
St Brice v Southwark London BC [2001] EWCA Civ 1138, [2002] LGR 117, sub nom Southwark London BC v St Brice [2002] 1 WLR 1537.
Stone (J&F) Lighting and Radio Ltd v Levitt [1946] 2 All ER 653, [1947] AC 209, HL.
Thompson v Elmbridge BC [1987] 1 WLR 1425, CA.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

Brent London BC v Knightley [1997] 3 FCR 7, CA.
Dunn v Bradford Metropolitan DC, Marston v Leeds City Council [2002] EWCA Civ 1137, [2003] HLR 154.
Gallagher v Castle Vale Action Trust Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 944, (2001) 33 HLR 810.
Greenwich London BC v Regan (1996) 28 HLR 469, CA.
Lambeth London BC v Howard [2001] EWCA Civ 468, (2001) 33 HLR 636.
Lambeth London BC v Kay, Price v Leeds City Council [2006] UKHL 10, [2006] 4 All ER 128, [2006] 2 WLR 570.
Lambeth London BC v Rogers [2000] LGR 191, CA.
Manchester Corpn v Connelly [1970] 1 All ER 961, [1970] 1 Ch 420, CA.
Newham London BC v Hawkins [2005] EWCA Civ 451, [2005] LGR 750, CA.
Pemberton v Southwark London BC [2000] 3 All ER 924, [2000] 1 WLR 1672, CA.
Raeuchle v Laimond Properties Ltd [2001] 33 HLR 113.
Swindon BC v Aston [2002] EWCA Civ 1850, [2003] 2 P & CR 309, CA.
Tanfern Ltd v Cameron-MacDonald [2000] 2 All ER 801, [2000] 1 WLR 1311, CA.

Appeals

Bristol City Council v Hassan and another

Mr Hassan appealed from the decision of District Judge Exton in the Bristol County Court making a possession order with a fixed date for possession in proceedings brought by Bristol City Council as local authority landlord against Mr Hassan and Mr Abdillahi the joint secure tenants of premises in Barton Hill, Bristol. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Bristol City Council v Glastonbury

Ms Glastonbury appealed from the decision of District Judge Frenkel in the Bristol County Court making a possession order with a fixed date for possession in proceedings brought by Bristol City Council as local authority landlord against her as the secure tenant of premises in Dove Street, Bristol. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Jan Luba QC and Robert Latham (instructed by South West Law, Bristol) for the appellants.
Kelvin Rutledge and Genevieve Screeche-Powell (instructed by Bristol City Council Legal Services) for the council.

Cur adv vult

23 May 2006. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

BROOKE LJ.

[1] This is the judgment of the court. These two appeals from orders made by District Judge Exton and District Judge Frenkel in the Bristol County Court in January and February of this year have been transferred for hearing to this court because they raise issues which are at present perplexing housing law practitioners and the judiciary in county courts up and down the country.

[2] The problem arises in this way. When a court decides that a local authority landlord has established that statutory grounds for making a possession order exist and that it is reasonable to make such an order, the standard form currently in use in the county courts has the effect of terminating the tenant's secure tenancy on the date set out on the face of the order. If the court also directs that the possession order is not to be enforced so long as the tenant complies with requirements set out in the order, the tenant enjoys the status of a 'tolerated trespasser', and not of a secure tenant, so long as he remains in possession of the premises after the date for giving possession has passed. This is the effect of the recent decision of this court in Harlow DC v Hall [2006] EWCA Civ 156, [2006] All ER (D) 393 (Feb).

[3] The standard form to which we have referred is Form N28. We have set out its salient provisions in Appendix 1 to this judgment. It is not obligatory for the court to use this form in any given case. Section 74A of the County Courts Act 1984 empowered the Lord Chancellor to make or to approve directions as to the practice and procedure of county courts, and CPR Pt 4 and its practice direction deal with court forms in a very general way. In the present context Form N28 appears in the table that heads para 3.1 of that practice direction under the general description of a form 'required by CPR Pts 1–75'. CPR 4, for its part, provides:

> '(1) The forms set out in a practice direction shall be used in the cases to which they apply.
>
> (2) A form may be varied by the court or a party if the variation is required by the circumstances of a particular case.'

[4] Although the current version of Form N28 was introduced in 2001 at the same time as CPR Pt 55 (which provides generally for practice and procedure in connection with possession proceedings) came into effect, there is no reference to Form N28 (or indeed to any other prescribed form) in CPR Pt 55. At best, therefore, it should be treated as the form to be used when a court wishes to make a possession order that is postponed to a fixed date but to suspend its execution so long as certain requirements are fulfilled.

[5] This, however, is not the only order a court may make if it decides that a local authority landlord has established that statutory grounds for making a possession order exist and that it is reasonable to make such an order. The relevant statutory provisions are to be found in ss 82(2) and 85 of the Housing Act 1985, the terms of which are set out in Appendix 2 to this judgment. By the combined effect of those two sections, the tenant's secure tenancy will end on the date on which the tenant is to give up possession in pursuance of the possession order (see s 82(2)), and the court on making the possession order has the power to postpone the date of possession for such period or periods as it thinks fit (see s 85(2)(b)). On such a postponement the court must impose conditions with respect to the payment by the tenant of arrears of rent (if any) and rent unless it considers that one of the criteria identified in s 85(3)(a) is satisfied, and it may also impose such other conditions as it thinks fit (see s 85(3)(b)). By s 85(4), if the conditions are complied with the court may, if it thinks fit, discharge or rescind the order for possession.

[6] The facts of the two cases with which we are concerned are fairly typical. Mr Hassan and Mr Abdillahi were Bristol City Council's joint secure tenants of premises in Barton Hill, Bristol. Mr Abdillahi went off to Denmark, and because he was responsible for paying half the rent, arrears accumulated following his departure to the extent that they amounted to £1,628·61 at the date of the hearing on 9 January 2006. The full current net rent was now being paid by the housing benefit authorities, but a weekly payment of £4·77 was due from Mr Hassan in respect of a heating charge. The council sought a suspended possession order on terms that Mr Hassan, who was in receipt of benefits, continued to pay this sum and also instalments of £2·85 towards the arrears, this being the standard sum for a tenant on benefits. There was no dispute that a possession order could be made, or that it was other than reasonable to make an order. What had to be resolved at the hearing was the form of the order the court should make.

[7] Ms Glastonbury was the council's secure tenant of an eleventh floor flat in Dove Street, Bristol. Her problems arose after payment of housing benefit ceased on 11 April 2005. At that time her account was £60 in credit. Because she received income support she was entitled to housing benefit, but she failed to provide information required by the council's verification procedures, and this led to her housing benefit being stopped. It was reinstated on 5 September 2005, and the possession proceedings were originally adjourned twice to see whether payments of housing benefit could be backdated to cover the gap between April and September 2005. Eventually the housing benefit authorities decided not to take this course. At the time of the hearing before District Judge Frenkel on 13 February 2006 the rent arrears were £885·13. The housing benefit authorities were paying the full current rent, and since 10 January 2006 the Department of Work and Pensions (DWP) had been deducting £2·85 per week at source from Ms Glastonbury's other benefits and paying them directly to the council four weeks in arrears. The council's final stance at the hearing was that it asked the court to make a possession order suspended on terms that Ms Glastonbury paid £2·85 per week towards the arrears.

[8] The solicitor advocate who appeared for both these tenants did not oppose the granting of a possession order on the proposed conditions. He contended, however, that no date for possession should be fixed. He suggested that an order should be made in these terms:

> '1. The claimant is entitled to possession described in the claim form.
>
> 2. The defendant do deliver to the claimant possession of the premises on a date to be fixed on application by the claimant.
>
> 3. The claimant shall not be entitled to apply for an order fixing the date for possession and termination of the defendant's tenancy for so long as the defendant: pays the current rent as it falls due in accordance with the terms of the tenancy agreement and in addition discharges arrears amounting to £ [. . .] as at the date of this order by monthly instalments of £ [. . .].
>
> 4. Any application to fix the date on which the defendant is to give up possession shall be made to the district judge in private on seven days' notice to the defendant.
>
> 5. There be no order as to costs.'

[9] In the first of these cases District Judge Exton said that her colleagues in Bristol, and other colleagues nationwide, took the view that a court could not make an order in these terms, because they were required to fix a date for possession on the face of their order. In the second case District Judge Frenkel, after hearing argument, said that he was going to make an N28 order, and that he was not going to change the usual practice of the court unless there was a successful appeal. A particular feature of the second case was that it was apparently accepted that the flat was unsuitable for one of the defendant's sons, and that it would be problematic whether a mutual exchange of tenancies with another council tenant could be achieved if the defendant was reduced to the status of a 'tolerated trespasser'.

[10] The first issue we have to decide is whether the district judges' belief that a date for possession had to appear on the face of their orders was soundly based. If it was not, then we have to go on to consider whether variant forms of order which we were shown could lawfully be made. We were told that following the decision in Harlow DC v Hall [2006] All ER (D) 393 (Feb) on 28 February 2006 the Department for Constitutional Affairs appointed a working party, which includes two experienced judges, to advise on the alternative form(s) of order template the courts should adopt in those cases in which the judge making a possession order against a secure tenant did not wish the tenancy to terminate so long as the conditions set out in the order were fulfilled. The working party is understandably anxious to consider our judgment in this case. In the meantime the courts have been advised to delete para 5 and to substitute a new para 1 in Form N28 (for which see Appendix 1):

> '1. The defendant give the claimant possession of (address of the property) on or before (date) provided that the date for possession will be postponed and the defendant's tenancy of the premises will continue, so long as the defendant pays the claimant the current rent and in addition the rent arrears and costs by the instalments set out below.'

The title of the order was also to be changed from 'Order for possession (rented premises) (suspended)' to 'Order for possession (rented premises) postponed'.

[11] At the hearing of the appeal Mr Rutledge, who appeared for the council, submitted that a court could not lawfully make an order in this form. Mr Luba QC, who appeared for the appellants, maintained that it could, although for reasons which we will explain later in this judgment, he proffered a more sophisticated form of order for our consideration.

[12] The judgment of Lord Denning MR in McPhail v persons, names unknown, Bristol Corp v Ross [1973] 3 All ER 393 at 396–397, [1973] Ch 447 at 457–458 contains a scholarly analysis of the history of possession orders. In short, although an owner of land which was being occupied by squatters was entitled to take the remedy into his own hand, he was encouraged to go to a common law court and obtain an order that he 'do recover' the land, and to issue a writ of possession immediately. The sheriff would execute the writ, although once the owner had obtained his order he was entitled to take possession at once by his own hand. Because he could lawfully take possession at once without the help of the court, the courts of common law never suspended the order for possession. Lord Denning added that he was also satisfied that a court of equity would never intervene in aid of someone wrongfully in possession of land so as to suspend an order for possession. Under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875 the old action of ejectment was replaced by an action for the recovery of land, but the practice remained the same. The judgment, as before, was that the plaintiff 'do recover' possession. No time was mentioned, and no date given, and the plaintiff could at once issue a writ of possession which could be executed immediately.

[13] When Lord Denning came to consider the position of tenants ([1973] 3 All ER 393 at 398–399, [1973] Ch 447 at 458–460), he said that an owner of land was obliged to obtain an order for possession if he was to avoid being charged with the offence of forcible entry. This position was at that time regularised by s 32(1) of the Rent Act 1965. Lord Denning continued:

'Seeing that in the case of a tenancy the owner is not entitled to regain possession himself by his own self-help, and that he is bound to come to the court to recover possession, it follows that the courts are able to fix a date on which possession shall be recovered. At any rate, the House of Lords has proceeded on that assumption (see J & F Stone Lighting and Radio Ltd v Levitt [1946] 2 All ER 653 at 655, [1947] AC 209 at 216); and Parliament has done likewise. Thus in s 138 of the County Courts Act 1888 Parliament said that at the end of a tenancy the judge may order possession to be given "either forthwith or on or before such day as the judge shall think fit to name". That section was repealed by the County Courts Act 1934, and replaced by a simple provision in s 48 that: "A county court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine any action for the recovery of land . . ." But the 1934 Act was a consolidating Act. It did not alter the previous law. It certainly did not take away the power given by s 138 of the 1888 Act. It proceeded on the assumption that at the end of a tenancy a court has power to fix a date on or before which possession should be given. All the textbook writers, without exception, say that the county court has this power. Likewise in the Protection from Eviction Act 1964 Parliament, in s 2(1), said that when the court made an order for possession by the owner against the occupier—"the court may suspend the execution of the order for such period, not exceeding 12 months from the date of the order, as the court thinks reasonable." That section was repealed by the Rent Act 1965 [s 52 and Sch 7, Pt 1], but Parliament cannot thereby have intended to take away the power of the court at the end of a tenancy to suspend the execution of its order. It simply left intact its previous power.

If the county court has the power at the end of the tenancy to fix a date, then the High Court must have the like power. The County Courts Acts have always provided for the transfer of actions from the county court to the High Court, and vice versa, as for instance ss 49 and 50 of the County Courts Act 1959. It cannot be that, on such a transfer, the High Court has less power than the county court.

In my opinion, therefore, when a tenancy has come to an end, the landlord is not entitled to take possession except by an order of the court; and, on making the order, the court has power to fix a date for possession.'

[14] Lord Denning went on to say ([1973] 3 All ER 393 at 399, [1973] Ch 447 at 460) that the way in which the power was to be exercised was a matter for the discretion of the court, but in the ordinary way, where the defendant had no statutory right to remain, the usual order was from four to six weeks.

[15] It followed from this analysis that, whereas as against squatters owners of land who obtained an order for possession were entitled to enforce it immediately, in the case of a former tenant the courts had a power (but not a duty) to fix a date for possession, thereby postponing the effect of the order, although courts would not in practice postpone the effect of the order for a period longer than six weeks.

[16] These, then, were the general rules, largely untrammelled by statute. In the present case, however, the courts' powers are identified by statute, and the resolution of the first issue we have to decide depends on the proper interpretation of s 85 of the 1985 Act (for which see Appendix 2).

[17] A similar statutory scheme was also to be found in the Rent Acts, with the important difference that once the original contractual tenancy had ended a statutory Rent Act tenant would retain the status of statutory tenant until possession was actually obtained: that scheme contained nothing similar to s 82(2) of the 1985 Act (see Appendix 2) whereby the tenant's secure tenancy ended on the date on which the tenant was to give up possession in pursuance of the order, and not on the date of actual possession.

[18] In American Economic Laundry Ltd v Little [1950] 2 All ER 1186, [1951] 1 KB 400 an unconditional order for possession was made against a statutory tenant, and execution of the order was then suspended by the court from time to time pursuant to powers contained in s 5(2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act 1920. Somervell LJ distinguished ([1950] 2 All ER 1186 at 1189, [1951] 1 KB 400 at 406) two different forms of order which might be made under those powers: (i) (as in American Economic Laundry Ltd v Little) an absolute order, the execution of which is suspended; (ii) a conditional order. When a conditional order is made, Somervell LJ said that the order for possession did not become 'operative' so long as certain conditions were fulfilled. These conditions might relate to payment of rent or the abatement of a nuisance.

[19] In Sherrin v Brand (orse Phelps) [1956] 1 All ER 194, [1956] 1 QB 403, another case involving a Rent Act statutory tenant, the county court judge had made a consent order in Form 138 in the appendix to the County Court Rules 1936. Its salient terms were:

> 'It is adjudged that the plaintiff do recover against the defendant possession of the land ... It is ordered that judgment for possession shall not be enforced for 28 days and for so long thereafter as the defendant punctually pays to the plaintiff ... the arrears of rent, mesne profits and costs by instalments of £10 forthwith and 13s 7d per week in addition to the current rent ... And it is further ordered that the judgment shall cease to be enforceable when the arrears of rent, mesne profits and costs referred to above are satisfied.'

A question then arose as to the status of the tenancy after the tenant had fallen into arrears under this order but the landlord had taken no steps to enforce the order before the tenant died.

[20] Sir Raymond Evershed MR interpreted the consent order ([1956] 1 All ER 194 at 196, [1956] 1 QB 403 at 411) as meaning that the tenant was to remain on as tenant subject to the added obligation that he had to pay off the arrears by instalments—'and subject also to this, that if default was made, the plaintiff could then take the appropriate steps mentioned by getting a warrant to execute the order without further or separate proceedings'.

[21] In Sherrin v Brand (orse Phelps) the court was concerned with the powers contained in s 4(2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act 1923 (set out at [1956] 1 All ER 194 at 197–198, [1956] 1 QB 403 at 412–413), which are in terms remarkably similar, although differently arranged, to those now appearing in s 85 of the 1985 Act. The Master of the Rolls said authoritatively ([1956] 1 All ER 194 at 198, [1956] 1 QB 403 at 413):

> 'It is always within the jurisdiction of the court, in my judgment (assuming that the conditions for the exercise of the jurisdiction have arisen) to make an order for possession, but to postpone the effectiveness of the order by making the continued occupation of the tenant conditional, for example, on his paying arrears of rent and costs in such manner as is provided by the order—such a provision being within the language which I have read from s 4(2)—or to postpone the date of possession for such period or periods as it thinks fit, and subject to such conditions in regard to payment by the tenant of arrears of rent and otherwise as the court thinks fit. That indeed is, as I think, plainly the effect of the order of 2 December 1953; and if that is the effect of the order, it certainly does not necessarily involve the result (as I read s 15(1)) that, during the period of the postponement of possession, the so-called statutory tenancy ceases altogether, and the tenant wholly ceases to have the protection of the Act.' a b

[22] Birkett LJ, for his part, placed stress ([1956] 1 QB 403 at 424) on the extremely wide powers conferred on the county court judge by s 4(2) of the 1923 Act:

'[T]he widest possible discretion is given to the county court judge, and one can understand why it is done. He is told: "You can postpone possession if the facts warrant it; you can postpone the date for possession for such time as you think proper; and, moreover, you can lay down such conditions as you think proper." Then at the end of the section come the all-important words: "and, if such conditions are complied with, the court may, if it thinks fit, discharge or rescind any such order or judgment." c d

What the Act of Parliament was clearly intending to do was to invest the county court judge with the widest possible powers, because of the infinite variety of circumstances in which people are placed in regard to their housing, and in which they are compelled to go to the county court either as landlords or as tenants. The statute says: "You can adjourn it if you wish when the facts are such that, if you do adjourn it, that may be an end of the whole matter. If the facts indicate that it is the proper thing to do, you may make an order for possession. If it is a reasonable thing to do, make it. It is quite true that you may suspend the order"—and, as the county court judge pointed out, during that period of suspension, there may be any number of applications to the court for a suspension of the order; that, at any rate, is in a category by itself. Then the third matter is the wide discretion vested in the court for postponing the date of possession as it thinks fit for such period as it thinks fit and on such terms as it thinks fit; and if those conditions are fulfilled, the court may also, if it thinks fit, discharge the order altogether.' e f

[23] The Housing Act 1980 introduced for the first time the concept of a statutory secure tenancy enjoyed by the tenant of a local authority landlord (and, originally, the tenants of other social landlords as well), and its terms are now to be found in the 1985 Act, which was a consolidation Act. What is now s 82(2) of the 1985 Act formed part of that scheme from the outset, and in Thompson v Elmbridge BC [1987] 1 WLR 1425 this court identified an important respect in which this scheme was different from the Rent Act scheme. g h

[24] In that case a local authority had obtained a possession order in the then current terms of prescribed form N28. Its salient provisions were (see [1987] 1 WLR 1425 at 1428):

'It is adjudged that the plaintiff do recover against the defendant possession of the [identified] land . . . It is ordered that the judgment for possession shall not be enforced for 28 days in any event, and for so long thereafter as the defendant punctually pays . . . [the arrears of rent . . . and] costs by instalments of £10 per week in addition to the current rent. j

And also that the judgment shall cease to be enforceable when the [arrears of rent . . . and] costs referred to above are satisfied.'

[25] Russell LJ (with whom Sir Denys Buckley agreed) commented ([1987] 1 WLR 1425 at 1428):

> 'It is to be observed that on the face of the order it does not purport to terminate the tenancy. The tenancy, in my judgment, plainly continues and is recognised by the order as continuing. The judgment for possession, however, is suspended so long as the current rent is paid in addition to the arrears. If that were not the true interpretation of the order, then plainly the words "the current rent" to which I have adverted, would not appear as they do.'

He went on to hold, however ([1987] 1 WLR 1425 at 1430–1431), that—

> 'once the defendant in proceedings of this kind where there is a suspended order for possession, ceases to comply with the conditions of the order, namely, "the punctual payment of the current rent and arrears," and there is a breach of the terms of the order, the tenancy, whatever it may be, from that moment comes to an end.'

[26] The decision in Thompson v Elmbridge BC led to a certain amount of disquiet (see, for instance, Jim Driscoll, 'Rent Arrears, Suspended Possession Orders and the Rights of Secure Tenants' (1988) 51 MLR 371 and an authoritative suggestion for different wording for a suspended possession order, Judge John Platt and Nic Madge, 'Suspended Possession Orders' (1991) NLJ 853). However, the revised version of Form N28 that was issued in 1993 did not adopt this suggestion. Instead, it was in these 'user-friendly' terms:

> '1. The court has decided unless you make the payments set out in paragraph 2 you must give the plaintiff possession of (premises) on . . . [insert date] . . .
>
> 3. You must pay the plaintiff the total amount of £ [. . .] by instalments of £ [. . .] per [. . .] in addition to the current rent . . . When you have paid the total amount mentioned, the plaintiff will not be able to take any steps to evict you as a result of this order.
>
> 4. If you do not pay the money owed and costs by the dates given and the current rent, the plaintiff can ask the court bailiff to evict you and remove your goods to obtain payment . . .'

This was followed by the 2001 revision (for which see Appendix 1).

[27] Although the 1993 version of Form N28 could reasonably be interpreted as postponing possession after the date mentioned in para 1 so long as the tenant complied with the condition set out in the order, the stark language of the 2001 revision permitted no such interpretation. Possession was postponed until the date fixed in para 1 and the tenancy would then come to an end through the operation of s 82(2) of the 1985 Act. Thereafter execution of the order would be suspended so long as the conditions set out in the order were complied with (see the judgment of Sir Andrew Morritt C in Harlow DC v Hall [2006] All ER (D) 393 (Feb) at [13]):

> 'In my view the possession order and its effect is clear. Paragraph 1 of the order required Mr Hall to give possession on 9 February 2005. As the order was made on 12 January 2005 it was suspended in the sense that it was to take effect on a specified future date, but the obligation to give possession on or before 9 February was not qualified by the postponement of its enforcement in the event of compliance with para 5. The distinction between suspending the execution of the order and postponing the date for possession is also made in s 85(2). Accordingly it is, in my view, plain that the date on which the tenant "is to give up possession [of the dwelling house] in pursuance of the order" for the purposes of s 82(2) was 9 February 2005 whether or not the conditions prescribed by para 5 for the postponement of its enforcement were observed. It follows that the secure tenancy had ended before the bankruptcy order was made on 10 February 2005.'

[28] In his concurring judgment Chadwick LJ observed (at [23]) that when a court is considering the exercise of its powers under s 85(2) of the 1985 Act, it must first decide (under para (b)) whether to postpone the date for possession, and then decide (under para (a)) whether execution of the order for possession should be stayed or suspended for a further period. He went on to say (at [25]) that when construing a possession order made under Pt IV of the 1985 Act the object was to ascertain whether the court, when making the order, had specified a date in the future—and, if so, what date—when possession had to be given by the tenant.

[29] It will have been noticed that it was not until the 1993 revision of the prescribed form (see [26], above) that a date for possession was set out at the start of the order (albeit in conditional terms in that version of the form). In our judgment there is nothing in s 85 of the 1985 Act that fetters the discretion of a district judge to make such order for postponement of possession as he thinks fit. This statutory provision is the lineal successor, in a different context, of the provision which this court interpreted in Sherrin v Brand (orse Phelps) [1956] 1 All ER 194, [1956] 1 QB 403 (see [19]–[22], above), and the width of the discretion available to the judge is precisely the same.

[30] The answer to the first question we have to decide is therefore that a judge is not obliged to set out an absolute date for possession on the face of his order. There is, indeed, a vivid contrast between the expression 'for such period or periods as the court thinks fit' in s 85(2) of the 1985 Act and the phrase 'a date specified in the order' in ss 82(3), 82A(3), 83(3) and 84(4). In our judgment, given that the judge is not obliged by statute to specify a date in this type of order, it is lawful for him to make an order in the revised form suggested at [10], above. This sets out a date for possession but provides that the date will be postponed and the tenancy will continue so long as the conditions set out in the order continue to be satisfied. The court will be postponing the date of possession for a fixed period in the first instance and thereafter for such period as the tenant complies with his obligations under the order. This fits naturally the statutory language in s 85(2).

[31] We turn to consider the second issue in the appeal. As we foreshadowed at [11], above, Mr Luba championed a form of order in rather more sophisticated terms:

'Conditional possession order

1. The D is to deliver up to C possession of [address].

2. The date on which the D is to deliver possession of premises to the C is postponed to a date to be fixed by this court on application by the C.

3. The D must pay the C £ [. . .] for rent arrears calculated up to [date] and £ [. . .] for costs. The total judgment debt is £ [. . .] to be paid by instalments specified in para 4 below.

4. The C shall not be entitled to apply for an order fixing the date for possession and termination of the D's tenancy for so long as D pays C the current rent, in respect of which the next payment shall be made on or before [date] together with instalments of £ [. . .] per [week/fortnight/month] towards the judgment debt. In respect of which the first payment must be made on or before [. . .]

5. Any application to fix the date on which the D is to give up possession shall be made to a district judge on 7 days notice to the D and shall be heard in private.

6. The order shall cease to be enforceable when the judgment debt is satisfied.'

[32] He said that such a form of order would expunge at a stroke all the difficulties that have been encountered in this field since the effect of s 82(2) of the 1985 Act was illuminated by this court in Thompson v Elmbridge BC [1987] 1 WLR 1425. Under the rule in that case, any breach of a condition of a postponement order will terminate the tenancy, however innocent the tenant may be: a failure by the housing benefit authorities that cannot be ascribed to any shortcoming by the tenant, for instance, or even arrangements made between the DWP and the landlord which provide for payments four-weekly in arrears when a failure to pay each week will represent a breach of the order such as to terminate the tenancy.

[33] In an annex to his written submissions Mr Luba set out very clearly a number of reasons why the status of 'tolerated trespasser' is profoundly unsatisfactory. This status will arise after a secure tenancy has been terminated (whether because the date stated for possession to be given has passed or because the conditions of a conditional order have been breached), and when the former landlord will not necessarily evict the former tenant but may be content to allow him/her to remain in occupation, paying mesne profits and a contribution towards the accumulated arrears. Although the former secure tenant would be entitled to apply for a further postponement of the date for possession he/she will not always be successful in that respect. For authoritative descriptions of the legal position see Burrows v Brent London BC [1996] 4 All ER 577 at 584, [1996] 1 WLR 1448 at 1455 per Lord Browne-Wilkinson and Marshall v Bradford Metropolitan DC [2001] EWCA Civ 594 at [35], [2002] HLR 428 at [35] per Chadwick LJ.

[34] Mr Luba has listed nine reasons why the status of 'tolerated trespasser' is unsatisfactory for both landlord and tenant: (i) he/she cannot enforce any covenant to repair or any other contractual term of the former tenancy. This will be equally true of any statutory rights contingent on 'tenant' status, such as the statutory right to buy, to effect a mutual exchange of tenancies, or to assign the tenancy. (ii) It is not clear whether he/she has a 'right to occupy . . . by virtue of any enactment' for the purposes of s 33 of the Family Law Act 1996. (iii) No statutory rights of succession can arise if he/she were to die. (iv) An application to resurrect a previous joint tenancy by postponing the date of possession can only be made under s 85(2) of the 1985 Act if both former joint tenants agree, and this may give rise to practical difficulties if one of the former joint tenants cannot be traced. (v) If a tenant clears the outstanding arrears before making a s 85 application, he/she will have no standing to reinstate the tenancy and sue for breach of a repairing covenant in that tenancy (see Marshall v Bradford Metropolitan DC). (vi) The landlord cannot enforce any covenant with regard to the former tenant's behaviour or any other covenant of the former tenancy agreement (e g 'to maintain the garden'). See Sheffield City Council v Hopkins [2001] EWCA Civ 1023 at [29], [2002] HLR 237 at [29] per Lord Woolf CJ and Manchester City Council v Finn [2002] EWCA Civ 1998, [2003] HLR 596 for some of the difficulties that may result. (vii) The statutory framework for increasing the rent payable by a secure tenant does not apply once the occupier has become a trespasser. (viii) It has now been established that a secure tenancy will be lost by a breach of the conditions in a possession order, and that it will only revive if there is an application pursuant to s 85 of the 1985 Act (see Marshall v Bradford Metropolitan DC [2002] HLR 428 at [29] and Lambeth LBC v O'Kane, Helena Housing Ltd v Pinder [2005] EWCA Civ 1010 at [58], [2006] HLR 21 at [58] per Arden LJ. (ix) Problems arise in respect of a stock transfer between a local housing authority and a registered social landlord, because it is only the rights of tenants which survive the transfer.

[35] Mr Luba told us that there are now tens of thousands of occupants living in this 'twilight zone' because they have breached suspended orders for possession, often because of housing benefit delays. A much smaller number of occupants remain in occupation after immediate orders for possession have been made.

[36] Although the Law Commission has now recommended the steps to be taken whereby this very unsatisfactory position may be corrected (see Renting Homes: The Final Report, Vol 1 (2006) (Law Com no 297), p 75 (paras 4.54–4.56)), by the very nature of things, even if its recommendation were accepted, it would take time for a new legislative solution to come into effect. In the meantime it appears to us to be appropriate to make it clear that even under existing legislation the courts possess more flexible powers for setting the terms of a postponed possession order than is generally appreciated.

[37] But we do not consider it necessary or appropriate to give a fair wind to any procedure which will require a further hearing before a date for possession can be fixed, with all the attendant expense and delay that this might involve. It would in our judgment be sufficient for possession to be postponed on the terms that if a claimant landlord wishes a date to be fixed, it must write to the defendant giving details of the current arrears and its intention to request a date to be fixed at least 14 days before it makes that application. If the tenant does not respond, or if the landlord wishes to apply for a date to be fixed notwithstanding the tenant's response, it will then be at liberty to apply to the court on a 'without notice' basis requesting a date to be fixed. With its application the landlord must submit to the court a copy of its letter (and the tenant's response, if any), together with a copy of the rent account since the date of the order postponing possession. Other evidence will seldom be required.

[38] If the landlord knows that the DWP pays amounts towards the arrears as a matter of practice four-weekly in arrears it will no doubt desist from applying for a date on that ground alone, because it will know that even if the tenant does not mention this in his response (if any), the tenant is likely to apply to have the court's order set aside if the apparent failure to comply strictly with the terms of the order has occurred for this reason alone.

[39] It is, in our judgment, both lawful and appropriate to make an order along the following lines:

> '1. The defendant is to give up possession of [address] to the claimant.
>
> 2. The date on which the defendant is to give up possession of the property to the claimant is postponed to a date to be fixed by the court on an application by the claimant.
>
> 3. The defendant must pay the claimant £ [. . .] for rent arrears and £ [. . .] for costs. The total judgment debt is £ [. . .] to be paid by instalments as specified in para 4 below.
>
> 4. The claimant shall not be entitled to make an application for a date to be fixed for the giving up of possession and the termination of the defendant's tenancy so long as the defendant pays the claimant the current rent together with instalments of £ [. . .] per week towards the judgment debt.

5. The first payment of the current rent and the instalment must be made on or before [date].

6. Any application to fix the date on which the defendant is to give up possession may be determined on the papers without a hearing (unless the district judge considers that such a hearing is appropriate) provided that: (a) the claimant has written to the defendant at least 14 days before making its application giving details of the current arrears and its intention to request that a date be fixed; and (b) a copy of that letter (and the defendant's response, if any) together with the rent account showing any transactions since the date of this order are attached to the application.

7. This order shall cease to be enforceable [on [date]] [when the judgment debt is satisfied].'

[40] In his very helpful submissions Mr Rutledge told us that what his clients and other local authority landlords desire is certainty, together with the avoidance of the expense and delay that would necessarily be associated with a two-stage procedure. The form of order which we have suggested will provide certainty in the sense that it will be clear to everyone that the tenancy will continue until the court fixes the date on which the defendant is to give up possession. On the second point, his clients will obtain a fixed date as soon as the court is satisfied, from perusing the documents filed with the court, that the tenant has defaulted on the terms on which possession was postponed and that there is no good reason not to fix the date for possession (and termination of the tenancy) forthwith.

[41] It would, in our judgment, be consistent with good practice if the landlord were to notify the tenant of the adverse consequences of the termination of his/her tenancy when embarking on the process that may lead to a possession order. Skilled housing lawyers may understand the legal consequences of the tenancy being terminated, but not everyone is a skilled housing lawyer, and in the interests of transparency it would be useful if they were stated clearly to the tenant as an additional spur to ensuring that arrears do not continue to accumulate.

[42] It goes without saying that when the court receives the landlord's request to fix a date it will have no jurisdiction to revisit the question whether it was reasonable to make a possession order at all (compare, in a different context, St Brice v Southwark London BC [2001] EWCA Civ 1138 at [17], [18], [40], [2002] LGR 117 at [17], [18], [40], [2002] 1 WLR 1537).

[43] In this judgment we have been concerned only to identify the terms of an order for postponement of possession that a court has power to make. What order the court will in fact make in any case will be a matter for the discretion of the judge on that occasion, although the working party (and in due course the Civil Procedure Rules Committee) will no doubt wish to prescribe or recommend simple forms of alternative order for the use of courts. If a tenant has a particularly bad record of payment, for instance, but is not yet deserving of an outright possession order, the court might wish to make an order along the lines of the current Form N28, although the use of the phrase 'in addition to your current rent' would be inapposite since the contractual tenancy would have been brought to an end by the making of the order.

[44] It will be for the working party and the Rules Committee to consider whether it might be desirable to alter the provisions of CCR Ord 26, r 17(2) (which forms part of Sch 2 to the CPR). On the proper construction of this rule it is currently not permissible for a landlord to make a combined application to fix a date and request a warrant for possession, and it may be thought desirable for the landlord to make such an application in an appropriate case.

[45] So far as the present appeals are concerned, we are satisfied that for very understandable reasons the district judges fettered their discretion too narrowly. For the reasons set out in this judgment the court will therefore allow the appeals and order that in each case the district judge's order for possession and money judgment shall stand but the claim will be remitted to the county court to determine what, if any, terms of postponement of possession are appropriate.

Appeals allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

APPENDIX 1

Operative parts of Form N28

'and the court orders that

1. The defendant give the claimant possession of [. . .] on or before [. . .].
2. The defendant pay the claimant £ [. . .] for [. . .].
3. The defendant pay the claimant's costs of the claim £ [. . .].
4. The defendant pay the total of £ [. . .] to the claimant on or before [. . .].
5. This order is not to be enforced so long as the defendant pays the claimant the rent arrears and the amount for use and occupation [and costs, totalling] £ [. . .] by the payments set out below in addition to the current rent.

Payments required

[£ [. . .] on or before [. . .] and]

£ [. . .] per [. . .], the first payment being made on or before [. . .].'

APPENDIX 2

Housing Act 1985

'82. . . . (2) Where the landlord obtains an order for the possession of the dwelling-house, the tenancy ends on the date on which the tenant is to give up possession in pursuance of the order . . .

85.—(1) Where proceedings are brought for possession of a dwelling-house let under a secure tenancy . . . the court may adjourn the proceedings for such period or periods as it thinks fit.

(2) On the making of an order for possession of such a dwelling-house on any of those grounds, or at any time before the execution of the order, the court may—(a) stay or suspend the execution of the order, or (b) postpone the date of possession, for such period or periods as the court thinks fit.

(3) On such an adjournment, stay, suspension or postponement the court—(a) shall impose conditions with respect to the payment by the tenant of arrears of rent (if any) and rent or payments in respect of occupation after the termination of the tenancy (mesne profits), unless it considers that to do so would cause exceptional hardship to the tenant or would otherwise be unreasonable, and (b) may impose such other conditions as it thinks fit.

(4) If the conditions are complied with, the court may, if it thinks fit, discharge or rescind the order for possession.' (Our emphasis.)

Hilali v Central Court of Criminal Proceedings No 5 of the National Court, Madrid and another

[2006] EWHC 1239 (Admin)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (DIVISIONAL COURT)

SCOTT BAKER LJ AND OPENSHAW J

26, 27 APRIL, 26 MAY 2006

Extradition – Extradition hearing – Initial hearing – Identity of person arrested – Appropriate judge deciding issue of identity at initial hearing – Different judge at extradition hearing determining issue afresh – Whether judge at extradition hearing having jurisdiction to review finding of identity made at initial hearing – Extradition Act 2003, s 7.

Spain sought the extradition of the appellant under a European arrest warrant issued by the first respondent court. The proceedings fell within Pt 1 of the Extradition Act 2003. The appellant was arrested and brought before the district judge. The district judge at that initial hearing was required by s 7(2)[a] of the 2003 Act to decide on the balance of probabilities whether the person brought before him was the person in respect of whom the warrant was issued. The district judge concluded that the appellant was the person named in the warrant. At the extradition hearing a different district judge decided he had power to review that decision, but reached the same conclusion as the district judge at the initial hearing. He made an extradition order and the appellant appealed, contending, inter alia, that his identity had not been proved as required by s 7. The first respondent raised the question as to whether the district judge at the extradition hearing had had any jurisdiction to review the decision.

Held – It was doubtful whether a district judge at an extradition hearing had jurisdiction to review a finding of identity under s 7 of the 2003 Act made at an initial hearing. Under Pt 1 of the 2003 Act the question of identity fell to be resolved at an initial hearing. There was no right of appeal against a decision under s 7(2) that the person brought before the judge was the person in respect of whom the warrant was issued. In the absence of such jurisdiction the appropriate route for challenging the decision would be judicial review. In the instant case, however, the district judge at the initial hearing had been entitled to conclude on the balance of probabilities that the appellant was the person named in the warrant. None of the other grounds of appeal being made out, the appeal would, accordingly, be dismissed (see [16]–[20], [36], [44], [58], [91], [106], [115], below).

Nikonovs v Governor of Brixton Prison [2006] 1 All ER 927 considered.

Notes

For the initial hearing: identity of person arrested, see Supp to 17(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1408.

a Section 7, so far as material, is set out at [16], below

For the Extradition Act 2003, s 7, see 18 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2005 reissue) 813.

Cases referred to in judgment

Boudhiba v Central Examining Court No 5 of the National Court of Justice, Madrid [2006] EWHC 167 (Admin), [2006] 3 All ER 574.
Cruz Varas v Sweden (1991) 14 EHRR 1, [1991] ECHR 15576/89, ECt HR.
Dabas v High Court of Justice, Madrid, Spain [2006] EWHC 971 (Admin), [2006] All ER (D) 47 (May).
Dehwari v Netherlands (2001) 29 EHRR CD 74, E Com HR.
Drozd v France (1992) 14 EHRR 745, [1992] ECHR 12747/87, ECt HR.
Einhorn v France App No 71555/01 (16 October 2001, unreported), ECt HR.
Faraj, Re [2004] EWHC 2950 (Admin), [2004] All ER (D) 137 (Dec).
Fernandez v Government of Singapore [1971] 2 All ER 691, [1971] 1 WLR 987.
Government of Belgium v Postlethwaite [1987] 2 All ER 985, sub nom R v Governor of Ashford Remand Centre, ex p Postlethwaite [1988] AC 924, [1987] 3 WLR 365, HL.
Government of Denmark v Nielsen [1984] 2 All ER 81, [1984] AC 606, [1984] 2 WLR 737, HL.
Government of the United States of America v Montgomery (No 2) [2004] UKHL 37, [2004] 4 All ER 289, [2004] 1 WLR 2241.
Ismail, Re [1998] 3 All ER 1007, [1999] 1 AC 320, [1998] 3 WLR 495.
Nikonovs v Governor of Brixton Prison [2005] EWHC 2405 (Admin), [2006] 1 All ER 927.
Office of the King's Prosecutor, Brussels v Cando Armas [2005] UKHL 67, [2006] 1 All ER 647, [2005] 3 WLR 1079.
R (on the application of Bermingham) v Director of the Serious Fraud Office, Bermingham v Government of the United States of America [2006] EWHC 200 (Admin), [2006] 3 All ER 239.
R (on the application of Bleta) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] EWHC 2034 (Admin), [2005] 1 All ER 810, [2005] 1 WLR 3194.
R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator, Do v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] UKHL 26, [2004] 3 All ER 785, [2004] 2 AC 323, [2004] 3 WLR 23.
Ramda v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2005] EWHC 2526 (Admin), [2005] All ER (D) 223 (Nov).
Razaghi v Sweden App No 64599/01 (11 March 2003, unreported), ECt HR.
Rey v Government of Switzerland [1999] 1 AC 54, [1998] 3 WLR 1, PC.
Schtraks v Government of Israel [1962] 3 All ER 529, [1964] AC 556, [1962] 3 WLR 1013.
Serbeh, Re [2002] EWHC 2356 (Admin), [2002] All ER (D) 468 (Oct).
Soering v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 439, [1989] ECHR 14038/88, ECt HR.
Tomic v UK App No 17837/03 (14 October 2003, unreported), ECt HR.
Vilvarajah v UK (1992) 14 EHRR 248, [1991] ECHR 13163/87, ECt HR.

Appeal

Farid Hilali appealed under s 26 of the Extradition Act 2003 against the extradition order made by Senior District Judge Workman on 1 June 2005 in the Bow Street Magistrates' Court under s 21(3) of the 2003 Act ordering his extradition to Spain. The respondents to the appeal were the Central Court of Criminal Proceedings No 5 of the National Court, Madrid, which had issued a European arrest warrant on 29 April 2004 and the Senior District Judge. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Alun Jones QC and Osama Daneshyar (instructed by Arani & Co, Southall) for the appellant.

John Hardy and Clair Dobbin (instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service) for the first respondent.

The second respondent did not appear.

Cur adv vult

26 May 2006. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

SCOTT BAKER LJ.

[1] This is the judgment of the court. There is before the court an appeal by Farid Hilali brought under s 26 of the Extradition Act 2003. The appeal is against an extradition order made by Senior District Judge Workman on 1 June 2005 in the Bow Street Magistrates' Court under s 21(3) of the 2003 Act ordering his extradition to Spain. Spain seeks his extradition under a European arrest warrant (EAW) issued by the Central Court of Criminal Proceedings, Madrid, on 29 April 2004.

[2] The appeal is concerned with Pt 1 of the 2003 Act. This Act created a new extradition regime. The origins of Pt 1 are to be found in the Council Framework Decision (on the European arrest warrant and the surrender procedures between member states) (OJ 2002 L190 p 1). As Laws LJ pointed out in R (on the application of Bermingham) v Director of the Serious Fraud Office, Bermingham v Government of the United States of America [2006] EWHC 200 (Admin), [2006] 3 All ER 239, Pt 1 of the 2003 Act contains provisions dealing with extradition from the United Kingdom to 'category 1' territories, namely territories designated by the Secretary of State that are, in effect European Union countries which operate the EAW.

[3] The preamble to the Framework Decision refers to the objective for the European Union to become an area of freedom, security and justice and the abolition of extradition between member states and its replacement by a system of surrender between judicial authorities. The new system is said to be designed to remove the complexity and potential for delay inherent in the previous extradition procedures. Reference is made to 'a system of free movement of judicial decisions in criminal matters, covering both pre-sentence and final decisions within an area of freedom, security and justice'. In our judgment it is important to keep in mind the objectives of speed and simplicity when interpreting Pt 1 of the Act, albeit those desirable objectives must be balanced against the legitimate rights of the individual.

[4] Extradition is sought on the basis that the appellant's conduct falls within the framework list offence of participation in a terrorist organisation. The EAW sets out particulars of the conspiracy and the appellant's alleged role in it. In summary, what is alleged is that there was a group of conspirators within Europe who were involved in the preparation for the attacks on 11 September 2001 in the United States and that the conspirators all collaborated in those attacks either directly or indirectly.

[5] Barakat Yarkas was initially alleged to be a key figure within the conspiracy in Spain and he had links with the leadership of Al Qa'ida. The appellant is a former Mujahedeen who was in contact with Yarkas. Yarkas is said to be linked to Bahaji, a member of the unit led by Atta, the leader of the 11 September atrocities.

[6] The allegations against the appellant are in summary as follows. He arrived in the United Kingdom in 1987 and remained here for ten years. At the end of 1998 he went to Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Afghanistan using forged documentation. He was arrested in 1999 in the United Arab Emirates and deported to Morocco. He left Morocco and returned to the United Kingdom via Spain. On 6 November 1999 he returned to Spain. In 2001 he was living in Grenada with Jasem Mahboule with the support of other parties to the conspiracy who were under the leadership of Yarkas. Yarkas lived in Spain and had an address in Madrid.

[7] On 6 August 2001 there was a telephone conversation between Yarkas and the appellant. In it the appellant told Yarkas that he was cutting off his old communications and that he did not want anyone to know of him. He thanked him for his support and made reference to having 'a month to go'.

[8] This was followed up by another telephone call on 27 August 2001 in which the appellant stated he was 'taking very good lessons' and that he had now 'entered the aviation sector'. He went on to say that they had 'slit the throat of the bird'. He referred to suspicions that his phone was being tapped.

[9] There were two further conversations between Yarkas and the appellant after 11 September. There was a veiled reference to their being watched by the police. There was also a reference to the possibility of the appellant going to another country.

[10] Given these links to Yarkas and others within the conspiracy and the references within the recorded telephone calls to the effect that the appellant was part of a unit training in aircraft linked to the attacks of 11 September the respondent sought the extradition of the appellant in the following terms:

> 'During the 45 days previous to the terrorist attacks of 11 September, the members of the group ("commando") that committed the attacks travelled constantly in aeroplanes in order to analyse them and to be prepared for the day of action. It is precisely during this period of time when the conversations of 6 August and 27 August 2001 took place. In these conversations, SHAKUR/SHUKRI (FARID HILALI) tells Abu Dahdah that he had a month to go and that he had some important matters to do, that he had ordered threads and things that Abu Dahdah (Yarkas) was going to like, that everything was going to be fine and that he had cut off all his old conversations . . . that he had entered the aviation sector, that he had slit the throat of the bird, that he was taking good lessons and that it would take him more or less a month.'

[11] It was submitted on behalf of the first respondent that had this conduct taken place in the United Kingdom it would have amounted to the offences of: (1) conspiring, between 1 January 2000 and 12 September 2001, in Spain with Yarkas and others to pursue a course of conduct that would necessarily amount to or involve the commission of an offence of murder of persons in America; (2) directing the activities of an organisation, namely Al Qa'ida, which is concerned in the commission of acts of terrorism; (3) destroying, damaging or endangering the safety of an aircraft; (4) terrorist bombing. This is how the case was initially put by the first respondent but, as will become apparent, it was argued more narrowly on the appeal.

[12] Following the extradition order against the appellant on 1 June 2005, on 26 September 2005 the first respondent gave judgment in the trial of 24 other individuals accused with the appellant of being part of an Islamic terrorist network in Spain. A number of those individuals had been trained in Mujahedeen training camps in Bosnia, Indonesia and Afghanistan and upon return to Spain became involved, so it was alleged, in supporting or participating in terrorist activity. Yarkas was described as being at the 'top of the pyramid' and as being 'fully integrated' into Al Qa'ida. Twelve of those were convicted of the offence of 'integration in a terrorist group'. These included Mahboule, Mohamed Zaher Asade, Yarkas and Gahaleb Kalaje Zouaydi (individuals who are referred to in the EAW).

[13] A further five of those accused were found guilty of the lesser offence of 'collaboration with a terrorist group'. Yarkas was further convicted of 'conspiracy to commit terrorist killing'. He was, however, found not guilty of 'terrorist homicide'.

[14] It is an important plank in the argument of Mr Alun Jones QC, who has appeared for the appellant, that Yarkas has an appeal pending in the Spanish Supreme Court against his Spanish conviction on 26 September 2005 for conspiracy to commit terrorist killing and that his appeal is supported by the prosecution on the basis that the evidence against him on that offence is too weak. His argument, as we understand it, is that if the case against Yarkas on conspiracy to commit terrorist killing cannot stand there is no case against the appellant either. It should be noted, however, that this is not accepted by the Spanish authorities and, even if acquitted of conspiracy to commit terrorist killing, Yarkas would remain convicted of 'integration in a terrorist group'. It is also to be observed that the Spanish court has not yet, as we understand it, made a decision on the Yarkas appeal. We shall return to this aspect of the case later.

[15] The appellant's grounds of appeal are contained under seven headings. It is convenient to deal first with ground 5, proof of identity.

PROOF OF IDENTITY

[16] The appellant contends that his identity was not proved as required by s 7 of the 2003 Act. Section 7 is headed 'Identity of person arrested'. The material parts of the section are as follows:

> '(1) This section applies if—(a) a person arrested under a Part 1 warrant is brought before the appropriate judge under section 4(3) . . .
>
> (2) The judge must decide whether the person brought before him is the person in respect of whom—(a) the warrant referred to in subsection (1)(a) was issued . . .
>
> (3) The judge must decide the question in subsection (2) on a balance of probabilities . . .'

[17] What happened was this. On his first appearance before the court the appellant came before District Judge Pratt who considered the issue of identification under s 7 as he was obliged to do. The appellant acknowledged that he was Farid Hilali and Judge Pratt concluded, on balance of probabilities, that he was the person being sought in the EAW. It appears highly likely, although it is impossible to be certain, that the district judge had before him a witness statement of Detective Sergeant Flood in the following terms:

> 'On Monday 28th June 2004 I was on duty at Paddington Green Police Station when a man who I now know as Farid HILALI was brought into the secure area. I approached him and identified myself to him by showing him my warrant card. I said to him "can you tell me your full name?" He said "Farid HILALI" I said "and your date of birth" He said "21/08/1962". I said "Mr HILALI I am arresting you under a European Arrest Warrant issued by the Government of Spain and certified by the UK authority. This warrant alleges Terrorist offences against you and the Spanish authorities are seeking your extradition on those matters" I then cautioned him at 9.15 am to which he made no reply. I said "Do you understand why you have been arrested" He replied "Yes". I then gave Mr HILALI a copy of the European Arrest Warrant in both English and Spanish as well as the certificate.'

The date of birth on the EAW corresponded as to day and month but not year with the date given by the appellant; the warrant gave the year as 1968.

[18] The question is whether District Judge Pratt was entitled to conclude on balance of probabilities that the appellant was the person named in the warrant. In our judgment on the basis of the material that we have described, and in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, he was so entitled.

[19] In the event, when the extradition hearing took place in January 2005 Senior District Judge Workman decided he had power to review the decision albeit it was not suggested the person brought before him was different from the person before Judge Pratt. Judge Workman reached the same conclusion as Judge Pratt. Mr Hardy, who has appeared for the first respondent, rightly raised the question whether Judge Workman had any jurisdiction to review the decision and submits that it is at least arguable that he did not. Under Pt 1 of the Act (in contradistinction to Pt 2) the question of identity falls to be resolved at an initial hearing. There is no right of appeal by the appellant against a decision under s 7(2). The right of appeal lies only against an order of extradition (see s 26 and Nikonovs v Governor of Brixton Prison [2005] EWHC 2405 (Admin) at [9]–[15], [2006] 1 All ER 927 at [9]–[15]).

[20] We have considerable doubt whether Judge Workman did have jurisdiction to review the finding of identity, although we can well understand why he was anxious to ensure that there had been no error. In the absence of such jurisdiction the appropriate route for challenging Judge Pratt's decision would, in our judgment, be judicial review. Had we thought there was any substance in Mr Alun Jones's submission we would have been prepared to grant permission to apply for judicial review out of time in respect of Judge Pratt's decision. In the event, however, we have no doubt that he was entitled to reach the decision that he did. As Judge Workman pointed out, when one considers the whole of the EAW it is plainly being said that Hilali, Shukri and Shakur are one and the same person.

[21] The person named in the warrant appears immediately under the heading 'information on the identity of the requested person:' as follows:

Last name: Hilali

First name: Farid

Alias (if any): Shukri and Shakur

[22] Mr Alun Jones's submission is that the warrant contains insufficient evidence to establish that the appellant, who admittedly identified himself in court as 'Farid Hilali', is the person referred to in the warrant. We cannot accept this submission. While it is true that when arrested the appellant gave his year of birth as 1962 whereas it is stated as 1968 in the warrant, it is of much more significance, that both the day and month he gave corresponded with the day and month stated in the arrest warrant. Nor is it a case, as it appears to us, where there was any dispute before Judge Pratt as to the identity of the appellant. The first respondent was simply put to proof on the balance of probabilities under s 7. Accordingly, we conclude there is no substance in this ground.

WAS THE APPELLANT 'ACCUSED' OF AN OFFENCE?

[23] By ground 3 it is alleged that the appellant was not 'accused' of an offence. Section 64 provides that a person (ie the appellant) must be 'accused' of an offence. Mr Alun Jones's argument is that merely being suspected of the offence is insufficient, the higher threshold of an accusation is required. He submits that the EAW does not cross that threshold.

[24] Lord Steyn had this to say about the meaning of 'accused' in Re Ismail [1998] 3 All ER 1007 at 1011, [1999] 1 AC 320 at 326:

> 'It is common ground that mere suspicion that an individual has committed offences is insufficient to place him in the category of "accused" persons. It is also common ground that it is not enough that he is in the traditional phrase "wanted by the police to help them with their inquiries". Something more is required. What more is needed to make a suspect an "accused" person? There is no statutory definition. Given the divergent systems of law involved, and notably the differences between criminal procedures in the United Kingdom and in civil law jurisdictions, it is not surprising that the legislature has not attempted a definition. For the same reason it would be unwise for the House to attempt to define the word "accused" within the meaning of the 1989 Act. It is, however, possible to state in outline the approach to be adopted. The starting point is that "accused" in s 1 of the 1989 Act is not a term of art. It is a question of fact in each case whether the person passes the threshold test of being an "accused" person. Next there is the reality that one is concerned with the contextual meaning of "accused" in a statute intended to serve the purpose of bringing to justice those accused of serious crimes. There is a transnational interest in the achievement of this aim. Extradition treaties, and extradition statutes, ought, therefore, to be accorded a broad and generous construction so far as the texts permits it in order to facilitate extradition: see Government of Belgium v Postlethwaite [1987] 2 All ER 985 at 991–992, [1988] AC 924 at 946–947. That approach has been applied by the Privy Council to the meaning of "accused" in an extradition treaty: see Rey v Government of Switzerland [1999] 1 AC 54 at 62, [1998] 3 WLR 1 at 7.'

Lord Steyn was speaking of the Extradition Act 1989, but his words apply equally to the 2003 Act, as Latham LJ noted in Dabas v High Court of Justice, Madrid, Spain [2006] EWHC 971 (Admin), [2006] All ER (D) 47 (May) to which we shall refer in more detail in a moment.

[25] In Office of the King's Prosecutor, Brussels v Cando Armas [2005] UKHL 67 at [53], [2006] 1 All ER 647 at [53], [2005] 3 WLR 1079 Lord Scott of Foscote observed that the grounds on which a member state can decline to execute an EAW issued by another member state are very limited but that arts 3 and 4 of the Framework Decision set out the grounds on which execution must or may be refused. He went on:

> '[53] ... None of these grounds enable the merits of the proposed prosecution or the soundness of the conviction or the effect of the sentence to be challenged. There is one qualification that should, perhaps, be mentioned. The execution of an arrest warrant can be refused if, broadly speaking, there is reason to believe that its execution could lead to breaches of the human rights of the person whose extradition is sought (see recitals 12 and 13).

[54] These features of the Framework Decision explain, I think, the inclusion in the 2003 Act of the requirement that if an arrest warrant is issued for the purpose of prosecuting the person named in the warrant, the arrest warrant must so state (see s 2(3)(b)). Extradition for the purpose of interrogation with a view to obtaining evidence for a prosecution, whether of the extradited individual or of anyone else, is not a legitimate purpose of an arrest warrant. But the judicial authority in the requested state cannot inquire into the purpose of the extradition. It is therefore necessary for there to be an unequivocal statement of that purpose in the arrest warrant itself. Hence the requirement in s 2(3)(b). It is to be noted that the opening words of the form of arrest warrant set out in the annex to the Framework Decision refer to a request that—

> "the person mentioned below be arrested and surrendered for the purposes of conducting a criminal prosecution or executing a custodial sentence or detention order."

It is presumably intended that the inapplicable alternative be deleted. The person in question is surely entitled to know which of the alternatives apply to him.'

[26] Against that background we turn to consider the terms of the warrant. Mr Hardy submits that, read as a whole, it is clear that the EAW was issued for the purpose of prosecuting the person named in it, ie the appellant. The question is what message does the warrant give to the appellant or any other reader?

[27] Considerable assistance is to be obtained from the judgment of Latham LJ, with whom Jack J agreed, in the Divisional Court's decision in Dabas v High Court of Justice, Madrid, Spain [2006] All ER (D) 47 (May), a case which, as its title illustrates, is another Spanish extradition case. The warrant in that case contained a similar, but not identical preamble to that in the present case. This is hardly surprising because the form of the warrant is, as Lord Scott pointed out in Armas's case, set out in the annex to the Framework Decision. Any differences may be due to translation. The wording of the preamble in the present case is:

> 'This warrant has been issued by a competent judicial authority. I request to arrest and deliver to the judicial authorities the following person in order to be criminally tried or to execute a penalty of imprisonment or a preventative measure or imprisonment.'

[28] Latham LJ, having considered the observations of Lord Steyn in Re Ismail, went on to say (at [12]):

> 'The courts have not so far had to consider the meaning of the word "accused" in s 2(3) of the 2003 Act: but I cannot believe that the general approach should be any different to that adumbrated by Lord Steyn in relation to its meaning in the 1989 Act . . .'

He found support in the approval of Crane J in R (on the application of Bleta) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] EWHC 2034 (Admin), [2005] 1 All ER a 810, [2005] 1 WLR 3194 and Lord Hope of Craighead in Armas's case [2006] 1 All ER 647 at [48] and concluded (at [14]):

> 'In the present case, whilst I accept that the pro forma wording in the preamble to the warrant is not necessarily determinative of the issue of whether or not the requirements of s 2(2)(a)(b) have been met, it seems to me that the court could only properly conclude that they did not mean what they say if the context throws clear doubt upon their prima facie meaning. In my view nothing in the warrant itself could possibly justify the conclusion that they did not. The court out of which the warrant was issued was the "Court for Committal Proceedings". The decision identifies "Alleged offence of collaboration with Islamic terrorist organisations" in terms which do not suggest that the procedure was merely part of the process of investigation. The particulars provided in relation to the offence show that there is substantial evidence against the appellant, and not merely suspicion.'

b

c

[29] We return to the opening words of the EAW in the annex to the Framework Decision:

d

> 'This warrant has been issued by a competent judicial authority. I request that the person mentioned below be arrested and surrendered for the purposes of conducting a criminal prosecution or executing a custodial sentence or detention order.'

e Mr Hardy submits that they contemplate but two options, prosecution or sentence, the latter including detention. The wording of the request in the EAW in the present case is slightly different:

> 'I request to arrest and deliver to the judicial authorities the following person in order to be criminally tried or to execute a penalty of imprisonment or a preventive measure of imprisonment.'

f

Mr Jones submits this suggests there could be a third option contemplated namely preventive detention. In our judgment however the opening words of the EAW in the present case should be read in the light of the pro forma. We would regard any difference as likely to be attributable to translation. On any g realistic reading the EAW in the present case can only have been issued for one of two purposes, either trial or the serving of a sentence of imprisonment. Having concluded that the EAW could only have been issued for one of two mutually exclusive purposes one then turns to box (b) to see which purpose it serves. Box (b) is headed: 'Grounds for arrest: the warrant'. It continues:

h

> '1. Arrest warrant or executive's judicial resolution of equivalent level: Resolution decreeing the arrest and provisional imprisonment of the person in order to be at the disposition of Central Court of Criminal Proceedings number 5 of the national court . . .'

We take 'resolution' as being equivalent to an order of commitment.

j [30] Further comparison between the pro forma and the EAW is revealing. In the pro forma box, (b) is headed 'Decision on which the warrant is based'; in the EAW the words are 'Grounds for the arrest warrant'. The difference in wording is of no significance. There follow two alternatives numbered 1 and 2 but 2 has been omitted in the EAW. The distinction between 1 and 2 is to reflect whether the person sought to be extradited is required as here, to be tried or whether there is already a judgment against him which is sought to be enforced ie sentence. The omission of the second alternative in the EAW plainly indicates that the appellant was wanted in order to be prosecuted rather than to execute or enforce a sentence against him.

[31] Some further assistance is also to be found in box (c). This is headed in the pro forma 'Indications on the length of the sentence' and in the EAW 'Information on the extension of the penalty'. The pro forma then gives two headings: '1. Maximum length of the custodial sentence or detention order which may be imposed for the offence(s)' and '2. Length of the custodial sentence or detention order imposed', with a sub-heading: 'Remaining sentence to be observed.' The EAW provides under 1. 'Maximum extension of the penalty of imprisonment or the preventive measure of imprisonment that may be issued based on the imputed crime(s): 30 years' (our emphasis). The reference to an 'imputed' crime seems to us to be entirely consistent with the accusation of an offence rather than mere suspicion. Also, as was pointed out during argument, 30 years cannot realistically be considered to relate to pre-trial detention.

[32] The EAW continues by giving a good deal more by way of particulars than was strictly necessary. The core of it comes in para 4 at p 5 of the warrant:

> 'The conversations (the appellant) made on the 6th and 27th August 2001 show that he is isolated from his previous contacts, that he is participating in a commando that is being trained on aircrafts, a few days before the attacks of the 11th of September 2001 which leads to the conclusion that he was one of the men who participated in the attacks although it is clear he was not one of the suicidal pilots since there are telephone calls to IMAD EDDIN BARAT YARKAT after said date of the attacks.'

[33] It seems to us plain from the EAW that the appellant is wanted for trial in Spain because he is accused of one or more offences. The threshold between mere suspicion and accusation is comfortably crossed.

[34] If any fortification of our view is required it is to be found in the observation of Smith LJ with whom Newman J agreed, in Boudhiba v Central Examining Court No 5 of the National Court of Justice, Madrid [2006] EWHC 167 (Admin) at [21], [2006] 3 All ER 547 at [21], that the opening words of the EAW that the individual is wanted in order to be criminally tried would not be applicable absent a decision to prosecute having been taken.

[35] Mr Alun Jones submits that the language of the warrant is the language of suspicion rather than of accusation. We cannot agree; it seems to us that the fallacy in Mr Jones's submissions on this as with other of his submissions in this appeal is that we are not permitted to descend into an examination of the evidence or the strength of the case that the Spanish authorities may or may not have against the appellant.

[36] In our view the appellant is accused in a category 1 territory of the commission of an offence and the requirement in s 64(1)(a) of the 2003 Act is met.

THE APPELLANT IS NOT ACCUSED OF AN 'EXTRADITION OFFENCE'

[37] By ground 4 it is contended that the appellant has not been accused of an extradition offence. Section 10(2) of the 2003 Act requires the judge to decide whether the offence specified in the Pt 1 warrant is an extradition offence.

Section 64(2) sets out the conduct that constitutes an extradition offence. It is in these terms:

> 'The conduct constitutes an extradition offence in relation to the category 1 territory if these conditions are satisfied—(a) the conduct occurs in the category 1 territory and no part of it occurs in the United Kingdom; (b) a certificate issued by an appropriate authority of the category 1 territory shows that the conduct falls within the European framework list; (c) the certificate shows that the conduct is punishable under the law of the category 1 territory with imprisonment or another form of detention for a term of 3 years or a greater punishment.'

Section 64(3) provides:

> 'The conduct also constitutes an extradition offence in relation to the category 1 territory if these conditions are satisfied—(a) the conduct occurs in the category 1 territory; (b) the conduct would constitute an offence under the law of the relevant part of the United Kingdom if it occurred in that part of the United Kingdom; (c) the conduct is punishable under the law of the category 1 territory with imprisonment or another form of detention for a term of 12 months or a greater punishment (however it is described in that law).'

Section 64(4) provides:

> 'The conduct also constitutes an extradition offence in relation to the category 1 territory if these conditions are satisfied—(a) the conduct occurs outside the category 1 territory; (b) the conduct is punishable under the law of the category 1 territory with imprisonment or another form of detention for a term of 12 months or a greater punishment (however it is described in that law); (c) in corresponding circumstances equivalent conduct would constitute an extra-territorial offence under the law of the relevant part of the United Kingdom punishable with imprisonment or another form of detention for a term of 12 months or a greater punishment.'

It is unnecessary to recite the remaining provisions of the section.

[38] The appellant submits that the particulars of conduct set out in the EAW do not disclose any extradition offence. Section 64(2) does not apply because the appellant is alleged to have been in the United Kingdom when he took part in part of the conspiracy. Judge Workman however concluded that the provisions of sub-s (3) were satisfied. He said of the details given in the warrant:

> 'There are references in the description to a large number of countries. Many of the allegations against (the appellant) involve international telephone calls and in some instances it is difficult to be sure whether the person that (the appellant) is alleged to be speaking to is in Spain. I am however satisfied that the centre of the conspiracy revolves round a man named Abu Dahdah or Yarkas, whose home address was in Madrid. Those conversations link the (appellant) with Yarkas in Spain and with the conspiracy to the attack on the World Trade Centre and the Pentagon on 11 September 2001.
>
> If that conduct had occurred in England it would have constituted the offence of conspiracy to pursue a course of conduct that would necessarily amount or have amounted to or involve the commission of the offence of murder of persons in America—I am therefore satisfied that the conduct alleged amounts to an extradition offence under s 64(3).' a [39] The judge went on to reject the further submission that if there was no conduct in Spain there was nevertheless an extra-territorial offence in English law arising from the conduct alleged and that accordingly s 64(4) applied. The basis of this argument was that the aircraft were flying bombs and that there was an b intent to cause explosions within the meaning of the Explosive Substances Act 1883.

[40] In our judgment the judge was right to conclude that s 64(3) applies. The focus here was on conspiracy to murder. The conspiracy must be founded or maintained in Spain (the requesting jurisdiction). It is sufficient that any overt act c in furtherance of the conspiracy occurred in Spain. In fact a number of overt acts were alleged to have taken place in Spain. The EAW contends that the Yarkas group, of which the appellant was said to be a member, was involved in preparation for the attack on 11 September and that the appellant lived for a time in Spain. There were telephone calls to Yarkas in Spain on 6 and 27 August and 28 September. Thus s 64(3)(a) is satisfied. d

[41] As Mr Hardy points out, the origins of s 64(3) are to be found in Government of Denmark v Nielsen [1984] 2 All ER 81, [1984] AC 606 and the earlier extradition legislation. The degree of level of inquiry into international foreign law was in issue in that case. Nomenclature of the offence in the foreign state e does not matter. Lord Diplock said ([1984] 2 All ER 81 at 91, [1984] AC 606 at 625):

> 'So it is the facts proved before the magistrate at the hearing of committal proceedings against the fugitive criminal under ss 9–10 [of the Extradition Act 1970], and not whatever section of the Danish Criminal Code that may f be referred to in the original Danish warrant for arrest, that determine the only crime or crimes under Danish law for which the fugitive criminal who has been surrendered can be tried in Denmark without being given an opportunity of returning to the United Kingdom.'

[42] The next step is to transpose the alleged conduct to the United Kingdom g and ask whether in terms of English law, if the conduct were proved to have occurred here, it would constitute an offence. We have been referred to s 1A of the Criminal Law Act 1977 which covers conspiracy to commit offences outside the United Kingdom. Mr Hardy makes the point that the words 'if it occurred' in sub-s (b) mean 'if it is proved to have occurred'. We are looking at the conduct h of which the appellant is accused and not at issues of evidence as to whether the conduct alleged may or may not be established. The conduct alleged would constitute the offence of conspiracy to commit murder abroad if it occurred in this country and in our view the condition in s 64(3)(b) is met.

[43] That leaves s 64(3)(c). The conduct is punishable in Spain by up to j 30 years imprisonment. This comfortably exceeds the minimum period of 12 months specified in the subsection.

[44] Accordingly, this case falls within s 64(3) and in our judgment Judge Workman was right so to conclude. It is accordingly unnecessary for us to express any view upon whether this case is also covered by s 64(4).

SPECIALTY ARRANGEMENTS

[45] The appellant submits by ground 2 that there are no specialty arrangements within the meaning of s 11(1)(f) and s 17 of the 2003 Act and that specialty arrangements should not only exist but also be effective (see Laws LJ in Bermingham's case at [135]). Specialty is the term used in extradition law to describe the rule that an extradited person may only be tried in the requesting state for the crime or crimes for which he has been extradited. As Laws LJ pointed out in Bermingham's case, the 2003 Act refers to speciality rather then specialty. Like Laws LJ we shall continue to use the time-honoured word specialty. Under the 2003 Act the issue of specialty falls for consideration by the district judge in Pt 1 cases and by the Secretary of State in Pt 2 cases. Whilst the wording of ss 17 and 95 is not identical, the same considerations apply.

[46] Section 11 is headed 'Bars to extradition'. Various bars are then set out, one of which is specialty. The detailed provisions are to be found in s 17. Nothing turns on the detailed provisions of s 17 in the present case. The issue is whether there are practical and effective arrangements in Spain to ensure that the appellant will only be tried for the offence for which he has been extradited or others disclosed by the same facts.

[47] The bar of specialty was not raised before the district judge but that does not prevent the point being taken before us (see s 27). The fact however that the point was not taken before the district judge, despite the appellant's representation by experienced lawyers in the extradition field, is perhaps an indication that there is force in Mr Hardy's submissions that the point is wholly misconceived.

[48] The thrust of Mr Alun Jones's submission is that nothing in the papers in the present case enables the United Kingdom courts to be satisfied that there are the requisite specialty arrangements in Spain; we cannot be satisfied that there are practical and effective arrangements.

[49] In our judgment the basic question is whether the rule of specialty is catered for in Spanish law. Mr Jones seems in effect to be suggesting that every EAW should recite the specialty arrangements in place.

[50] Mr Hardy submits that specialty arrangements have always been integral to the working of extradition. The rationale behind the rule is the exercise and preservation of sovereignty of the requested state over the person who is returned to the requesting territory. Spain and the United Kingdom are both signatories to the the European Convention on Extradition 1957 (Paris, 13 December 1957; TS 97 (1991); Cmnd 1762) which imposes on signatories the obligation to observe the rule of specialty (see art 14). They are also bound by the terms of the Framework Decision (see paras 2 and 3 of art 27).

[51] Mr Hardy further makes the point that, as with all bars to extradition under s 11 of the 2003 Act, the burden is on the appellant to establish that his extradition is barred.

[52] It seems to us a surprising submission that Spain is likely to act in breach of the international obligations to which it has signed up. There is no evidence before us that it has done so in the past and in these circumstances we would need compelling evidence that it is likely to do so in the future. By art 34 of the Framework Decision member states were requested to take the necessary measures to comply with its provisions by 31 December 2003. It is not suggested that Spain has failed to meet this implementation provision. It seems to us therefore that it is to be inferred that the specialty arrangements referred to in s 17(2) of the 2003 Act are in place.

[53] Against that background we turn to see how the appellant's case is put. In essence what it comes to is this. It is intended to prosecute him for murder and that would be a breach of the specialty rule. It is certainly true that prosecuting the appellant for murder would breach the specialty rule. We were referred to a letter dated 7 April 2006 written by Judge Fernando Marlaska Gomez from the Preliminary Investigating Court in Madrid in which there is a passage:

> 'With reference to the second offence included in the EAW which is a terrorist murder related to the famous 11s attacks of 2001 in the USA, the EAW must be also maintained for the second offence irrespective of the report issued by the Public Prosecutor of the Supreme Court, because of the following considerations . . .'

The considerations that follow are: (1) there is nothing to stop the appellant admitting his participation in those attacks; and (2) only the Supreme Court has the jurisdiction to assess the evidence against Yarkas; there is also referred to the 'degree of conspiracy' on his part.

[54] This letter was written as a result of questions whether the EAW against the appellant was to be maintained following the prosecution position on the appeal of Yarkas, to which we have referred in [14], above. It is clear that the EAW is maintained against the appellant and in its original form. We agree with Mr Hardy's submission that conspiracy to murder precisely replicates what the appellant will be tried for under Spanish law. It has never been suggested that the appellant was one of the suicide pilots (he would not be here today if he was) or that he was as a participant in all or any of the murders.

[55] What seems to us to be crucial are the facts upon the basis of which the appellant's return is sought. He is said to be one of a number of conspirators; that has not changed since the warrant was issued. Nor is it affected by the outcome of proceedings against Yarkas.

[56] In our view there is no evidence to suggest that the Spanish government is seeking the appellant's return for other than bona fide reasons or that they are asking for his return for other than the purpose requested.

[57] We entirely reject Mr Alun Jones's submission that the Spanish authorities probably have no idea about the provisions of s 17 and that they are going to prosecute him for an offence namely murder, for which he cannot be extradited. That seems to us to be tantamount to saying the Spanish authorities have no idea of their obligations under the Framework Decision. This is something we cannot accept.

[58] In our judgment the appellant's specialty argument is, as Mr Hardy submits, misconceived.

EXTRANEOUS CONSIDERATIONS AND HUMAN RIGHTS

[59] In ground 6 the appellant alleges that his extradition is barred by extraneous circumstances and in ground 7 that if he is extradited his human rights will be violated. There is a good deal of overlap between these two grounds. His essential complaint is that in Spain Arabs accused of committing Islamic terrorist offences are liable to be mistreated and will not—or at least may not—receive a fair trial.

EXTRANEOUS CONSIDERATIONS

[60] Section 13 of the Extradition Act 2003 provides:

> 'A person's extradition to a category 1 territory is barred by reason of extraneous considerations if (and only if) it appears that—(a) the Part 1 warrant issued in respect of him (though purporting to be issued on account of the extradition offence) is in fact issued for the purpose of prosecuting or punishing him on account of his race, religion, nationality, gender, sexual orientation or political opinions, or (b) if extradited he might be prejudiced at his trial or punished, detained or restricted in his personal liberty by reason of his race, religion, nationality, gender, sexual orientation or political opinions.'

[61] These provisions reflect s 6(1)(c) and (d) of the Extradition Act 1989; therefore the principles established under those provisions continue to apply.

[62] The burden is on the appellant to show a causal link between the issue of the warrant, his detention, prosecution, punishment or the prejudice which he asserts he will suffer and the fact of his race or his religion. He does not have to prove on the balance of probabilities that the events described in s 13(b) will take place, but he must show that there is a 'reasonable chance' or 'reasonable grounds for thinking' or a 'serious possibility' that such events will occur (see Fernandez v Government of Singapore [1971] 2 All ER 691, [1971] 1 WLR 987).

[63] It has long been established (since Schtraks v Government of Israel [1962] 3 All ER 529, [1964] AC 556) that the court in considering these matters is not bound by the ordinary rules of evidence; the appellant may rely on any material in support of a submission based on s 13.

HUMAN RIGHTS

[64] Ground 7 asserts that the appellant's surrender would not be compatible with his human rights; this is based on s 21(1) of the 2003 Act, which provides that:

> 'If the judge is required to proceed under this section (by virtue of section 11 or 20) he must decide whether the person's extradition would be compatible with the Convention rights within the meaning of the Human Rights Act 1998.'

[65] We turn to the relevant principles to apply. In R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator, Do v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] UKHL 26, [2004] 3 All ER 785, [2004] 2 AC 323, Lord Bingham said this:

> '[24] While the Strasbourg jurisprudence does not preclude reliance on articles other than art 3 as a ground for resisting extradition or expulsion, it makes it quite clear that successful reliance demands presentation of a very strong case. In relation to art 3, it is necessary to show strong grounds for believing that the person, if returned, faces a real risk of being subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment: see Soering v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 439 at 468–469 (para 91), Cruz Varas v Sweden (1991) 14 EHRR 1 at 33–34 (para 69), Vilvarajah v UK (1992) 14 EHRR 248 at 286–287 (para 103). In Dehwari v Netherlands (2001) 29 EHRR CD 74 at 75 (para 61) (see [15], above) the Commission doubted whether a real risk was enough to resist removal under art 2, suggesting that the loss of life must be shown to be a "near-certainty". Where reliance is placed on art 6 it must be shown that a person has suffered or risks suffering a flagrant denial of a fair trial in the receiving state: see Soering v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 439 at 479 (para 113) (see [10], above), Drozd v France (1992) 14 EHRR 745 at 793 (para 110), Einhorn v France App No 71555/01 (16 October 2001, unreported) (para 32), Razaghi v Sweden App No 64599/01 (11 March 2003, unreported), Tomic v UK App No 17837/03 (14 October 2003, unreported). Successful reliance on art 5 would have to meet no less exacting a test. The lack of success of applicants relying on arts 2, 5 and 6 before the ECtHR highlights the difficulty of meeting the stringent test which that court imposes. This difficulty will not be less where reliance is placed on articles such as arts 8 or 9, which provide for the striking of a balance between the right of the individual and the wider interests of the community even in a case where a serious interference is shown.'

[66] In Government of the United States of America v Montgomery (No 2) [2004] UKHL 37, [2004] 4 All ER 289, [2004] 1 WLR 2241, Lord Carswell said this:

'[24] The Court of Human Rights has affirmed on a number of occasions the existence in principle of the possibility in a suitable case of invoking art 6. The context has generally been that of extradition or expulsion of aliens seeking admission to the country concerned, but in my opinion it is capable of being applied to the enforcement in a convention state of a judgment obtained in another state, whether or not the latter is an adherent to the convention. No decision was cited to your Lordships in which the court went so far as to hold that an act of extradition or expulsion amounted to a breach of art 6, and in all of the reported cases the court has strongly emphasised the exceptional nature of such a jurisdiction and the flagrant nature of the deprivation of an applicant's rights which would be required to trigger it.'

[67] In support of his submissions, the appellant relies on two reports, one by Angel Montoya and the other by Eion McGirr.

[68] Angel Montoya is a Spanish lawyer, practising in Biscay. He has experience of the National Criminal Court of Spain (the Audiencia Nacional) in dealing with persons suspected and charged with terrorist offences. In a long report, he claims that Muslim detainees held in police cells in Spain can be ill-treated and even tortured to obtain confessions; that detainees can be held incommunicado for up to 13 days; that detainees are not permitted access to legal advice, or if they are, that they are denied access to lawyers of their own choice, and that the whole investigative and trial process is loaded against North African Muslims, charged with terrorism offences.

[69] Eion McGirr was called to the Bar in England; he did a pupillage but never practised. He has since worked principally as an interpreter. His report is to the same effect. He focuses particularly on the long period of detention—up to four years—to which he claims terrorism cases in Spain are routinely subject; he also claims that the regime to which they are subject is harsh and oppressive. He also complains about the quality of legal representation.

[70] Of course, appellants may rely on the way in which others in similar circumstances have been treated but the court must focus on the particular circumstance attending the particular individual and assess, as best it can from the information available, whether there is any real substance in the risks of prejudice, abuse and unfairness which he claims to face upon extradition because of his race or religion.

[71] In evaluating these reports, we note that the authors deal only in generalities; neither makes any attempt to deal with the particular circumstances of this case. Neither has commented on the lengthy trial of the appellant's co-appellant Yarkas, still less have they made any criticism of the conduct of the case, or of the quality of the legal representation, or of the procedures or fairness of the trial or of the conditions in which Yarkas was detained or questioned. Neither report has shown any acknowledgment or appreciation of the position, status and protection which the appellant would have if he was to be returned to Spain under the EAW. Nor has any attempt been made to respond to the points made by the Spanish authorities. In our judgment these factors considerably undermine the weight to be given to these reports.

[72] However, they make very grave allegations and if we thought that there was real substance in them, then plainly it would be quite wrong to authorise the appellant's extradition. We must therefore examine these complaints in some detail.

[73] We have read with care, the responses of the Spanish authorities. We refer to the statement made by Judge Fernando Marlaska Gomez on 3 March 2005 under the seal of the Central Court for Committal Proceedings in Madrid (we have already referred to his further statement of 7 April 2006, when reviewing the issue of specialty) and to the depositions of the prosecution counsel Pedro Rubira Nieto made on 7 February, 11 April 2005 and 24 April 2006. It is strongly argued by the Spanish authorities that the laws and procedures in place in Spain would provide effective protection to this appellant.

[74] Of course, the mere fact that Spain has laws and procedures which purport to safeguard the human rights of detainees is not sufficient. The English courts must be vigilant to ensure that those rights provided by the 2003 Act and by [the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) (the European Convention of Human Rights)] are 'interpreted and applied so as to make [their] safeguards practical and effective' (to use the words of the European Court of Human Rights in Soering v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 439 at 467 (para 87)).

GOOD FAITH

[75] We have been alerted by the Human Rights Watch paper entitled 'Empty Promises: diplomatic assurances no safeguard against torture' to the danger that assurances by diplomatic and legal authorities in the requesting state may prove to be illusory and the courts may be impotent to protect persons detained on terrorist offences. However, we have not been given particulars of any person who has claimed to have been unfairly treated in Spain following surrender under an EAW. Furthermore, in the absence of a record of non-compliance in any such case, the best guarantee of compliance with the appellant's human rights is knowledge that, if violated, future co-operation would be imperilled and the presumption of good faith would be displaced.

[76] Moreover, we have been impressed by the paper by the Foreign Office entitled 'Counter Terrorism Legislation and Practice: a Survey of Selected Countries' which suggests that human rights are protected by the Spanish courts in the context of extradition and expulsion cases.

[77] It seems to us that the courts should give great weight to the fact that Spain is a western democracy, subject to the rule of law, a signatory of the European Convention of Human Rights and a party to the Framework Decision; it is a country which has and which applies the same human rights standards and is subject to the same international obligations as the United Kingdom. These surely are highly relevant matters which strongly militate against refusing extradition on the grounds of the risk of violating those standards and obligations.

[78] We think that there must be, as Kennedy LJ put it in Re Serbeh [2002] EWHC 2356 (Admin) at [40], [2002] All ER (D) 468 (Oct) at [40])—

> 'a fundamental assumption that the requesting state is acting in good faith. If there is a reason in the particular case to call that assumption into question, then the reason can be examined, and if appropriate acted upon . . .'

[79] With these principles in mind, we seek to deal with the points raised one by one.

INCOMMUNICADO DETENTION AND TORTURE

[80] It is claimed on behalf of the appellant that if he is returned to Spain accused of terrorist offences, he will be held incommunicado, perhaps for as long as 13 days, without his friends or family being told of his detention or whereabouts, without any access to a lawyer—let alone private and confidential access; without recourse to the courts and that he would be subject to prolonged, oppressive and uncontrolled interrogation by the police. Various other claims are made as to the harsh regime in which the appellant would be held including solitary confinement, in an underground cell, without natural light, without the opportunity to wash and without exercise or recreation. It is further suggested that appellants held in this regime are routinely subjected to torture.

[81] Self-evidently, if an appellant was to be held incommunicado in these circumstances and conditions there would be grave violations of his human rights. It is said that the examining judges are sceptical about such claims and that the judicial system has proved an inadequate safeguard against such abuses in the past.

[82] Some support for these allegations in terrorist cases in the past (but not in respect of those surrendered pursuant to an EAW) is to be found in the reports from Amnesty International, from the United Nations Human Rights Committee Special Rapporteur to which Senor Montayo refers. We have also read with care the Human Rights Watch paper 'Setting an Example? Counter-Terrorism Measures in Spain' (January 2005 Vol 17, No 1(D)).

[83] It is true that in some cases there can be a system in Spain of detention 'incommunicado'. Terrorism in Spain is not a new phenomenon. The Basque separatist movement ETA has over the years committed many outrages in Spain. The government and the Spanish legal system have had to develop systems to deal with the many problems presented. Because of the known risks that some lawyers cannot be trusted not to pass information on to terrorist organisations, some persons detained in Spain for terrorist offences can, in some situations, be held for some days incommunicado and without access to lawyers, or with access only to lawyers authorised by the state. After such detention has ended, then the detainee can retain a lawyer of his choice.

[84] There is power in exceptional cases to hold a person incommunicado for up to 13 days; we were told that there is no recent example of detention in these circumstances for longer than five days. The UN Commission on Human Rights resolved in 2003 that 'prolonged incommunicado detention may facilitate the perpetration of torture and can, in itself, constitute a form of cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or even torture'.

[85] If an appellant faced the possibility of extradition from this country to Spain and if he might be held there incommunicado, then the legality and the propriety of the extradition would need carefully to be examined.

[86] We are, however, quite satisfied from what we have read from the Spanish authorities that the appellant faces no possibility of detention incommunicado. An EAW is a request made by a judicial authority; if the appellant is returned to Spain, pursuant to extradition following the issue of an EAW, then his case, his detention and interviewing will be held subject to immediate, continuing and effective judicial supervision. Indeed upon his arrival in Spain the appellant must be brought immediately before a judge, who must determine whether he is to be kept in custody. He will not be held incommunicado or in solitary confinement. He will have unimpeded access to a lawyer of his choice; the lawyer has a right to be present at all judicial hearings and to challenge any adverse findings, including the decision to hold him in custody at all, by way of appeal, or by way of application for habeas corpus, to higher courts, and if necessary all the way up to the Spanish Constitutional Court. The appellant has the right to medical examination and treatment. He will have all the protection accorded to him by the Spanish constitution, which fully protects all the rights accorded by the European Convention of Human Rights to which Spain is a signatory. There is, in our judgment, no reason at all to think that the Spanish courts will be unable—still less unwilling—to protect the appellant's rights.

[87] We reject therefore the claim that there is a real risk the appellant will be held incommunicado, or that he will be tortured.

LENGTH OF PRE-TRIAL DETENTION

[88] It is claimed that persons are frequently detained in Spain for a long time—even up to four years—before trial. The Human Rights Watch paper provides a number of examples of such delays in terrorism cases. It should however be borne in mind that the Spanish judicial system is inquisitorial in nature. Sometimes the complexity of the crimes alleged does result in the investigation taking a long time; there is always a tension between thoroughness and delay. This was, of course, a highly complex case; the eventual indictment was 692 pages long; there were 41 appellants; there were 133 volumes of evidence. However, here the investigative phase has long finished; there has already been one trial on the same facts.

[89] There is no reason whatsoever to think that there will be any undue delay in the appellant's trial starting. Even if there was to be a delay, then the appellant's lawyers may challenge the need for his continued detention and he must then be released unless the authorities can justify his detention to the court. Accordingly, we reject this part of the appellant's case also.

CONDITIONS OF PRE-TRIAL DETENTION

[90] It is claimed that the appellant may be detained in a 'closed regime'. Every state must make provisions for the safe and secure confinement of those prisoners who are accused of grave terrorist offences, or who are unable or unwilling to comply with the normal prison regime. Furthermore there is an obligation on the prison authorities to keep such prisoners safe from other prisoners; after the terrorist outrages in Madrid, some themselves asked for the protection of the 'closed regime'. There is no reason to think that the appellant himself would be held in such conditions; and even if he was, it would not be on account of his race or religion. Further complaint is made that terrorist suspects are dispersed throughout the Spanish prison system. Again, this may be a prudent way in which to manage and control those who may, if held together, collectively form a serious security threat. We do not think that there is anything in these points.

[91] For the reasons we have already given, we reject the claims that the appellant's detention in Spain will amount to any breach of art 5: his arrest and detention will be lawful, and he will be brought before a competent legal authority, which will exercise a continuing and effective control over such detention as it may authorise.

SECRETIO DE SUMARIO

[92] The appellant complains that he might be further prejudiced by the Spanish procedures known as the 'secretio de sumario', by which, in some terrorist cases, some part of the investigative process is held in secret. It should be remembered that Spain has an inquisitorial system of criminal justice, which covers the process of investigation as well as the process of trial. It is obvious that in the search for those responsible for terrorist offences, much of the investigative process must be and must remain confidential and even secret. But in the present case the investigative phase is already over. There is no risk that this appellant will be subject to the process of 'secretio de sumario'. We need say no more about it.

LEGAL REPRESENTATION

[93] The Spanish legal system grants legal representation to anyone accused of serious crime. Unless subject to the regime of incommunicado (which—as we have already explained—does not apply to this case), appellants in Spain have a right to be represented by a lawyer of their choice. It is, however, claimed that the rates of pay are very poor and that there is little incentive to do the work well. It is claimed that in the result, the lawyers retained are low grade and unable properly to protect the appellant's interests. We consider that these assertions are vague, unspecific and at best anecdotal. Furthermore, a consideration of the papers in the trial of Yarkas and others suggests that the lawyers representing the defendants were of high quality; indeed the reports filed by the appellant do not assert the contrary. We reject this criticism also.

TELEPHONE EVIDENCE

[94] We turn then to another separate complaint. As is clear from what we have already said, part of the case against the appellant consists of what he is alleged to have said over the telephone to Yarkas. It is said that during his trial, neither he nor his co-appellants were allowed to hear the recordings of the calls on which the prosecution relied; it is therefore suggested that the trial of the appellant also would be unfair in that he would not have the opportunity to listen to the recordings.

[95] An examination of the judgment of the court in the case of Yarkas and others shows that this allegation is simply not true. At pp 114–118 (we refer to the internal numbering of the English translation, pp 574–578 of our bundle), the court details the lengths to which they went to ensure fairness. Since there were many hundreds of master tapes, all of conversations in Arabic, it was not sensible—or indeed feasible—for all the tapes to be translated and transcribed. The court invited the prosecution and the defence to identify those passages to which they wished to refer: if these were relevant, then they were indeed translated and transcribed. The defence had access to all the relevant tapes. No doubt the same will apply at the trial of the appellant. This is entirely fair. There is nothing in this point.

EXPULSION OR DEPORTATION TO MOROCCO

[96] We turn to the claim that the real reason behind the request to extradite the appellant to Spain is to deport him on to Morocco.

[97] Following the terrorist explosions in Madrid on 11 March 2004, it is said that the Spanish authorities decided to expel from Spain any foreign national suspected of involvement in terrorism. It is argued on the appellant's behalf that if he is extradited to Spain, he will be deported to Morocco, where—it is claimed—he may be detained, tortured and abused without any recourse to a legal system able—or even willing—to give any effective protection to him. The case is put in alternative ways: first, it is said that the Spanish authorities do not intend to try him at all but intend to deport him straight to Morocco. Alternatively, if he is tried but acquitted, he will be freed from custody only to be deported to Morocco.

[98] These claims advanced on behalf of the appellant must be examined in the light of what the Spanish authorities say on the topic. The Spanish prosecutor Senor Nieto wrote in his statement of 7 February 2005 that 'if extradition to Spain were to be agreed, extradition to another state would never be agreed without the consent of the United Kingdom'.

[99] It is said on behalf of the appellant that this response is limited to the assertion that the appellant would not be extradited from Spain to Morocco; it is asserted that they say nothing about the risk that he might be deported (our emphasis). It was to address this specific concern that Senor Nieto wrote a further statement dated 26 April 2006; in this he writes in terms that 'the only purpose of the extradition request is to secure the surrender of (the appellant) in order that he can be tried for grave offences of terrorism, including conspiracy to murder. There is no other purpose behind the request. In particular I can say that the suggestion that (the appellant's) extradition is sought at the behest of the authorities in the UK so that he can be deported to Morocco is absurd'. This is very clear.

[100] A similar claim was made in the case of Re Faraj [2004] EWHC 2950 (Admin), [2004] All ER (D) 137 (Dec), where it was claimed in this court that the real reason behind a request by Italy to extradite the appellant was an intention to pass him on to Libya. Tuckey LJ observed in that case (at [12]) that—

> 'the Italian government has gone to great lengths, no doubt at great expense also, to get the claimant back to Italy so that he can be tried there. It makes no sense to have gone to those great lengths in order to expel him from Italy before he is tried and overlooks the fact that the claimant is alleged to be one of the principals involved in this conspiracy.'

This seems to us to be an observation of powerful common sense.

[101] In our judgment, there is no reason whatsoever to think that the Spanish authorities have any intention of deporting the appellant to Morocco; indeed, it is quite obvious that their intention is to try him in Spain.

[102] Even if he is acquitted after a trial, then he will be able to claim asylum in Spain.

[103] In the further alternative, if he is tried, convicted and sentenced, it is claimed that he will be deported to Morocco immediately upon his release after his sentence. The position is the same as in Ramda v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2005] EWHC 2526 (Admin), [2005] All ER (D) 223 (Nov) where the appellant claimed that there was a risk that his extradition to France would be followed by expulsion to Algeria. Keene LJ giving the judgment of the lower court dealt with this point (at [60]):

> 'Moreover, if the claimant were convicted of the grave offences for which his extradition to France is sought, it can be anticipated that he would receive a lengthy custodial sentence. We understand from Miss Blunden's witness statement that Bensaid on conviction received sentences of life imprisonment and 30 years' imprisonment. If that is any guide in the claimant's case, and given his alleged role as paymaster it may well be, a conviction would seem likely to mean a considerable time in prison, despite the years he has spent in custody in this country. In those circumstances, any allegation that, on release, he would be deported to Algeria relates to a situation some time in the future. The Secretary of State can scarcely be expected to refuse the claimant's return on the speculative basis that there might be a real risk to his art 3 rights at some unknown date well into the future. Certainly there was no evidence before the Secretary of State to establish any such real risk.'

[104] The position facing the appellant here is the same. Any expulsion after trial, conviction and sentence would be many years ahead; we regard this later possibility as being far too remote to be relevant at this stage.

[105] We should make clear that the appellant, in a lengthy statement, alleges that he has been unlawfully detained and tortured by the police in Dubai and Morocco. He asserts that in both countries, he was interviewed by officers from MI6. For reasons pointed out by the first respondent, there are serious factual problems with the chronology suggested by the appellant but having rejected the appellant's case that he will be returned to Morocco from Spain, it is unnecessary further to examine his own claims.

[106] For all these reasons we are not persuaded that the appellant has shown that the issue of the warrant, or his detention or his prosecution in Spain or that any punishment which might follow conviction are the result of his race or his religion; nor indeed do we think that he will suffer any prejudice at all on account of his race or religion. Furthermore, we are confident that his human rights will be observed by the authorities in Spain and will be properly protected by the Spanish courts. We discount the possibility that this extradition is merely a cloak for his onward deportation to Morocco. Accordingly, neither ss 13 nor 21 provides any bar to his extradition.

ABUSE OF PROCESS

[107] We have left until last the appellant's first ground of appeal that it would be an abuse of the process of the court to allow the extradition to proceed. Although Mr Jones put this in the forefront of his argument it seems to us that this ground has to be considered against the context of all the other grounds. If we are unpersuaded there is substance in any of the other grounds would it nevertheless be an abuse of process to extradite the appellant to Spain?

[108] As will be apparent we are unpersuaded that there is anything in the other grounds of appeal either individually or collectively. We do not doubt that abuse of process could in appropriate circumstances lie notwithstanding there was no other bar to extradition: see eg the observations of Laws LJ in Bermingham's case. But we think such circumstances are likely to be rare and there would have to be bad faith or something of that kind.

[109] Many of Mr Jones's abuse of process arguments are linked to other grounds of appeal. Having dealt with the other grounds of appeal we ask rhetorically what is left?

[110] The remaining argument on abuse of process seems to us to centre around the following contentions. First, the prosecutor in Spain is seeking to impugn Yarkas's conviction on the basis that the evidence is too vague. Take away Yarkas as a conspirator and any case against the appellant falls too. Secondly the Spanish authorities do not know the identity of the appellant. It is at best speculative that he was the person communicating with Yarkas. Third, the Americans have never made any allegation against the appellant of involvement in events of 11 September 2001.

[111] As to the first point, we have to remind ourselves that it is not for us to try the case in Spain. In the event that one conspirator is acquitted the case against others may well depend on different evidence. It certainly does not in our view follow that if Yarkas is acquitted there is necessarily no case against the appellant. It is to be noted that the terms of the EAW are maintained. There has been no change in the first respondent's position. There is nothing to suggest the requesting state is not acting in good faith.

[112] It seems to us that the high water mark of Mr Jones's argument relates to a passage in the translation of the public prosecutor's submission to the Supreme Court. This report is a lengthy document relating to the appeal of Yarkas. It is not all entirely easy to follow. The passage relied upon is at p 1270 of the bundle. It runs as follows:

> 'In relation to the participation of (Yarkas) the Court concludes in reference, days before the attempts of: 25 August 2001, he received the call of an unknown individual, and for identification purposes, named previously, called SHAKUR, where he cryptically told him: that he was involved in an aviation course, that he had "slaughtered the bird" and that he had ended all his old contacts, telling him not to tell anyone the content of the conversation.
>
> The Court concluded with the deduction shown that: "In this way IMAD EDDIN BARAKAT YARKAS, was being informed (told) by 'SHAKUR' about the familiarization and reconnaisance flights regarding the imminent objectives which the suicidal pilots were carrying out."'

Great emphasis is laid on the word 'unknown' and what is said is that this passage illustrates that the Spanish authorities do not know the identity of the man they are seeking and it is therefore an abuse of process to extradite the appellant.

[113] The author of this statement (which is in any event a translation) is not the judicial authority who issued the arrest warrant. Further, the statement was directed to the appeal of Yarkas and not the case against Hilali. Mr Hardy submits that it is important to keep in mind that the critical document is the EAW and the vital question is whether the apparent inconsistency raised by this document at p 1270 undermines what is asserted in the warrant, to the extent that compliance with the request in the warrant would be an abuse of process. a

[114] This court cannot usurp the trial court's function. It is possible that there may be issues of identity at the trial, but this court is nowhere near being in the position to say that Spain is seeking to extradite the appellant despite knowing full well they cannot establish it was he who was making the phone calls is [sic] Yarkas. Mr Hardy also refers to the appellant's own witness statement from which it is plain that he was wanted in Spain because the authorities thought he was the person known or sometimes known as SHAKUR. b

CONCLUSION c

[115] None of the seven grounds advanced for allowing the appeal is made out. None of the reasons put forward by Mr Jones either individually or collectively amounts to a ground reason why the appellant should not be extradited. Accordingly the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Onasanya v Newham London Borough Council Newham London Borough Council v Onasanya

[2006] EWHC 1775 (Admin)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (DIVISIONAL COURT)
MAURICE KAY LJ AND MITTING J
14 JUNE, 14 JULY 2006

Street trading – Offence – Displaying for sale notice in private vehicle – Private vehicle parked in road – Test for determining whether statutory defence satisfied – London Local Authorities Act 1990, s 38(2).

The defendant owner of two vehicles, one a Volvo and the other a Rover, was prosecuted by the local authority for offences of unlawful street trading contrary to s 38(1)(a)[a] of the London Local Authority Act 1990. On each occasion one of the vehicles had been parked on public highways within the area of the local authority displaying a notice advertising the car for sale. The cases in respect of each car were heard separately by different district judges. The district judge found that the defendant used the Volvo as his own private motor vehicle and that the car was parked on the street outside the surgery of his doctor with whom he had an appointment. The district judge concluded that as one of the purposes for which the defendant had brought the vehicle into the street remained the offer for sale of the vehicle, the statutory defence in s 38(2)[b] of the 1990 Act was not established. That subsection provided that where it was shown that any article was displayed in any street the article was to be presumed to have been offered for sale unless it could be proved that the article was brought into that street for some purpose other than street trading. The defendant appealed by way of case stated. The district judge trying the three informations in respect of the Rover found that that vehicle had been loaned by the defendant to a friend on the expectation that it would be garaged and that the defendant had been out of the country when two of the offences were alleged to have been committed. She also found that the defendant had been unaware of the warning notices which had been affixed to the vehicle, which had been parked near the friend's house, and which informed the keeper of the vehicle that 'for sale' notices constituted trading or exposing the vehicle for sale without a street trading licence. She concluded that the defendant had adequately addressed the evidential burden to satisfy the provisions of s 38(2) in that the vehicle had been in the vicinity of the friend's address for some purpose other than for sale. She therefore dismissed all three informations. The authority appealed by way of case stated. The authority submitted that the defendant could only avail himself of s 38(2) if the vehicle was in the street entirely for a purpose unrelated to street trading.

Held – For the purposes of s 38(2), the question that had to be asked when deciding whether an article 'was brought into that street for some purpose other than street trading' was why was it in 'that street' and nowhere else at the material time. Whilst there might be a duality of purpose, that did not mean that

a Section 38(1), so far as material, is set out at [5], below
b Section 38(2), so far as material, is set out at [7], below

wherever there was so s 38(2) of the 1990 Act would not avail a defendant. The fundamental question was as to why the article or thing was brought into that street. In the instant cases, having regard to the findings of fact, the defendant had been wrongly convicted in respect of the Volvo, and rightly acquitted in respect of the Rover. Furthermore, it was not possible to establish that the defendant had engaged in street trading on the days when the Rover had been in the possession and control of his friend; there was nothing in the 1990 Act which deemed the registered keeper to be responsible for his car when it was in the possession and control of someone else. Accordingly, the defendant's appeal would be allowed and the authority's appeal would be dismissed (see [12], [13], [15]–[18], below).

Notes

For unlicensed street trading, see 29(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1159.

For the London Local Authorities Act 1990, s 38, see 26 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 976.

Cases referred to in judgments

Haringey London BC v Michniewicz [2004] EWHC 1728 (Admin), DC.

R v Aziz [1995] 3 All ER 149, [1996] AC 41, [1995] 3 WLR 53, HL.

R v Duncan (1981) 73 Cr App R 359, CA.

Appeals by way of case stated

Onasanya v Newham London Borough Council

The defendant, Johnson Onasanya, appealed by way of case stated against the decision of District Judge Gott, made on 27 September 2005 in the Stratford Magistrates' Court, whereby he was convicted on an information laid by the respondent authority, Newham London Borough Council, alleging that on or about 2 February 2005, the defendant, being a person not the holder of a street trading licence, engaged in street trading, namely exposing or offering for sale a Volvo motor vehicle registration mark Y453HCP from the public highway, contrary to s 38(1)(a) of the London Local Authorities Act 1990. The question for the opinion of the court is set out at [9], below. The facts are set out in the judgment of Maurice Kay LJ.

Newham London Borough Council v Onasanya

Newham London Borough Council appealed by way of case stated against the decision of District Judge Sims, made on 28 September 2005 in the Stratford Magistrates' Court, whereby she dismissed three informations laid by the authority against the defendant, Johnson Onasanya, alleging that on 27 November 2004, 19 December 2004 and 7 January 2005, the defendant, being a person not the holder of a street trading licence, engaged in street trading, namely exposing or offering for sale a Rover motor vehicle registration mark LD510LT from the public highway contrary to s 38(1)(a) of the London Local Authorities Act 1990. The question for the opinion of the court is set out at [10], below. The facts are set out in the judgment of Maurice Kay LJ.

Philip Rule (instructed by Fairweather Whillis & Toghill, High Wycombe) for the defendant.

Suzanne Palmer (instructed by Helen Sidwell) for the authority.

Cur adv vult

14 July 2006. The following judgments were delivered.

MAURICE KAY LJ.

[1] These two appeals by way of case stated are a graphic illustration of what can happen when a prosecutor, in this case the London Borough of Newham, becomes overzealous. In each case Newham prosecuted Mr Onasanya in Stratford Magistrates' Court for an offence or offences of unlawful street trading. It is not and never has been suggested that Mr Onasanya is in any sense a professional street trader. Indeed, he is a local government officer employed by a neighbouring London borough.

[2] The first of the two cases to be heard concerned a Volvo motor car. The information laid by Newham alleged that on or about 2 February 2005, Mr Onasanya, 'being a person who was not the holder of a street trading licence did engage in street trading, namely exposing or offering for sale a Volvo motor vehicle registration mark Y453 HCP from the public highway known as Greengate Street, London E13'. The allegation was of an offence contrary to s 38(1)(a) of the London Local Authorities Act 1990 (as amended). The facts found by the district judge were as follows:

> 'Johnson Onasanya was the owner and registered keeper of the Volvo purchased in about July or August of 2004. It was used by him as his own private motor vehicle. On a date prior to 2 February 2005 Mr Onasanya fixed a notice in the rear window of the car advertising the car for sale. This notice contained Mr Onasanya's mobile telephone number. The purpose of so doing was to attract potential purchasers of the vehicle who would then be able to contact Mr Onasanya. On 2 February 2005 Mr Onasanya was driven in the said motor car by his wife and parked the vehicle in Greengate Street, E13. The reason for that particular journey was that Mr Onasanya had an appointment to see his general practitioner at his surgery at 94 Greengate Street. The notice advertising the car for sale remained fixed in the rear window and visible to passers-by.'

[3] The district judge concluded that, despite Mr Onasanya's attendance at his doctor's surgery, one of the purposes for which he brought the vehicle into Greengate Street remained the offer for sale of the vehicle. Mr Onasanya was convicted.

[4] The facts of the second case had occurred earlier but came for trial a day later than the Volvo case. The second case concerned a Rover motor vehicle. Three informations alleged that Mr Onasanya had engaged in unlawful street trading, 'namely exposing or offering for sale a blue Rover motor vehicle registration mark LD51 0LT from the public highway known as High Street, London E13'. The three informations related to the dates of 27 November 2004, 19 December 2004 and 7 January 2005. The district judge (not the same district judge as on the previous day) found the following facts:

> '(a) The vehicle was parked in High Street E13 on each of the three occasions stated. (b) There were "For Sale" notices displayed in the vehicle on each of the three occasions. (c) The warning notices affixed to the vehicle [by council officials] informed the keeper of the vehicle that the "For Sale" notices constituted trading or exposing the vehicle for sale without a street trading licence. (d) Mr Onasanya was out of the United Kingdom for a period of three weeks from 19 December 2004 to 7 January 2005. (e) The vehicle had been loaned by Mr Onasanya to Mr Ahyde. (f) It was Mr Onasanya's expectation that the vehicle would be garaged by Mr Ahyde. (g) On each of the three occasions the vehicle was situated in the vicinity of Mr Ahyde's address and the purpose for which it was so situated was as a result of Mr Onasanya lending the vehicle to Mr Ahyde. (h) Although Mr Onasanya had driven past the parked vehicle on a number of occasions and had seen the "For Sale" notices displayed, he believed that the vehicle must have been parked there for an innocent purpose other than for sale as his expectation had been that the vehicle would be garaged by Mr Ahyde. (i) Mr Onasanya had not been aware of the fact that the warning notices had been affixed to the motor vehicle on the relevant dates. (j) There was no evidence to contradict the account given by Mr Onasanya in interview with the council officials.'

[5] The relevant offence is defined in s 38(1) of the London Local Authorities Act 1990 (as amended) in the following terms:

'A person who—(a) is not the holder of a street trading licence or a temporary licence and who engages in street trading in a borough [whether or not from a stationary position] . . . shall be guilty of an offence . . .'

[6] 'Street trading' means '(a) the selling or the exposure or offer for sale of any article . . . in a street for gain or reward' (s 21).

[7] Section 38(2) then provides:

'In any proceedings for an offence under this section . . . where it is shown that—(a) any article or thing was displayed (whether or not in or on any receptacle) in any street . . . the article [or] thing . . . concerned shall be presumed to have been exposed or offered for sale . . . unless it can be proved to the satisfaction of the court that the article or thing . . . was brought into that street for some purpose other than street trading.'

[8] In the Volvo case the district judge concluded that:

'The statutory defence provided by s 38(2) . . . was not established as it was not proved to the satisfaction of the court that the vehicle was brought into that street for some purpose other than street trading.'

[9] The question posed for the opinion of this court in the Volvo case is in the following terms:

'Was I right to conclude that in the circumstances a purpose for which the vehicle was brought into Greengate Street remained the offer for sale of the vehicle and accordingly the statutory defence provided by s 38(2) . . . was not established as it was not proved to the satisfaction of the court that the vehicle was brought into that street for some purpose other than street trading?'

[10] In the Rover case, the findings to which I have referred were based to a significant extent upon what Mr Onasanya had said to the council officials in interview. Although he did not give evidence at trial the district judge concluded that there was no evidence to contradict the account given in interview. In these circumstances the district judge concluded that Mr Onasanya had 'adequately addressed the evidential burden to satisfy the provisions of s 38(2) in that the vehicle had been in the vicinity of Mr Ahyde's address for some purpose other than for sale' and, on that basis, she dismissed the three informations. The question posed for this court in the Rover case is in these terms:

> 'On the facts as found by me, was I entitled to hold the view that [Mr Onasanya] had discharged his evidential burden of establishing that the vehicle had been in the vicinity for some purpose other than for sale?'

[11] It is perhaps worth adding that the positions in High Street where the Rover was seen were very close indeed to Mr Ahyde's address but a mile or so away from the address of Mr Onasanya.

[12] The approach of Newham to these cases and the central submission of Miss Palmer is that, at all material times, there was more than one 'purpose' relating to the presence of the cars in the streets in question. On the one hand, the car was being driven or used for a journey or was parked for convenience. On the other hand, because the 'for sale' sign was still in the window, there was the additional purpose of street trading. The suggestion is that a defendant can only avail himself of s 38(2) if the vehicle is in the street entirely for a purpose unrelated to street trading. I have no hesitation in saying that, in my judgment, this approach is simply wrong. What the court has to be satisfied about in s 38(2) is that the article 'was brought into that street for some purpose other than street trading'. The question that must be asked, therefore, is: why was it in 'that street' and nowhere else at the material time? It is abundantly clear on the findings of fact that the Volvo was in Greengate Street because Mr Onasanya was attending an appointment with his general practitioner in 'that street'. It is equally clear, on the findings of fact, that the Rover was in High Street because Mr Onasanya had lent it to Mr Ahyde who had parked it for convenience virtually outside his house. Of course, there may be a duality of purpose but I do not accept that, wherever there is so, s 38(2) will not avail a defendant. The fundamental question, I repeat, is as to why the article or thing was brought into that street.

[13] In my judgment it follows that, having regard to the findings of fact, Mr Onasanya was wrongly convicted in respect of the Volvo but rightly acquitted in respect of the Rover.

[14] So far as the Rover is concerned, the question posed by the case stated relates to the discharge of an evidential burden. It seems that there was an issue as to whether the findings of fact were open to the district judge in circumstances where Mr Onasanya had not given evidence. I have no doubt that the findings of fact were open to the district judge. Mr Onasanya had given a full account in interview. The evidence of the interview was adduced, not least because the prosecution relied upon it to prove that Mr Onasanya was the owner of the car, that he had displayed the 'For Sale' notices in it, that the telephone number on the notices was his, and that he had seen the car on a number of occasions parked in High Street after he had lent it to Mr Ahyde. On the other hand, the parts of the interview concerning the loan to Mr Ahyde, the expected garaging and the absence of Mr Onasanya from the country from 19 December 2004 were matters relied upon by the defence. In other words, the interview was both inculpatory and exculpatory. It is well established that, in such circumstances, it is all of evidential value, the respective weight to be attached to each part being a matter for the tribunal of fact, which will no doubt bear in mind the inherent likelihood of inculpatory statements starting from a higher level of credibility than exculpatory statements. However, it was clearly open to the district judge to conclude that, as there was no evidence to contradict the exculpatory parts, he could place reliance upon them. In my judgment, this approach was entirely consistent with authorities such as R v Duncan (1981) 73 Cr App R 359 and R v Aziz [1995] 3 All ER 149, [1996] AC 41.

[15] What I have said so far deals with the questions posed by the cases stated and the central submissions made on behalf of the parties. I am bound to say that, in relation to the Rover case, there is in my view another issue which received little or no attention in the magistrates' court or in counsels' submissions in this court. In the light of the findings of fact that it was Mr Ahyde who was in possession and control of the car in the days in question and who had parked it in High Street, it seems to me that it was not possible to establish that Mr Onasanya had 'engaged in street trading' on those days in any event. When challenged on this point, Miss Palmer sought to counter it by arguing that the finding of fact that Mr Onasanya had seen the car parked in High Street with the 'For Sale' notices displayed was sufficient to fix him with liability because it was his car that contained his notices. For my part I do not think that this submission is correct. There is nothing in the 1990 Act which deems the registered keeper to be responsible for his car when it is in the possession and control of someone else. It seems to me that this is another example of just how overzealously Newham seek to approach this particular legislation.

[16] I do not lose sight of the fact that this is important legislation administered by local authorities for the public good nor that it must be difficult for a local authority to deal with some of the manoeuvrings of the more unscrupulous street traders. In some ways, their difficulties are alleviated by the fact that the offence is not limited to professional street traders and can be committed by a private individual selling a single item: see Haringey London BC v Michniewicz [2004] EWHC 1728 (Admin). However, the control mechanism is limited by the terms of the statute and where, as here, a person puts forward a credible explanation against which there is no contradictory evidence it seems to me that prosecution is an excessive response.

[17] It follows from what I have said that Mr Onasanya's appeal must be allowed and that of Newham dismissed. I have indicated the answers to the questions posed by the cases stated, namely 'No' in the Volvo case and 'Yes' in the Rover case. The quashing of Mr Onasanya's conviction carries with it the quashing of the order for costs that was made against him. I am unsure as to whether he incurred personal costs in his unsuccessful defence in the Volvo case in the magistrates' court. If he did it seems to me that he should now be relieved of that burden and we shall consider an appropriate application. As to the costs of these appeals, we raised this issue at the end of the hearing and the matter stands resolved subject to some fine tuning as to quantum, failing agreement as to which there will have to be an assessment.

MITTING J.

[18] I agree for the reasons given.

Order accordingly.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Crehan v Inntrepreneur Pub Co (CPC) and another (Office of Fair Trading and another intervening)

[2006] UKHL 38

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY AND LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE

6–8, 12 JUNE, 19 JULY 2006

European Community – Rules on competition – Agreements preventing, restricting or distorting competition – Claimant bringing proceedings in England for breach of European Community law prohibition on such agreements – Claimant contending that judge should treat as binding factual assessment made by European Commission in deciding proceedings between different parties in same market – Whether judge required to do so – Article 81 EC.

The claimant entered into agreements to take leases of two public houses from the defendant. They were in standard form, containing ties which obliged him to buy his beer from a specified company at its list prices. Both businesses failed because the claimant could not compete with other public houses which were able to buy their beer at lower prices and accordingly he did not have enough trade to cover the rent he had agreed to pay. He surrendered his two leases, having lost a substantial sum of money. Subsequently, he brought proceedings for damages against the defendant, alleging that his losses had been caused by a tie agreement which was unlawful under art 81[a] EC—the provision of the EC Treaty which prohibited agreements preventing, restricting or distorting competition between member states. The European Commission, which was the central institution responsible for the administration of European competition policy, had power to decide whether an agreement was in breach of art 81, but national courts had concurrent jurisdiction to decide the same question because art 81 was directly applicable in all member states. Under European Community law, a beer supply agreement was prohibited by art 81 if two cumulative conditions were met. Although the Commission never decided whether the agreement between the claimant and the defendant infringed art 81, it had concluded in a previous case involving other parties that the United Kingdom beer market satisfied the first of the two conditions. At trial, the claimant contended that the judge should adopt that finding and proceed with the rest of the case on the footing that the first condition was satisfied. The judge rejected that contention, concluded that the first condition was not satisfied on the evidence before him and accordingly dismissed the claim. His decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal which held that the judge should have followed the Commission's decision in the previous case on the applicability of the first condition because the duty of sincere co-operation, imposed upon the institutions of member states by the EC Treaty, required him not to entertain a submission that the view of the Commission in that case had been wrong. The defendant appealed to the House of Lords.

a Article 81 is set out at [16], below

Held – Where an action before the English court for breach of art 81 of the EC Treaty raised a question of fact which had already been decided by the Commission in proceedings relating to other participants in the same market, the English court was free to reach a different conclusion. The correct position was that, when there was no question of a conflict of decisions (in the sense of an inconsistency between the legal effects of a decision of the Commission and that of the English court concerning the same agreement between the same parties), the decision of the Commission was simply evidence properly admissible before the English court which, given the expertise of the Commission, might well be regarded by that court as highly persuasive. As a matter of law, however, it was only part of the evidence which the court would take into account. If, upon assessment of all the evidence, the judge came to the conclusion that the view of the Commission was wrong, he could not, consistently with his judicial oath, say that, as a matter of deference, he proposed nevertheless to follow the Commission. Thus in the instant case the judge had been right to conclude that he could decide for himself whether the first condition was satisfied. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [1], [11]–[14], [44], [45], [49]–[56], [69], [71], [72], [75], [76], below).

Delimitis v Henninger Bräu AG Case C-234/89 [1991] ECR I-935 and Masterfoods Ltd v HB Ice Cream Ltd, HB Ice Cream Ltd v Masterfoods Ltd (t/a Mars Ireland) Case C-344/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 130 considered.

Notes

For agreements preventing, restricting or distorting competition between member states, see 47 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2001 reissue) paras 341–345.

Cases referred to in opinions

Banks (HJ) & Co Ltd v British Coal Corp Case C-128/92 [1994] ECR I-1209, ECJ.

Coal Authority v HJ Banks Co Ltd, HJ Banks and Co Ltd v Coal Authority [1997] EuLR 610.

Courage Ltd v Crehan Case C-453/99 [2001] All ER (EC) 886, [2002] QB 507, [2001] 3 WLR 1646, [2001] ECR I-6297, ECJ.

Delimitis v Henninger Bräu AG Case C-234/89 [1991] ECR I-935, ECJ.

Deutsche Grammophon GmbH v Metro-SB-Grossmärkte GmbH & Co KG Case 78/70 [1971] ECR 487, ECJ.

Eco Swiss China Time Ltd v Benetton International NV Case C-126/97 [1999] 2 All ER (Comm) 44, [1999] ECR I-3055, ECJ.

Iberian UK Ltd v BPB Industries plc [1997] ICR 164.

L'Oréal (NV) and SA L'Oréal v PVBA De Nieuwe AMCK Case 31/80 [1980] ECR 3775, ECJ.

Mackay v Dick (1881) 6 App Cas 251, HL.

Masterfoods Ltd v HB Ice Cream Ltd, HB Ice Cream Ltd v Masterfoods Ltd (t/a Mars Ireland) Case C-344/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 130, [2000] ECR I-11369, ECJ.

Morgan Stanley Dean Witter Bank Ltd v Visa International Service Association [2001] All ER (D) 18 (May).

Stirling v Maitland (1864) 5 B & S 840, [1861–73] All ER Rep 358.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Allied Maples Group Ltd v Simmons & Simmons (a firm) [1995] 4 All ER 907, [1995] 1 WLR 1602, CA.

Atkinson v Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Co (1877) 2 Ex D 441, [1874–80] All ER Rep 757.

Automec Srl v EC Commission Case T-24/90 [1992] ECR II-2223, ECJ.

Barrett v Inntrepreneur Pub Co (GL) Ltd [1999] All ER (D) 657.

Belgische Radio en Televisie and Societe Belge des auteurs compositeurs et editeurs v SV SABAM and NV Fonior Case 127/73 [1974] ECR 51, ECJ.

Blue Shield of Virginia v McCready (1982) 457 US 465, US SC.

Brasserie de Haecht SA v Wilkin Case 23/67 [1967] ECR 127, ECJ.

Brasserie du Pêcheur SA v Germany, R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd Joined cases C-46/93 and C-48/93 [1996] All ER (EC) 301, [1996] QB 404, [1996] 2 WLR 506, [1996] ECR I-1029, ECJ.

Bronner (Oscar) GmbH & Co KG v Mediaprint Zeitungs- und Zeitschriftenverlag GmbH & Co KG Case C-7/97 [1998] ECR I-7791, ECJ.

Brunswick Corp v Pueblo Bowl-o-Mat Inc (1977) 97 S Ct 690, US SC.

Bundeskartellamt v Volkswagen AG and VAG Leasing GmbH Case C-266/93 [1995] ECR I-3477, ECJ.

Bwllfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries (1891) Ltd v Pontypridd Waterworks Co [1903] AC 426, [1900–3] All ER Rep 600, HL.

Crehan v Courage Ltd, Byrne v Inntrepreneur Beer Supply Co Ltd, Langton v Inntrepreneur Beer Supply Co Ltd, Smith v Greenalls Management Ltd, McCaughey v Walker Cain [1999] EuLR 834, CA.

Cabour SA and Nord Distribution Automobile SA v Arnor Soco SARL Case C-230/96 [1998] ECR I-2055, ECJ.

Chemidus Wavin Ltd v Société pour la Transformation et l'Exploitation des Résines Industrielles SA [1978] 3 CMLR 514, CA.

Cie Maritime Belge Transport NV v EC Commission Joined cases T-24/93, T-25/93, T-26/93 and T-28/93 [1996] ECR II-1201, ECJ.

CILFIT Srl and Lanificio di Gavardo SpA v Ministry of Health Case 283/81 [1982] ECR 3415, ECJ.

Days Medical Aids Ltd v Pihsiang Machinery Manufacturing Co Ltd [2004] EWHC 44 (Comm), [2004] 1 All ER (Comm) 991.

Dodd Properties (Kent) Ltd v Canterbury City Council [1980] 1 All ER 928, [1980] 1 WLR 433, CA.

European Commission v Tetra Laval BV Case C-12/03 P [2005] All ER (EC) 1059, [2005] ECR I-987, ECJ.

European Night Services Ltd (ENS) v European Commission Joined cases T-374/94, T-375/94, T-384/94 and T-388/94 [1998] ECR II-3141, CFI.

Factortame Ltd v Secretary of State for Transport (No 2) [1991] 1 All ER 70, [1991] 1 AC 603, [1990] 3 WLR 818, HL.

Firma Molkerei-Zentrale Westfalen/Lippe GmbH v Hauptzollamt Paderborn Case 28/67 [1968] ECR 143, ECJ.

Fortunity, The, Owners of The Motor Cruiser Four of Hearts v Owners of The Motor Vessel Or Motor Ship Fortunity [1960] 2 All ER 64, [1961] 1 WLR 351.

Frankovich v Italy, Bonifaci v Italy Cases C-6/90 and C-9/90 [1992] IRLR 84, [1995] ICR 722, [1991] ECR I-5357, ECJ.

Garden Cottage Foods Ltd v Milk Marketing Board [1983] 2 All ER 770, [1984] AC 130, [1983] 3 WLR 143, HL.

General Electric Co v European Commission (supported by Rolls-Royce plc) Case T-210/01 (2005) Transcript (judgment), 14 December, CFI.

Gibbs Mew plc v Gemmell [1999] 1 EGLR 43, CA.

Golden Strait Corp v Nippon Yusen Kubishika Kaisha [2005] EWCA Civ 1190, [2006] 1 All ER (Comm) 235, [2006] 1 WLR 533.

Golder v UK (1975) 1 EHRR 524, [1975] ECHR 4451/70, ECt HR.

Gorris v Scott (1874) LR 9 Exch 125.

Greenalls Management Ltd v Canavan [1998] EuLR 507, CA.

Harrison v Bloom Camillin (a firm) [2001] PNLR 195.

Hasselblad (GB) Ltd v Orbinson [1985] 1 All ER 173, [1985] QB 475, CA.

Illinois Brick Co v Illinois (1977) 431 US 720, US SC.

Jobling v Associated Dairies Ltd [1981] 2 All ER 752, [1982] AC 794, [1981] 3 WLR 155, HL.

Johnston v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary Case 222/84 [1986] 3 All ER 135, [1987] QB 129, [1986] 3 WLR 1038, [1986] ECR 1651, ECJ.

Joynson v European Commission Case T-231/99 [2002] ECR II-2085, CFI; affd Case C-204/02 P [2003] ECR I-14763, ECJ.

Kuwait Airways Corp v Iraqi Airways Co (No 3) [2002] UKHL 19, [2002] 3 All ER 209, sub nom Kuwait Airways Corp v Iraqi Airways Co (Nos 4 and 5) [2002] 2 AC 883, [2002] 2 WLR 1353.

Langnese-Iglo GmbH v European Commission (Mars GmbH intervening) Case T-7/93 [1995] All ER (EC) 908, [1995] ECR II-1533, ECJ.

Liesbosch, Dredger (Owners) v SS Edison (Owners) [1933] AC 449, [1933] All ER Rep 144, HL.

Livingstone v Rawyards Coal Co (1880) 5 App Cas 25, HL.

Mallick v Liverpool City Council [1999] 2 EGLR 7.

Miliangos v George Frank (Textiles) Ltd [1975] 3 All ER 801, [1976] AC 443, [1975] 3 WLR 758, HL.

Molecular Diagnostics Laboratories v Hoffmann-La Roche Inc (2005) 402 F Supp 2d 276, US DC (District of Columbia).

MTV Europe v BMG Records (UK) Ltd [1997] EuLR 100, CA.

Napp Pharmaceutical Holdings Ltd v Director General of Fair Trading [2002] EWCA Civ 796, [2002] 4 All ER 376.

National Power plc, Re, British Coal Corp v European Commission Joined cases C-151/97 P (1) and C-157/97 P (1) [1997] ECR I-3491, ECJ.

Palmisani v Istituto Nazionale della Previdenza Sociale (INPS) Case C-261/95 [1997] ECR I-4025, ECJ.

R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, ex p Agegate Ltd Case C-3/87 [1991] 1 All ER 6, [1990] 2 QB 151, [1990] 3 WLR 226, [1989] ECR 4459, ECJ.

Racine, The [1906] P 273, CA.

Ratcliffe v Evans [1892] 2 QB 524, [1891–4] All ER Rep 699, CA.

Remia BV v EC Commission Case 42/84 [1985] ECR 2545, ECJ.

Stewart v Scottish Widows and Life Assurance Society plc [2005] EWHC 1831 (QB), [2005] All ER (D) 247 (Jun).

Roberts v European Commission Case T-25/99 [2001] ECR II-1881, ECJ.

Salford City Council v Torkington [2004] EWCA Civ 1636, [2004] All ER (D) 125 (Dec), (2004) 149 Sol Jo LB 28.

Shaw v European Commission Case T-131/99 [2002] All ER (EC) 501, [2002] ECR II-2023, ECJ.

Smith New Court Securities Ltd v Scrimgeour Vickers (Asset Management) Ltd [1996] 4 All ER 769, [1997] AC 254, [1996] 3 WLR 1051, HL.

South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd, United Bank of Kuwait plc v Prudential Property Services Ltd, Nykredit Mortgage Bank plc v Edward Erdman Group plc [1996] 3 All ER 365, [1997] AC 191, [1996] 3 WLR 87, HL.

Swynfleet, The (1947) 81 Ll L Rep 116.
Tinnelly and Sons Ltd v UK (1998) 4 BHRC 393, ECt HR.
Trent Taverns Ltd v Sykes [1999] EuLR 492, CA.
Unión de Pequeños Agricultores v EU Council (supported by the European Commission, intervening) Case C-50/00 P [2002] All ER (EC) 893, [2003] QB 893, [2003] 2 WLR 795, [2002] ECR I-6677, ECJ.
UYB Ltd v British Railways Board (unreported, 16 April 1999); affd [2000] All ER (D) 1477, CA.
VAG France SA v Établissments Magne SA Case 10/86 [1986] ECR 4071, ECJ.
Van den Bergh Foods Ltd v European Commission Case T-65/98 [2005] All ER (EC) 418 [2003] ECR II-4653, ECJ.
Wandsworth London BC v Winder [1984] 3 All ER 976, [1985] AC 461, [1984] 3 WLR 1254, HL.
Wilhelm v Bundeskartellamt Case 14/68 [1969] ECR 1, ECJ.

Appeal and cross-appeal

The defendants, Inntrepreneur Pub Company (CPC) and Brewman Group Ltd, appealed with permission of the Court of Appeal (Peter Gibson, Tuckey LJJ and Sir Martin Nourse) from its decision on 21 May 2004 ([2004] EWCA Civ 637, [2004] EuLR 693) allowing an appeal by the claimant, Bernard Crehan, from the decision of Park J on 26 June 2003 ([2003] EWHC 1510 (Ch), [2003] EuLR 663) dismissing his claim against the defendants for damages for breach of art 81 EC. The claimant cross-appealed with permission on the measure of damages awarded by the Court of Appeal. The Office of Fair Trading (OFT) and Visa Europe Ltd and Visa UK Ltd (Visa) intervened on the appeal. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hoffmann.

Iain Milligan QC, Nicholas Green QC, James Flynn QC, Martin Rodger and Dinah Rose (instructed by Sprecher Grier Halberstam) for the defendants.
David Vaughan CBE QC, Mark Brealy QC, Marie-Eleni Demetriou and Michael Bools (instructed by Maitland Walker) for Mr Crehan.
Sir Jeremy Lever QC, Jon Turner and Ronit Kreisberger (instructed by the Office of Fair Trading) for OFT.
Stephen Morris QC, Helen Davies and Colleen Hanley (instructed by Freshfields Bruckhaus Deringer) for Visa.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

19 July 2006. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, I have had the great advantage of reading in draft the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. I agree with his analysis and conclusions and would make the orders which he proposes. His summary of the facts (already the subject of detailed recitation by Park J and the Court of Appeal: [2003] EWHC 1510 (Ch), [2003] EuLR 663; [2004] EWCA Civ 637, [2004] EuLR 693) and of the relevant materials enables me to express my reasons for concurring without repetition. Like my noble and learned friend I shall for convenience refer to the current numbering of the Treaty articles.

[2] The sharpness of the issue between the parties to this appeal tends to conceal the bedrock of common ground which underlies the case. I think it is worth drawing attention to a number of important matters which are not contentious.

[3] There is, first of all, no question about the importance of art 81 EC prohibiting, as incompatible with the Treaty, agreements and practices which prevent, restrict or distort competition between member states. As the Court of Justice of the European Communities observed in Eco Swiss China Time Ltd v Benetton International NV Case C-126/97 [1999] 2 All ER (Comm) 44, [1999] ECR I-3055 (para 36) and repeated in Courage Ltd v Crehan Case C-453/99 [2001] All ER (EC) 886, [2001] ECR I-6297 (para 20):

> 'Article 81 EC constitutes a fundamental provision which is essential for the accomplishment of the tasks entrusted to the Community and, in particular, for the functioning of the internal market.'

It is indeed clear that without effective competition transcending national boundaries there can be no effective common market.

[4] It is also clear, secondly, that art 211 EC imposes a duty on the Commission of the European Communities to ensure the proper functioning and development of the common market. That duty applies in the field of competition as in other fields, as is made clear by art 85 EC. In Delimitis v Henninger Bräu AG Case C-234/89 [1991] ECR I-935 (para 44), the court stressed the responsibility of the Commission for the implementation and orientation of Community competition policy, a point reiterated in Masterfoods Ltd v HB Ice Cream Ltd, HB Ice Cream Ltd v Masterfoods Ltd (t/a Mars Ireland) Case C-344/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 130, [2000] ECR I-11369 (para 46). English decisions have recognised the primary responsibility of the Commission and its specialist expertise in determining competition questions: see Iberian UK Ltd v BPB Industries plc [1997] ICR 164 at 181, [1997] EuLR 1 at 16; Coal Authority v HJ Banks Co Ltd, HJ Banks and Co Ltd v Coal Authority [1997] EuLR 610 at 620; Morgan Stanley Dean Witter Bank Ltd v Visa International Service Association [2001] All ER (D) 18 (May) per Toulson J.

[5] But, thirdly, it is well established that art 81 is directly enforceable. This means that national competition authorities and courts share, and have always shared, with the Commission the duty to give effect to the prohibition in art 81(1), and the legal consequences of automatic avoidance under art 81(2) have always been a matter for determination by national courts alone. Article 9(1) of Council Regulation (EEC) 17/62 (first regulation implementing [arts 81 and 82 EC]) (OJ 1962 L13 p 204 (S Edn 1959–62 p 87)) conferred sole power on the Commission to make declarations of inapplicability under art 81(3) of the Treaty, and it was for the Commission to grant negative clearance under art 2. But in general the Community competition regime has rested on a duty of wholehearted (or sincere) co-operation owed by member states to the Community (and, presumably, each other). The source of this duty is found in art 10 of the Treaty, imposing as it does both positive and negative duties on member states. They are duties comparable with those which English law readily implies into contracts: see Mackay v Dick (1881) 6 App Cas 251 at 263; Stirling v Maitland (1864) 5 B & S 840 at 852, [1861–73] All ER Rep 358 at 360–361. The Court of Justice has invoked these duties on many occasions: in Deutsche Grammophon GmbH v Metro-SB-Grossmärkte GmbH & Co KG Case 78/70 [1971] ECR 487 (para 5), it recognised the provision as laying down 'a general duty for the Member States, the actual tenor of which depends in each individual case on the provisions of the Treaty or on the rules derived from its general scheme'.

The particular importance of wholehearted co-operation between national courts and the Commission in the field of competition is reflected in the Commission's 1993 'Notice on Co-operation between National Courts and the Commission in applying arts 81 and 82 of the EC Treaty' (OJ 1993 C39 p 6), in Council Regulation (EC) 1/2003 (on the implementation of the rules on competition laid down in arts 81 and 82 of the Treaty) (OJ 2003 L1 p 1) (the modernisation regulation) and in the Commission's 'Notice on co-operation within the Network of Competition Authorities' (2004/C 101/03).

[6] It is common ground, fourthly, that under art 249 of the Treaty a Commission decision is legally binding in its entirety upon those to whom it is addressed. The converse is also true: such a decision is not legally binding on those to whom it is not addressed. That is important, since it is not suggested that any relevant decision of the Commission was addressed to Inntrepreneur, the effective appellant before this House.

[7] Thus the divisive question arises: should the trial judge in this case have treated the Commission's factual assessment of the United Kingdom beer market in its Whitbread, Bass and Scottish and Newcastle decisions (see Commission Decision (EC) 1999/230 (relating to a proceeding pursuant to art [81] of the EC Treaty (Case No IV/35.079/F3—Whitbread)) (OJ 1999 L88 p 26), Commission Decision (EC) 1999/473 (relating to a proceeding pursuant to art 81 of the EC Treaty (Case IV/36.081/F3—Bass)) (OJ 1999 L186 p 1) and Commission Decision (EC) 1999/474 (relating to a proceeding pursuant to art 81 of the EC Treaty (Case IV/35.992/F3—Scottish and Newcastle)) (OJ 1999 L186 p 28)) as effectively binding upon him although not formally so? This was the burden of the closing submission made by Mr Crehan's counsel, as recorded by the judge ([2003] EuLR 663 at [156]):

> 'So in this case was it difficult, because of beer ties and similar agreements, for aspiring entrants to gain access to the relevant UK market? Mr Vaughan and Mr Brealey have presented several different arguments on the basis of which they say that I should answer the question: yes. I think that logically their first argument is that in Whitbread the Commission decided that the answer was yes, and that that ought to be good enough to determine the issue for me. They point out that the Commission has had much experience of matters involving the UK pub and beer markets. It has a staff of skilled economists. It has itself investigated aspects of the market from time to time over the years. It has a special understanding of the concepts which underlie the competition principles of Community law, including in particular Art. 81. Mr Vaughan and Mr Brealey say that I should not take on the task of deciding for myself whether I share the view of the Commission. I should simply say that the body best qualified to decide the question has decided it, and I should not second guess that body. I should adopt the findings which the Commission made in Whitbread and proceed with the rest of the case on the footing that Delimitis condition 1 is satisfied.'

As my noble and learned friend observes, the judge recognised the obvious attractions of following this course but concluded he ought not to do so. To have done so without himself addressing the facts would not, I think, have been a judicial response to the case as presented to him.

[8] In the Whitbread decision, which may fairly be treated as the leading example, the Commission reviewed in some detail the market (the 1989 Monopolies and Mergers Commission's Report, the Beer Orders, supply factors, competition between brewers, market entry at brewing level, market entry at retail level, changes in arrangements between pub tenants and their landlords) and the particular agreements under consideration. It then made its legal assessment, first on Delimitis 1, and then on Delimitis 2 and other issues. It concluded that art 81(1) applied but granted exemption under art 81(3).

[9] In his particulars of claim in this action dated 10 June 2002, Mr Crehan's pleading turned (at para 122) to Delimitis 1 and foreclosure of the market. Facts were then pleaded to show that the Delimitis 1 condition was satisfied and the market foreclosed. At para 128 it was pleaded:

> 'Mr Crehan will further rely on the facts and matters in the Commission Decisions (referred to in paragraph 119 above) in support of this contention: in particular Whitbread (paragraphs 108–127), Bass (paragraphs 125–144), Scottish & Newcastle (paragraphs 95–114). He will further rely on the MMC Reports referred to below.'

This appears to suggest that Mr Crehan would rely on the facts found by the Commission, as he was of course entitled to do, but not that those facts, even if persuasive, were effectively binding on the judge.

[10] This, as I understand, is how Inntrepreneur understood the issue. It denied (in para 57 of its amended defence and counterclaim of 19 December 2002) that art 81(1) applied. Paragraph 67 of this pleading read:

> 'The decisions of the Commission in relation to Bass, Whitbread and Scottish & Newcastle (S&N) are not binding on the court, and, in so far as they conclude that the United Kingdom market was foreclosed, misapply the guidance of the European Court in Delimitis and are vitiated by inadequate and incorrect analysis. Notably the Commission failed to give any or adequate attention to the possibilities of expansion for existing players in the market, but focussed on the possibilities of entry to the market for overseas competitors. Furthermore, the Commission's analysis in these decisions should be reassessed in the light of its own later views in [sic] the correct scope and application of Article 81, as referred to in paragraph 64 above. It is averred that the fact that the Commission's conclusions on foreclosure were not appealed to the CFI is irrelevant.'

Thus, as it seems to me, issue was squarely joined on the foreclosure issue and the reliability of the Commission's assessment in Whitbread and the other decisions. To address that issue the parties adduced very detailed factual evidence from over 30 witnesses, supplemented by a large number of experts, culminating in a very lengthy trial. This was not an appropriate procedure if it was to be said that the judge should not look beyond the Commission reports. As it was, I consider that the judge was bound to address the evidence adduced before him, analyse it in a conscientious judicial manner and express his conclusions, giving particular attention to those points on which he differed from the Commission.

[11] If the procedural course adopted for trial of this case had led to a decision incompatible with the law of the Community, the plain duty of a national court would of course be to give effect to the latter. Community law prohibits the making by national courts of decisions which contradict decisions of Community institutions on the same subject matter between the same parties, and strongly discourages the making by national courts of decisions which may be inconsistent with decisions which may yet be made by Community institutions on the same subject matter between the same parties. But it does not, as my noble and learned friend's analysis of the relevant authorities shows, go the length of requiring national courts to accept the factual basis of a decision reached by a Community institution when considering an issue arising between different parties in respect of a different subject matter. Were this otherwise, the Commission's letter and enclosure of 24 November 1997 to Mr Crehan's solicitors, written nearly two months after its art 19(3) notice to Whitbread, would have been very misleading if not disingenuous, since whether or not art 81(1) was applicable to Mr Crehan's agreement would not in any real sense have been a question which the national court would be in a position to decide.

[12] The judge had either to accept the Commission's assessment, which (unless required) would have been an abdication of the judicial function, or form his own opinion, giving such weight to the Commission's assessment as in his judgment the evidence merited. He chose the latter course, and save on one limited point (on which it regarded his view as tenable) the Court of Appeal did not criticise his findings. Its difference was one of approach, holding that he was effectively bound to adopt the Commission's conclusions. As already explained, I do not, with respect, accept the Court of Appeal's approach as correct. I would accordingly uphold the judge's decision on Delimitis 1, and would make the orders which my noble and learned friend proposes.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[13] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hoffmann. For the reasons they give, with which I agree, I would allow this appeal.

LORD HOFFMANN.

[14] My Lords, the Commission of the European Communities is the central institution responsible for the administration of European competition policy. It has power, among other things, to decide whether an agreement prevents, restricts or distorts competition in breach of art 81 EC. Since art 81 is directly applicable in all member states, national courts have concurrent jurisdiction to decide the same question. If an action before a national court raises a question of fact which has already been decided by the Commission in proceedings relating to other participants in the same market, ought the national court to follow the Commission or is it free to reach a different conclusion? Park J, after hearing evidence, rejected a finding by the Commission that in 1991–1993 it was difficult for sellers to enter the English on-the-premises beer market ([2003] EWHC 1510 (Ch), [2003] EuLR 663). The Court of Appeal ([2004] EWCA Civ 637, [2004] EuLR 693) held that he should have followed the Commission and reversed his judgment. In my opinion Park J was entitled to decide for himself and his judgment should be restored.

[15] The proceedings have been long and complex but only a brief sketch is needed to explain the point which the House has to decide. A full and admirably lucid narrative is given in the judgment of Park J. In 1991 the claimant Mr Crehan entered into agreements to take leases of two public houses in Staines from the defendant Inntrepreneur Pub Company (CPC) (Inntrepreneur). They were in standard form containing ties which obliged him to buy his beer from Courage Ltd (Courage) at its list prices. Both businesses failed because, as the judge found, Mr Crehan could not compete with other public houses who were able to buy their beer at lower prices and he therefore did not do enough trade to cover the rent he had agreed to pay. Mr Crehan surrendered his two leases in March and September 1993, having lost a substantial sum of money.

[16] In 1993 Courage sued Mr Crehan for £15,226 outstanding on the beer account and Mr Crehan counterclaimed against Courage and Inntrepreneur for damages, alleging that his losses had been caused by a tie agreement which was unlawful under what was then art 85 of the EC Treaty and is now art 81 EC, to which, for convenience, I shall refer to throughout my speech as art 81:

> '1. The following shall be prohibited as incompatible with the common market: all agreements between undertakings, decisions by associations of undertakings and concerted practices which may affect trade between Member States and which have as their object or effect the prevention, restriction or distortion of competition within the common market . . .
>
> 2. Any agreements or decisions prohibited pursuant to this Article shall be automatically void.
>
> 3. The provisions of paragraph 1 may, however, be declared inapplicable in the case of:—any agreement or category of agreements between undertakings,—any decision or category of decisions by associations of undertakings,—any concerted practice or category of concerted practices, which contributes to improving the production or distribution of goods or to promoting technical or economic progress, while allowing consumers a fair share of the resulting benefit, and which does not: (a) impose on the undertakings concerned restrictions which are not indispensable to the attainment of these objectives; (b) afford such undertakings the possibility of eliminating competition in respect of a substantial part of the products in question.'

[17] The central role of the Commission in administering this article (and art 82 EC, which deals with abuse of a dominant position) is created by regulations made under art 83 EC (formerly art 87 of the EC Treaty). This article gives the Council of Ministers power to make regulations to 'give effect to the principles set out in Articles 81 and 82', including in particular regulations which 'ensure compliance with the prohibitions laid down in Article 81(1)', 'lay down detailed rules for the application of Article 81(3)', 'define the respective functions of the Commission and of the Court of Justice' in applying the regulations and 'determine the relationship between national laws and the provisions contained in this section or adopted pursuant to this Article'.

[18] At the relevant time, the applicable regulation was the Council Regulation (EEC) 17/62 (first regulation implementing [arts 81 and 82 EC]) (OJ 1962 L13 p 204 (S Edn 1959–62 p 87)). It has since been revoked with effect from 1 May 2004 and replaced by Council Regulation (EC) 1/2003 (on the implementation of the rules on competition laid down in arts 81 and 82 of the Treaty) (OJ 2003 L1 p 1) .

[19] Regulation 17/62 granted the Commission extensive powers. Under art 2 it could grant an applicant 'negative clearance', that is to say, a statement certifying that, on the basis of the facts in the possession of the Commission, an agreement gave no grounds for action under art 81(1). Under art 3, anyone having a 'legitimate interest' could apply for a decision that an agreement infringed art 81(1) and an order, backed by the possibility of a fine, that the undertaking bring the infringement to an end. Under art 9, the Commission had sole power to declare art 81(1) inapplicable pursuant to art 81(3). Subject to certain exceptions in art 4(2), anyone who wanted to apply for an exemption under art 81(3) had, by art 4(1), first to notify the agreement in question to the Commission. The Commission had power under art 6(1) to backdate an exemption but, in the case of an agreement which had to be notified, not to a date earlier than the date of notification.

[20] Regulation 17/62 also dealt with the procedure for granting negative clearance or an exemption under art 81(3). By art 19(1) the party seeking the clearance or exemption had to be given an opportunity to be heard and by art 19(3), if the Commission was disposed to grant the clearance or exemption, it had to publish a notice to this effect and invite observations from all interested third parties.

[21] Pursuant to art 83, the Council also made Regulation (EEC) 19/65 (on application of [art 81(3) EC] to certain categories of agreements and concerted practices) (OJ P36 p 533 (S Edn 1965–66(I) p 35)) which conferred upon the Commission power to make regulations specifying in general terms, pursuant to art 81(3), that art 81(1) would not apply to certain specified categories of agreement. Such regulations made by the Commission are called 'block exemptions' and by Title II of Commission Regulation (EEC) 1984/83 (on the application of [art 81(3) EC] to categories of exclusive purchasing agreements) (OJ 1983 L173 p 5) a block exemption was granted for beer supply agreements which satisfied certain specified conditions.

[22] Even before Mr Crehan launched his counterclaim in 1993, Inntrepreneur was well aware that its tie agreements might be said to contravene art 81. Mr Crehan was by no means the first to complain of the terms of the Inntrepreneur lease, which was something of an innovation in the trade. The background to its introduction was that in 1991 Courage and Grand Metropolitan plc entered into an agreement by which Grand Metropolitan transferred its brewing interests to Courage and the two companies set up Inntrepreneur as a jointly owned company to which they transferred the ownership of all their tied public houses. As a result, Inntrepreneur acquired the ownership of some 7,355 tied public houses. It was decided that Inntrepreneur would re-let its public houses on new 20-year leases, much longer than had previously been customary, with ties requiring the tenants to buy their beer from Courage.

[23] The agreement for merging the public house estates of Courage and Grand Metropolitan was subject to the consent of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, as United Kingdom competition authority. As a condition of consent the Secretary of State required undertakings that the number of tied public houses would be reduced to 4,350 by 31 October 1992 and that all the tenants would be released from the ties by 28 March 1998.

[24] The undertaking to reduce the number of tied houses by 31 October 1992 reflected a general United Kingdom policy of opening up the market which had been given effect by the Supply of Beer (Tied Estate) Order 1989, SI 1989/2390, and the Supply of Beer (Loan Ties, Licensed Premises and Wholesale Prices) Order 1989, SI 1989/2258 (the Beer orders). These orders required breweries or brewery groups owning more than 2,000 retail outlets substantially to reduce their holdings by sales or releases from tie by 1 November 1992. The result was that in the few years between the making of the orders and November 1992, a great many public houses came on the market or were released from ties. The orders did not apply to Inntrepreneur because it was not a brewery or brewery group. But the undertakings made it subject to the same rules and, in respect of the 1998 limit, went even further.

[25] More or less from the inception of the Inntrepreneur tied estate, some of its tenants complained that the tie in its standard form of lease infringed art 81(1). In an attempt to put this question to rest, Inntrepreneur on 17 July 1992 notified the agreements to the Commission pursuant to art 4(1) of Regulation 17/62 and applied for negative clearance pursuant to art 2, or alternatively a decision that the agreements fell within the beer supply block exemption or, in the further alternative, an exemption under art 81(3). There followed lengthy negotiations between Inntrepreneur and the Commission, which were in progress when Mr Crehan launched his proceedings and which I shall in a moment describe in more detail. While they continued, Mr Crehan and a large number of similar claimants agreed to their actions being informally stayed.

[26] Although Inntrepreneur had applied for negative clearance on the ground that their agreements did not infringe art 81, the Commission was extremely unreceptive to this argument. In Delimitis v Henninger Bräu AG Case C-234/89 [1991] ECR I-935 at 995 the Court of Justice had given authoritative guidance, in the context of a German beer supply agreement, on the conditions which had to be satisfied for art 81 to apply:

> 'A beer supply agreement is prohibited by Article 85(1) of the . . . Treaty if two cumulative conditions are met. The first is that, having regard to the economic and legal context of the agreement at issue, it is difficult for competitors who could enter the market or increase their market share to gain access to the national market for the distribution of beer in premises for the sale and consumption of drinks. The fact that, in that market, the agreement in issue is one of a number of similar agreements having a cumulative effect on competition constitutes only one factor amongst others in assessing whether access to that market is indeed difficult. The second condition is that the agreement in issue must make a significant contribution to the sealing-off effect brought about by the totality of those agreements in their economic and legal context. The extent of the contribution made by the individual agreement depends on the position of the contracting parties in the relevant market and on the duration of the agreement.'

[27] These two conditions are commonly called 'Delimitis 1' and 'Delimitis 2'. Inntrepreneur took the view that neither condition was satisfied: they considered that, in the upheaval which had been caused by the Beer orders (and their own undertakings to the Secretary of State), it was not difficult to gain access to the market (in the common shorthand, the market was not 'foreclosed') and if it was, their agreements did not make a significant contribution. But the Commission was unwilling to hear argument on these points. Nor was it impressed by the submission that the agreements fell within the block exemption order.

[28] The Commission was however sympathetic to granting an individual exemption under art 81(3). On 30 July 1993 it published a notice pursuant to art 19(3) of Regulation 17/62. The notice described the market and said (in para 6):

> 'As a result of the above characteristics, foreign brewers or indeed new brewers who own few or no on-licensed premises still have difficulty selling substantial quantities of draught or bottled beer independently in the United Kingdom . . .'

[29] It went on to say that many foreign brewers therefore licensed major United Kingdom brewers to brew and distribute their products. That might be taken as expressing the opinion that the market was foreclosed. The notice ended by saying that the Commission intended to grant a retroactive exemption pursuant to art 81(3).

[30] The notice stirred up a hornets' nest of disaffected Inntrepreneur tenants. They not only opposed the grant of an exemption but applied under art 3 of Regulation 17/62 for a decision that art 81(1) was infringed and for appropriate action by the Commission. Among the applicants was Mr Crehan. On 19 December 1994 the Commission wrote to Inntrepreneur saying that in the light of the objections they were having second thoughts about granting an exemption. There followed further negotiations between Inntrepreneur and the Commission, in the course of which Inntrepreneur put forward a new scheme of looser ties under the name of RetailLink, which was put into effect on 25 February 1997. The Commission indicated that it was likely to grant an exemption for RetailLink and on 26 March 1997 Inntrepreneur formally notified it under art 4(1). This led eventually to another art 19(3) notice saying that the Commission was disposed to grant exemption and finally to a 'comfort letter' dated 24 January 2000 in which the Commission said that the agreements notified in 1997 appeared to contain restrictions infringing art 81(1) but that the requirements of art 81(3) appeared to be satisfied.

[31] The question which arose after Inntrepreneur had elected to pursue an exemption for its new agreements was what should be done about the applications relating to the period before RetailLink was adopted. They were, on the one hand, Inntrepreneur's application for negative clearance, application of the block exemption or individual exemption, and, on the other, the tenants' applications under art 3 of Regulation 17/62 for a determination that they infringed art 81(1).

[32] The Commission was distinctly unenthusiastic about proceeding with any of these applications which, so far as it was concerned, were now only of historical interest. Mr Mensching, the senior DG IV official who had been involved in the case from the beginning, suggested that Inntrepreneur withdraw its 1992 notification. On 14 October 1997 Inntrepreneur did so. That left the art 3 applications by the tenants. The Commission dealt with them by a letter dated 24 November 1997 addressed to the complainants, including Mr Crehan, saying that they proposed to reject the applications. The reasons given in an annex to the letter are important and need to be quoted at some length. The Commission noted that there were proceedings on foot in England claiming damages, which raised the question of whether art 81(1) had been infringed and in which this issue could be decided. While Inntrepreneur were seeking exemption under art 81(3), the Commission had to remain seised of the case because only the Commission could grant an exemption. But now that Inntrepreneur had withdrawn its application, there was nothing that the Commission could decide which could not equally be decided by the national court. Accordingly there was no Community interest in the Commission proceeding with the case:

> '35. . . . There is . . . no more request for exemption pending for the "old" Lease. This means that the only remaining question with regard to the application of Community competition law to the "old" Lease, is whether or not Article 81 is applicable.
>
> 36. This is a question which the national court is in a position to decide. It can be added that the national court can take into account some factual and legal elements which the Commission has made public on earlier occasions.

With regard to a general market description, reference can be made to the earlier mentioned 19(3) notice [of 30 July 1993] and to similar such notices in the Bass and Whitbread cases. As to the legal point of the applicability of article 81, indirect guidance can be taken from the Commission's intention indicated in the earlier mentioned Inntrepreneur 19(3) notice to grant an exemption to the Lease.

37. Furthermore, in the event that the national judge finds that Article 81 is applicable, he is in a position to determine the civil law effects following from the prohibition set out in Article 81 . . . The judge can also award compensation for loss suffered as a result of an infringement of Article [81] . . .

38. The Commission considers that there are insufficient grounds for granting the complainant's application as, in the absence of a request for exemption pursuant to Article 81, it would lead to a duplication of procedures and is therefore not in the Community interest for the Commission to rule upon the complainant's request that the "old" Lease has infringed Article 81 since the date of its introduction.'

[33] The result was that the Commission washed its hands of the old leases and never decided whether they infringed art 81(1) or not.

[34] At this point it is necessary to say something about the Bass and Whitbread cases, to which reference is made in the Commission's letter. Inntrepreneur was not the only owner of tied houses to notify its agreements to the Commission. Other large-scale proprietors were also doing so during the late 80s and throughout the 90s. Bass plc notified its tie agreements on 27 October 1987 and a new form of agreement on 12 June 1996. Whitbread plc notified its agreements on 24 May 1994. Scottish & Newcastle plc also did so, on 25 April 1996. In each of these cases the Commission adhered to the view which it had expressed informally to Inntrepreneur, namely, that the relevant market was foreclosed. By the time of the letter to Mr Crehan and the other complainants against Inntrepreneur, the Commission had published art 19(3) notices in respect of the Bass and Whitbread applications, saying that they were minded to grant exemptions under art 81(3). This implied that they regarded art 81(1) as prima facie infringed. Afterwards, the Commission gave formal decisions in all three cases, in similar terms, which were more explicit. The Whitbread decision dated 24 February 1999 (Commission Decision (EC) 1999/230 (relating to a proceeding pursuant to art [81] of the EC Treaty (Case No IV/35.079/F3—Whitbread)) (OJ 1999 L88 p 26) said in recital 127:

'3.3 Conclusion on first Delimitis test

(127) It can thus be concluded that an examination of all tying agreements, including but not limited to beer-supply agreements entered into, and the other factors relevant to the economic and legal context of the UK on-trade market shows that the brewers' tying agreements had in 1990 and still have today, on the basis of the most recent available information, the cumulative effect of considerably hindering independent access to that market, for new national and foreign competitors.'

[35] After the recitals, the actual decision of the Commission was relatively brief:

'THE COMMISSION OF THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES . . . HAS ADOPTED THIS DECISION:

Article 1

1. The provisions of Article 81 of the Treaty are, pursuant to Article 81, declared inapplicable to the individual lease agreements . . .

2. This Decision shall apply from 1 January 1990 until 31 December 2008.

Article 2

This Decision is addressed to: Whitbread plc . . .'

[36] The Commission having decided to make no decision on the old Inntrepreneur leases, the scene then shifted to the Strand, where the litigation with the tenants resumed. Mr Crehan's case was chosen as the lead action in group litigation and in 1998 it came before Carnwath J on the preliminary issue of whether a party to an agreement could in principle recover damages from the other party on the ground that it contravened art 81. Following an earlier decision of the Court of Appeal, Carnwath J ([1999] EuLR 409) held that there was no such cause of action and struck out the claim. There followed a reference to the European Court of Justice, which ruled that a party to the agreement could have a cause of action: see Courage Ltd v Crehan Case C-453/99 [2001] All ER (EC) 886, [2001] ECR I-6297. Accordingly, the action came on for trial before Park J in February and March 2003 and was heard over 29 days.

[37] The action raised a number of issues. One was whether the agreement infringed art 81, which involved deciding whether the two Delimitis conditions were satisfied. A second was whether the agreements fell within the block exemption in Title II of Regulation 1984/83. And then there were questions on the type of damage recoverable and the amount of such damage, if any, for which Mr Crehan was entitled to recover.

[38] Although the parties came to court armed not only with witnesses of fact about the state of the market in 1991–1993 (19 for Mr Crehan and 14 for Inntrepreneur) but also with economic and other experts (three for Mr Crehan and five for Inntrepreneur), counsel for Mr Crehan submitted that the court should decide the Delimitis 1 issue simply on the basis of the Commission's opinion expressed in the recitals to its decision in Whitbread. The judge should not try to 'second guess' the Commission. The judge said that there were 'obvious attractions' in taking such a course but refused to do so. By that time he had heard lengthy and detailed evidence which satisfied him that, in respect of the period 1991–1993, the Commission's opinion could not be sustained. He concluded ([2003] EuLR 663 at [197]):

> '. . . I am not prepared to find that the UK market was foreclosed to that extent simply because the Commission thought that it was and said so in its decision in Whitbread. I have made up my own mind on the basis of the extensive evidence which has been placed before me. I do not suggest that the market was 100 per cent open to all-comers. The tied estates, even after the Beer Orders, cannot be brushed aside as insignificant, and they did to some extent seal off a part of the market. But the sealing-off was not complete even within the tied estates. Much more importantly, leaving the tied estates aside, there were, in my view, amply sufficient fully contestable other outlets to mean that Delimitis condition 1 was not satisfied.'

[39] The adverse decision on Delimitis 1 meant that Mr Crehan's case failed. There was no infringement of art 81(1). Although the judge went on to consider

Delimitis 2, the block exemption and damages, he dealt with these matters only in case the Court of Appeal should find that he was wrong in saying that there had been no infringement of art 81. a

[40] This turned out to have been wise, because the Court of Appeal said that he had been wrong not to follow the Commission on this point. In making his own decision, he had not complied with what is generally called the 'duty of sincere co-operation' imposed upon the institutions of member states by art 10: b

> 'Member states shall take all appropriate measures, whether general or particular, to ensure fulfilment of the obligations arising out of this Treaty or resulting from action taken by the institutions of the Community. They shall facilitate the achievement of the Community's tasks.
>
> They shall abstain from any measure which could jeopardise the attainment of the objectives of this Treaty.' c

[41] The Court of Appeal ([2004] EuLR 693) said that, on the facts of the case, sincere co-operation required the judge not to entertain a submission that the view of the Commission in Whitbread had been wrong: d

> '[97] . . . In our judgment, in the present case the English court was obliged under the duty of sincere co-operation to give to the Commission much greater deference than that which the judge, with all respect to him, was prepared to give. We accept that the Commission and the ECJ left it to the English court to determine whether the application, made by this court on making the reference, that the beer tie in the Inntrepreneur lease contravened Art. 81(1), was correct. However, it is apparent from what the Commission said in the letter of 24 November 1997 to [the complainants], that it expected the English court to take into account its earlier conclusions not only in respect of Inntrepreneur but also in cases such as Whitbread, even though not final decisions. The fact that it was considered unnecessary and therefore undesirable for the Commission itself formally to give the decision as to whether Art. 81(1) applied when the English court was in a position to give the decision and to award compensation (which the Commission could not do) did not leave the judge free to reconsider the Commission's earlier conclusions afresh. Still less was the judge free so to do in 2003, by which time the Whitbread, Bass and Scottish & Newcastle decisions with its conclusions, central to those decisions, on the foreclosure of the relevant market, had been published, and the comfort letter of 24 January 2000 relating to RetailLink had been issued. We accept that it is a ready inference from that letter that in the Commission's view Art. 81(1) applied to the Inntrepreneur leases throughout the period relevant to Mr Crehan's case. e f g h
>
> [98] Inntrepreneur, in its evidence and submissions to the judge, did not attempt to distinguish the present case from Whitbread and the other decisions of the Commission going to the applicability of Art. 81(1) to the relevant market. Instead, it attacked those decisions as "fundamentally flawed". In our judgment it was inappropriate for the judge to adopt the approach that he should receive such evidence and hear such submissions, as the effect of the judge second-guessing the Commission and concluding that the Commission was wrong has been to create an irreconcilable inconsistency in the application of the Community's competition policy to the relevant market. We do not say that the Commission is infallible; far j from it. We do say that if the Commission is to be shown to be wrong in its decisions on the applicability of Art. 81(1), that has to be decided not by the national court but by the ECJ or CFI. The judge's decision offended against the principle of legal certainty in the Community. In our opinion the judge failed to comply with the duty of sincere co-operation and thereby erred in law.'

[42] Apart from saying (at [99]) that they were not satisfied that the Commission had committed 'egregious errors' and commenting on one point (loan ties with short termination periods), on which they described the judge's view as 'at its lowest . . . tenable' (at [107]) but not entitling him to reject the contrary view of the Commission, the Court of Appeal made no comment on the judge's analysis of the facts. In their opinion it was an exercise on which he should not have embarked at all.

[43] Did the judge err in law? The potentiality for conflict between decisions of the Commission and the national courts is a matter on which the Court of Justice and the Commission itself have provided fairly detailed guidance. In Delimitis v Henninger Bräu AG Case C-234/89 [1991] ECR I-935 at 992 (para 47) the Court of Justice said in general terms:

> 'Account should here be taken of the risk of national courts taking decisions which conflict with those taken or envisaged by the Commission in the implementation of Articles 81 and [82], and also of Article 81. Such conflicting decisions would be contrary to the general principle of legal certainty and must, therefore, be avoided when national courts give decisions on agreements or practices which may subsequently be the subject of a decision by the Commission . . .'

[44] This is a useful caution, so far as it goes, but leaves open the question of what counts as a conflicting decision. The comments of the Court of Justice have to be read in the context of the situation of potential conflict which arose in that case. In Delimitis's case the German court was being asked by the tenant to say that his tied tenancy had contravened art 81(1). But the agreement belonged to a category which did not have to be notified under art 4 of Regulation 17/62 and it was therefore always open to the Commission to grant a retroactive exemption which would conflict with a judgment in the tenant's favour by the German court. The conflict envisaged was thus an inconsistency between the legal effects of the two decisions, the Commission saying that an agreement did not contravene art 81 and the German court saying that it did. It was in this context that the court spoke of the risk of conflicting decisions and advised on what to do about avoiding it:

> '50. If the conditions for the application of Article 81 are clearly not satisfied and there is, consequently, scarcely any risk of the Commission taking a different decision, the national court may continue the proceedings and rule on the agreement in issue. It may do the same if the agreement's incompatibility with Article 81 is beyond doubt and, regard being had to the exemption regulations and the Commission's previous decisions, the agreement may on no account be the subject of an exemption decision under Article 81 . . .
>
> 52. If the national court . . . considers in the light of the Commission's rules and decision-making practices, that that agreement may be the subject of an exemption decision, the national court may decide to stay the proceedings or to adopt interim measures pursuant to its national rules of procedure. A stay of proceedings or the adoption of interim measures should also be envisaged where there is a risk of conflicting decisions in the context of the application of Articles 81 and [82].'

[45] It will be noted that in the very last sentence, the Court of Justice adverted to the possibility of a conflict arising, not only from the Commission exercising its exclusive power to grant an exemption under art 81(3) but also from the exercise of its concurrent jurisdiction to decide whether or not an agreement infringed arts 81 or 82, presumably on applications for rulings under art 3 of Regulation 17/62. (Whether the same would be true of applications for negative clearance under art 2 is a question to which I shall return.) The Court of Justice clearly envisaged that if the Commission decided that an agreement infringed art 81(1), a national court would be obliged to follow that decision and, if such a decision was pending, should stay its own proceedings until the Commission had made its decision.

[46] After Delimitis's case, the Commission issued a 'Notice on Co-operation between National Courts and the Commission in Applying arts 81 and 82 of the EC Treaty' (OJ 1993 C39 p 6) which enlarged upon the guidance which had been provided by the Court of Justice. It described the respective functions of the Commission and the national courts:

'4. The Commission is the administrative authority responsible for the implementation and for the thrust of competition policy in the Community and for this purpose has to act in the public interest. National courts, on the other hand, have the task of safeguarding the subjective rights of private individuals in their relations with one another.'

[47] The notice went on to say (at para 20) that a national court, before answering the question of whether an agreement infringed art 81—

'should ascertain whether the agreement, decision or concerted practice has already been the subject of a decision, opinion or other official statement issued by an administrative authority and in particular by the Commission. Such statements provide national courts with significant information for reaching a judgment, even if they are not formally bound by them.'

[48] The matter was taken further by the decision of the Court of Justice in Masterfoods Ltd v HB Ice Cream Ltd, HB Ice Cream Ltd v Masterfoods Ltd (t/a Mars Ireland) Case C-344/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 130, [2000] ECR I-11369. Masterfoods Ltd, a subsidiary of Mars Inc, brought proceedings in Ireland against HB Ice Cream Ltd, a subsidiary of Unilever, for a declaration that its agreements to provide retailers with freezer cabinets on terms that they stocked only HB ice cream contravened arts 81 and 82. On 28 May 1992 the High Court dismissed the action and, on HB's counterclaim, granted an injunction to restrain Masterfoods from inducing retailers to break their agreements by stocking Masterfoods ice cream. On 18 September 1991 Masterfoods made a complaint to the Commission under art 3 of Regulation 17/62 and on 4 September 1992 it gave notice of appeal to the Supreme Court. In the course of discussions with the Commission, HB offered to make some changes in its agreements and the Commission issued a notice saying that it proposed to grant exemption under art 81(3). However, as in this case, the Commission changed its mind and on 11 March 1998 issued a decision (Commission Decision (EC) 98/531 (relating to a proceeding under arts [81 and 82] of the EC Treaty (Case Nos IV/34.073, IV/34.395 and IV/35.436 Van den Bergh Foods Ltd)) (OJ 1998 L246 p 1)) stating that HB's agreements infringed arts 81 and 82. HB immediately applied to the Court of First Instance to annul the decision of the Commission. That was the state of affairs when the appeal came before the Supreme Court in June 1998. The court made a reference to the Court of Justice seeking guidance as to how it b should proceed. It asked whether it should stay the Irish proceedings pending the decision of the Court of First Instance and whether the decision of the Commission on the HB agreements prevented HB from seeking to uphold the contrary decision of the national court.

[49] Advocate General Cosmas, starting from the proposition that it was necessary to avoid conflict between the decisions of Community institutions and c national courts, discussed the question of what counted as a conflict (at para 16). There could be no risk of conflict, he said 'where the legal and factual context of the case being examined by the Commission is not completely identical to that before the national courts'.

[50] Significantly for the situation in the present case, he gave (at footnote 7) as an example of such lack of identity a case in which— d

> 'the national courts are examining the legality of an exclusivity agreement in respect of the use of ice cream freezer cabinets between a particular company and retailers 1, 2 and 3 in Ireland, whilst the Commission is monitoring a similar agreement in respect of the same products in the same market between another company and retailers 4, 5 and 6.' e

[51] In such a case, said the Advocate General—

> '[t]he Commission's decision may provide important indications as to the appropriate way to interpret arts 85(1) and 86, but in this case there is no risk, from a purely legal point of view, of the adoption of conflicting decisions.' f

[52] A risk of conflict—

> 'only arises when the binding authority, which the decision of the national court has or will have conflicts with the grounds and operative part of the Commission's decision. Consequently, the limits of the binding authority of the decision of the national court and the content of the Commission's g decision must be examined every time.'

[53] In the Masterfoods case, the High Court had examined the agreements and the Irish ice cream market as they stood before its decision in 1992, whereas the Commission had examined the amended agreements and the market as it stood h in 1996. It followed that the decisions of the High Court and the Commission were not necessarily in conflict. Conflict would arise only if the High Court's injunction continued to apply after the Commission had ruled that the agreements were unlawful. But that was exactly what HB were asking the Supreme Court to do. The appeal therefore presented an imminent risk of conflict. j

[54] The Court of Justice accepted the Advocate General's analysis that the risk of conflict arose out of the possibility of the Supreme Court continuing an injunction to enforce agreements which the Commission had held to be unlawful:

> '59. In this case it appears from the order for reference that the maintenance in force of the permanent injunction granted by the High Court restraining Masterfoods from inducing retailers to store its products in freezers belonging to HB depends on the validity of Decision 98/531 . . .'

[55] The ruling of the Court of Justice was that the Irish courts had to give priority to the decisions of the European institutions on the validity of the agreements which they were being asked to enforce. The Supreme Court could suspend the proceedings until the outcome of the application to the Court of First Instance for annulment was known. Or it could make a reference to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling on the validity of Decision 98/531. What it could not do was dismiss the appeal and enforce the injunction while the Commission's decision remained in effect.

[56] It is clear that the duty to avoid conflicting decisions, as stated by the Court of Justice in the two leading cases of Delimitis and Masterfoods, has no application to the present case. There is no possibility of conflict, in the sense discussed in those cases, between a decision of the Commission that the Whitbread agreements infringed art 81 and a decision of the national court that the Inntrepreneur agreements did not. The case rather resembles Advocate General Cosmas's example of the two ice cream manufacturers operating in the same market.

[57] Before leaving the jurisprudence of the Court of Justice, I should mention the opinion of Advocate General Van Gerven in HJ Banks & Co Ltd v British Coal Corp Case C-128/92 [1994] ECR I-1209, which was relied upon by Mr David Vaughan QC for Mr Crehan. The reference arose out of an action for damages brought by HJ Banks & Co Ltd (Banks) against the British Coal Corp (British Coal) for abuse of a dominant position, contrary to art 66(7) of the European Coal and Steel Community Treaty (ECSC Treaty). This resembles art 82 of the EC Treaty in being designed to prevent abuse of a dominant position but differs, as the Court of Justice eventually decided in the Banks case, in not being directly enforceable by individuals. However, in proceedings before this judgment had been given, arising out of a complaint to the Commission by the National Association of Licensed Opencast Operators (NALOO) and two other trade organisations, the Commission issued a decision that British Coal had been abusing its dominant position. HJ Banks was a member of NALOO and claimed that this decision was binding upon the national court. The High Court in London made a reference asking, among other things, whether art 66(7) of the ECSC Treaty created directly enforceable rights and, if so, to what extent a national court was bound, as to issues of fact or the construction of the ECSC Treaty, by a decision of the Commission. The Court of Justice decided that no directly enforceable rights were created and therefore did not answer the question about the effect of the Commission's decision. But Advocate General Van Gerven dealt with the question in the general terms in which it had been framed.

[58] He first put on one side administrative letters issued by the Commission, (such as, in this case, the 'comfort letter' issued to Inntrepreneur in 2000). These do not count as 'decisions' and were usually given without going through the procedural requirements of art 19 of Regulation 17/62. In relation to such documents, the Advocate General cited (at para 60) what the Court of Justice had said in NV L'Oréal and SA L'Oréal v PVBA De Nieuwe AMCK Case 31/80 [1980] ECR 3775 at 3789–3790:

'11. Such a letter . . . does not have the effect of preventing national courts, before which the agreements in question are alleged to be incompatible with a Article 85, from reaching a different finding as regards the agreements concerned on the basis of the information available to them. Whilst it does not bind the national courts, the opinion transmitted in such a letter nevertheless constitutes a factor which the national courts may take into account in considering whether the agreements or conduct in question are in accordance with the provisions of Article 85.'

b [59] Interestingly, Advocate General Van Gerven classified an actual decision giving negative clearance under art 2 of Regulation 17/62 with a comfort letter. He appears to have considered that negative clearance would create a legitimate expectation against the Commission but not bind an individual who brought proceedings for infringement of arts 81(1) or 82 in a national court.

c [60] Advocate General Van Gerven then turned his attention to decisions that arts 81(1) or 82 had been infringed, addressed to parties not involved in the litigation in the national court. He said that it was self-evident that—

'no obstacles may be placed in the path of third parties seeking to challenge before the national court findings which the Commission has arrived at in a d decision of that kind.'

[61] Who, for this purpose, is a third party? Obviously not the person to whom the decision was addressed and upon whom, in accordance with art 249, the decision is binding. In the Banks case, that would have been NALOO. But the notion of a third party also excludes persons to whom the decision is of 'direct e and individual concern' and who would have locus standi under arts 225 or 230 to institute proceedings before the Court of First Instance or the Court of Justice for its annulment. In respect of others, however, the decision is not binding but the duty of sincere co-operation nevertheless requires a national court not to give a conflicting ruling. It must be remembered that in the Banks case, if art 66(7) had created private rights in the same way as art 82, the possibility of a conflict of f decisions in the Delimitis and Masterfoods sense would have been very real. The same issue which the court had to decide, namely whether British Coal had abused its dominant position, had been decided by the Commission. But the Advocate General (at para 61) also dealt with the situation in which the national court took a view different from that of the Commission on some question of fact g or law:

'If, on the basis of the parties' arguments, the national court comes to the conclusion that the issues of fact and/or law decided by the Commission are incorrect or insufficient, or if at any rate it has serious doubts in that regard, then in the light of the Delimitis judgment . . . it must take the following h course of action: in the case of findings which carried no weight in the final decision and do not therefore underlie the reasoning of the Commission, the national court is at liberty to adopt a different interpretation: in those circumstances the risk of conflicting decisions and the resultant impairment of the principle of legal certainty is extremely small. On the other hand, in j the case of findings which have an influence on the final decision arrived at by the Commission, the national court is well advised, in accordance with the provisions of its national procedural law, to suspend the proceedings in the case and to seek the necessary information from the Commission or make a direct reference to the Court for a preliminary ruling concerning the validity of the decision in question or the interpretation of the relevant Community competition rules.'

[62] I cannot say that I find this passage altogether easy to understand; in particular, whether the Advocate General was using the expression 'conflicting decisions' in the sense in which it was used in Delimitis's case and the Masterfoods case or in some wider meaning, but the use of the words 'the national court is well advised' and the recommendations of asking for information or making a reference, do not suggest that the national court is under any duty to follow the decision of the Commission.

[63] The law on the relationship between the Commission and the national courts was, so to speak, codified by art 16 of Council Regulation (EC) 1/2003 (on the implementation of the rules on competition laid down in arts 81 and 82 of the Treaty), generally called the modernisation regulation, which replaced Regulation 17/62 with effect from 1 May 2004. It was of course not in force at the time of the events in this case but its significance is that it appears accurately to reflect the previous case law:

> 'Article 16 Uniform application of Community competition law
>
> '1. When national courts rule on agreements, decisions or practices under Article 81 or Article 82 of the Treaty which are already the subject of a Commission decision, they cannot take decisions running counter to the decision adopted by the Commission. They must also avoid giving decisions which would conflict with a decision contemplated by the Commission in proceedings it has initiated. To that effect, the national court may assess whether it is necessary to stay its proceedings. This obligation is without prejudice to the rights and obligations under Article 234 of the Treaty.
>
> 2. When competition authorities of the Member States rule on agreements, decisions or practices under Article 81 or Article 82 of the Treaty which are already the subject of a Commission decision, they cannot take decisions which would run counter to the decision adopted by the Commission.'

[64] This article makes it clear that a relevant conflict exists only when the 'agreements, decisions or practices' ruled on by the national court have been or are about to be the subject of a Commission decision. It does not apply to other agreements, decisions or practices in the same market.

[65] These authorities therefore show that the Commission stated the legal position accurately in its letter to Mr Crehan which I have already quoted (see [32], above), which said that the question of whether or not art 81(1) applied was one which 'the national court is in a position to decide'; that it could 'take into account' the views expressed by the Commission in its 'general market description' in the Whitbread art 19(3) notice; and that 'indirect guidance' on questions of law could be derived from the art 19(3) notice issued after Inntrepreneur's first application. This letter, coming soon after the Whitbread notice, would have been highly misleading if the position was that, provided only that the recipients waited for the Commission to adhere to its view in an actual decision in the Whitbread or some other case, the issue in a national court would be concluded in their favour.

[66] The Court of Appeal accepted (at [97]), that the Commission left it to the national court to determine whether art 81(1) had been infringed or not. But it said (at [77]), that it was clear that 'the Commission expected the English court to follow its view . . . that Art. 81(1) applied'. If that means no more than that the Commission thought it was right, I would not think that particularly surprising. But if it means that the Commission thought that the English court would be obliged as a matter of Community law to follow its view, I think that is neither what the Commission said nor what the authorities require. The Court of Appeal said (at [74]) that the Whitbread and other decisions did not 'formally bind' Inntrepreneur but nevertheless held that the judge had erred in law in allowing Inntrepreneur to adduce evidence to show that the Commission was wrong. This suggests a concept of being informally bound which I find difficult to understand. If, as the Court of Appeal said, the defendant is precluded from adducing evidence to show that the Commission was wrong, the distinction is not visible to the naked eye.

[67] The Court of Appeal said (at [76]) that it was left 'profoundly uneasy' by the judge's decision to allow Inntrepreneur to challenge the Commission's opinion. But I must confess that I am left profoundly uneasy by the unfairness of the Court of Appeal's decision that Inntrepreneur could not do so. The Court of Appeal said that Inntrepreneur could have raised the matter before the Commission in its own application. It is true that if Inntrepreneur had pursued its application for negative clearance on the old agreements, it could have obtained a ruling and, if necessary, challenged that ruling in an application for annulment to the Court of First Instance. But the suggestion that it withdraw that application and litigate the matter in England came from the Commission and the Court of Appeal confirmed the judge's decision that this did not involve any abuse of process. For Inntrepreneur then to find its main defence shut out by a subsequent decision of the Commission in which it took no part seems to me a denial of a fair trial.

[68] The Court of Appeal said (at [98]) that the judge's decision had created 'an irreconcilable inconsistency in the application of the Community's competition policy to the relevant market'. But that again seems to me the opposite of what the Commission said. In its letter to Mr Crehan it said that there was no Community interest which could justify the Commission in deciding whether the old agreements infringed art 81(1) or not. If the Commission had thought that it was important to have uniformity of decision on this point, it could have given a decision on the art 3 applications and, subject to an application for annulment, that would have bound Inntrepreneur: see Iberian UK Ltd v BPB Industries plc [1997] ICR 164. Instead, as an exercise in subsidiarity, it left the decision to the national court. To leave a decision to someone else necessarily implies that he may decide it. In my opinion, for the judge to have made his own decision was to respect the policy of the Commission rather than to flout it.

[69] There was a good deal of discussion, both before the Court of Appeal and in argument before the House, about the degree of 'deference' which a national court should show to a decision of the Commission. Mr Vaughan QC is recorded (at [96] of the judgment of the Court of Appeal) as having constructed a scheme of three degrees of deference (absolute deference, very great deference and deference) which might have to be paid to a decision of the Commission. For my part, I do not find deference in this context a very helpful expression. It is commonly (if not altogether happily) used in administrative law when a court decides that the decision-making power on a particular question properly belongs to someone else and that the court should not substitute its own view. But the decision-making power on whether art 81(1) applies plainly belonged to the English court, exercising concurrent jurisdiction, and I find it difficult to see how the exercise of this power can be combined with 'deference' to the decision of someone else. The correct position is that, when there is no question of a conflict of decisions in the sense which I have discussed, the decision of the Commission is simply evidence properly admissible before the English court which, given the expertise of the Commission, may well be regarded by that court as highly persuasive. As a matter of law, however, it is only part of the evidence which the court will take into account. If, upon an assessment of all the evidence, the judge comes to the conclusion that the view of the Commission was wrong, I do not see how, consistently with his judicial oath, he can say that as a matter of deference he proposes nevertheless to follow the Commission. Only a rule of law, in the nature of an issue estoppel which obliges him to do so, could produce such a result and the Court of Appeal accepted that there was no such rule.

[70] Mr Vaughan submitted that if your Lordships did not accept that the judge was obliged to follow the opinion of the Commission, it should make a reference to the Court of Justice asking whether he was so obliged or, alternatively, whether in the light of the judge's findings of fact, the decision in the Whitbread case was valid. I see little point in either question: on the first issue, it is conceded that there is no rule of Community law which required the court to follow the Commission, and on the second, the House will either be asking about the validity of a decision about agreements between other parties or else asking the Court of Justice to decide a question of fact which was within the jurisdiction of the national court.

[71] In my opinion, therefore, the judge was right in deciding that he could decide Delimitis 1 for himself and the Court of Appeal was wrong to reverse his decision on the ground that he should have followed the Commission.

[72] Although it appears that counsel for Mr Crehan mounted a full-scale appeal against the judge's findings of fact, the Court of Appeal did not suggest that if he had been free to decide the case for himself, his conclusions could not be supported. As I mentioned earlier, on the one point on which they made any comment on his reasoning, they said that his view was ('at its lowest') tenable. Mr Brealey QC, who appeared with Mr Vaughan for Mr Crehan, wished to challenge the judge's findings before the House. But the Court of Appeal gave Inntrepreneur leave to appeal which was limited to the issues on Delimitis 1 and 2, the block exemption and the type of loss falling within art 81. They gave Mr Crehan leave to appeal on the measure of damages. Neither side petitioned the House for leave to argue any other points and the transcripts and other materials which would have been needed for dealing with a full appeal on fact were not made available to the House. Your Lordships therefore declined to hear argument on the facts. It follows that the judge's finding on Delimitis 1 must stand and the appeal must be allowed. I have had the privilege of reading in draft the speech delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill and would associate myself with his remarks.

[73] It is unnecessary to say anything about Delimitis 2 (on which the judge, given the artificiality of the necessary hypothesis in the light of his finding on Delimitis 1, stated no concluded opinion) or on the block exemption. The block exemption points raised two points of construction which are now obsolete because the relevant regulation has been revoked and replaced by another block exemption in different terms. There is therefore little point in the House expressing a view on what the true construction would have been. Your Lordships did not invite argument on any of the questions relating to damages, which in the circumstances do not arise. The cross-appeal on quantum must therefore be dismissed.

[74] Finally, I must mention the intervention of Visa UK Ltd, who are in dispute with OFT on a point related to the question at issue in this appeal. Mr Stephen Morris QC, who appeared on their behalf, made some succinct submissions which I found very helpful in relation to the questions which the House has to decide. But I say nothing about whether today's decision has any application to Visa, whose position as against the OFT may well be different from that of Mr Crehan against Inntrepreneur.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[75] My Lords, I have had the privilege of considering the speeches of my noble and learned friends, Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hoffmann, in draft. I agree with them and for the reasons they give, I too would allow the appeal.

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

[76] My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading in draft the opinions prepared by my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hoffmann. I am in full agreement with them, and for the reasons which they give I too would allow this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Sutradhar v Natural Environment Research Council

[2006] UKHL 33

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE, LORD BROWN OF EATON-UNDER-HEYWOOD AND LORD MANCE

22, 23 MAY, 5 JULY 2006

Negligence – Duty to take care – Existence of duty – Defendant publishing hydrogeological report on water samples from Bangladesh – Implied statement in report as to absence of arsenic – Claimant seeking to recover damages for personal injury caused by drinking water contaminated by arsenic – Whether defendant owing duty of care to claimant.

The British Geological Survey (BGS) was a department of the defendant which undertook research in hydrogeology. The BGS undertook hydrogeological work for the purpose of testing the efficiency of artesian wells in Bangladesh. It also prepared a report assessing the hydrochemistry of the main aquifer units in the area covered by the artesian wells project. The study used water samples from the artesian wells and from shallow wells commonly used to provide drinking water. The objectives of the study included the occurrence and interaction of certain elements and their effect on biological systems in the context of fish cultivation, crop irrigation and potable water supply. The standard procedures for testing ground water at the time did not include tests for arsenic and the water samples were not tested for it. It subsequently appeared that water from many wells in Bangladesh was contaminated with arsenic. The claimant lived in a region from which some of the water samples had been taken by the BGS. He developed symptoms associated with arsenical poisoning and brought proceedings for negligence against the defendant. He contended that the BGS had caused or materially contributed to his illness by issuing a report which represented that the water in his village was safe to drink. The defendant's application for summary judgment on the basis that it owed no duty of care to the claimant was refused. The Court of Appeal reversed the trial judge and held that the claimant had no reasonable prospect of satisfying a court that the defendant owed him a duty of care. The claimant appealed.

Held – The BGS owed no duty to the population of Bangladesh not to publish a report which implied, by what it did not say, that the BGS shared the conventional wisdom about arsenic, namely, that its presence was so unlikely that it was not necessary to test for it. A duty of care was not owed in all cases in which it was foreseeable that in the absence of care someone might suffer physical injury; there had to be proximity in the sense of a measure of control over and responsibility for the potentially dangerous situation. The BGS had had no control whatever, whether in law or in practice, over the supply of drinking water in Bangladesh, nor was there any statute, contract or other arrangement which imposed upon it responsibility for ensuring that the water was safe to drink. Accordingly, the claimant had no reasonable prospect of satisfying a court that in all the circumstances the defendant owed him a duty of care. The appeal would therefore be dismissed (see [1], [2], [36], [38], [40]–[44], [48]–[50], below).

Perrett v Collins [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep 255 considered.

Notes

For the test for determining notional duty of care and for negligent statements, see 33 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 604, 614.

Cases referred to in opinions

Brooks v Metropolitan Police Comr [2005] UKHL 24, [2005] 2 All ER 489, [2005] 1 WLR 1495.

Candler v Crane Christmas & Co [1951] 1 All ER 426, [1951] 2 KB 164, CA.

Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605, [1990] 2 WLR 358, HL.

Clay v AJ Crump & Sons Ltd [1963] 3 All ER 687, [1964] 1 QB 533, [1963] 3 WLR 866, CA.

Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1, HL.

Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465, [1963] 3 WLR 101, HL.

Le Lievre v Gould [1893] 1 QB 491, CA.

Parkinson v St James's and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 530, [2001] 3 All ER 97, [2002] QB 266, [2001] 3 WLR 376.

Perrett v Collins [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep 255, CA.

Swain v Hillman [2001] 1 All ER 91, CA.

Three Rivers DC (No 3) v Bank of England [2001] UKHL 16, [2001] 2 All ER 513, [2003] 2 AC 1.

Watson v British Boxing Board of Control Ltd [2001] QB 1134, [2001] 1 WLR 1256, CA.

White v Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1999] 1 All ER 1, [1999] 2 AC 455, [1998] 3 WLR 1509, HL.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Alcock v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police [1991] 4 All ER 907, [1992] 1 AC 310, [1991] 3 WLR 1057, HL.

Assicurazioni Generali SpA v Arab Insurance Group (BSC) [2002] EWCA Civ 1642, [2003] 1 All ER (Comm) 140, [2003] 1 WLR 577.

Bank of Credit and Commerce International (Overseas) Ltd (in liq) v Price Waterhouse (a firm) [1998] BCC 617, CA.

D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust, K v Dewsbury Healthcare NHS Trust, K v Oldham NHS Trust [2005] UKHL 23, [2005] 2 All ER 443, [2005] 2 WLR 993.

Farah v British Airways (2000) Times, 26 January, CA.

G v G [1985] 2 All ER 225, [1985] 1 WLR 647, HL.

Graham Barclay Oysters Pty Ltd v Ryan (2002) 194 ALR 337, (2002) 211 CLR 540, [2002] HCA 54.

Hawkins v Clayton (1988) 78 ALR 69, (1988) 164 CLR 539, Aus HC.

Hill v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire [1988] 2 All ER 238, [1989] AC 53, [1988] 2 WLR 1049, HL.

Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd [1970] 2 All ER 294, [1970] 2 AC 1004, [1970] 2 WLR 1140, HL.

Independents' Advantage Insurance Co Ltd v Personal Representatives of Cook (decd) [2003] EWCA Civ 1103, [2003] All ER (D) 423 (Jul).

L v Reading BC [2001] EWCA Civ 346, [2001] 1 FCR 673, [2001] 1 WLR 1575.

Murphy v Brentwood DC [1990] 2 All ER 908, [1991] 1 AC 398, [1990] 3 WLR 414, HL.

Palmer v Tees Health Authority [1999] Lloyd's Rep Med 351, CA.

Perre v Apand Pty Ltd [2000] 3 LRC 537, (1999) 164 ALR 606, [1999] HCA 36.

Phelps v London Borough of Hillingdon, Anderton v Clwyd CC, Jarvis v Hampshire CC, Re G (a minor) [2000] 4 All ER 504, [2001] 2 AC 619, [2000] 3 WLR 776, HL.

Rich (Marc) & Co AG v Bishop Rock Marine Co Ltd, The Nicholas H [1995] 3 All ER 307, [1996] AC 211, [1995] 3 WLR 227, HL.

South Pacific Manufacturing Co Ltd v New Zealand Security Consultants & Investigations Ltd, Mortensen v Laing [1992] 2 NZLR 282, NZ CA.

Stovin v Wise [1996] 3 All ER 801, [1996] AC 923, [1996] 3 WLR 388, HL.

Sullivan v Moody, Thompson v Connon (2001) 183 ALR 404, (2001) 207 CLR 562, [2001] HCA 59.

Sutherland Shire Council v Heyman (1985) 50 ALR 1, (1983) 50 ALR 1, Aus HC.

Tanfern Ltd v Cameron MacDonald [2000] 2 All ER 801, [2000] 1 WLR 1311, CA.

W v Essex CC [2000] 2 All ER 237, [2001] 2 AC 592, [2000] 2 WLR 601, HL.

Waters v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [2001] PIQR 6, HL.

Woolcock Street Investments Pty Ltd v CDG Pty Ltd (2004) 205 ALR 522, (2004) 216 CLR 515, [2004] HCA 16.

X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633, [1995] 3 WLR 152, HL.

Appeal

The claimant Binod Sutradhar appealed with permission of the House of Lords Appeal Committee given on 25 January 2005 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Kennedy and Wall LJJ, Clarke LJ dissenting) on 20 February 2004 ([2004] EWCA Civ 175, [2004] All ER (D) 357 (Feb)) allowing the appeal of the defendant Natural Environment Research Council from the decision of Simon J on 8 May 2003 ([2003] EWHC 10246 (QB), [2003] All ER (D) 87 (May)) refusing the application of the defendant (i) to strike out the claimant's claim against it for damages for personal injury or (ii) for summary judgment. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hoffmann.

Lord Brennan QC, Andrew Spink and Richard Hermer (instructed by Leigh Day & Co) for the claimant.

Michael Beloff QC, Charles Pugh and Ben Cooper (instructed by Manches LLP, Oxford) for the defendant.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

5 July 2006. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[1] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Hoffmann and Lord Brown of Eaton-under-Heywood. For the reasons they give, with which I agree, I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD HOFFMANN.

[2] My Lords, the question is whether the claimant, who lives in Bangladesh, has a reasonable prospect of success in an action against the Natural Environment Research Council (NERC) for negligence in issuing a geological report which he says induced the health authorities in Bangladesh not to take steps which would have ensured that his drinking water was not contaminated by arsenic. In consequence he says that he has suffered injury from arsenical poisoning. The Court of Appeal, by a majority (Kennedy and Wall LJJ, Clarke LJ dissenting: [2004] EWCA Civ 175, [2004] All ER (D) 357 (Feb)) and reversing the judge (Simon J: [2003] EWHC 10246 (QB), [2003] All ER (D) 87 (May)) decided that the claimant had no reasonable prospect of satisfying a court that in all the circumstances the NERC owed him a duty of care. It struck out the claim. I agree. In my opinion the claim is hopeless.

SUMMARY JUDGMENT

[3] Under CPR 24.2 the court has power to give summary judgment against a claimant if it considers that (a) he 'has no real prospect of succeeding on the claim . . . and (b) there is no other compelling reason why the case or issue should be disposed of at a trial'. This is a broader power than existed under the old rules, when a claim could be struck out only on the grounds that the pleading disclosed no cause of action (the old demurrer, on which no evidence was admissible) or that the claim was frivolous, vexatious and an abuse of the process of the court. Under r 24.2 evidence is admissible and witness statements have been submitted by both sides. The new power has been described by Lord Woolf MR (in Swain v Hillman [2001] 1 All ER 91 at 92) as salutary:

> 'It enables the court to dispose summarily of both claims or defences which have no real prospect of being successful. The words "no real prospect of succeeding" do not need any amplification, they speak for themselves. The word "real" distinguishes fanciful prospects of success . . .'

[4] Lord Woolf went on to say (at 94, 95):

> 'It is important that a judge in appropriate cases should make use of the powers contained in Pt 24. In doing so he or she gives effect to the overriding objectives contained in Pt 1. It saves expense; it achieves expedition; it avoids the court's resources being used up on cases where this serves no purpose, and I would add, generally, that it is in the interests of justice. If a claimant has a case which is bound to fail, then it is in the claimant's interests to know as soon as possible that that is the position . . .
>
> Useful though the power is under Pt 24, it is important that it is kept to its proper role. It is not meant to dispense with the need for a trial where there are issues which should be investigated at the trial.'

[5] These remarks were approved by this House in Three Rivers DC (No 3) v Bank of England [2001] UKHL 16, [2001] 2 All ER 513, [2003] 2 AC 1 (see Lord Hope of Craighead (at [91]–[93]); Lord Hutton (at [134])). In addition, as Lord Millett said in the same case (at [192]) the 'most important principle of all is that justice should be done. But this does not mean justice to the plaintiff alone'. It is not just to a defendant to subject him to a lengthy and expensive trial when there is no realistic prospect of success.

[6] I therefore approach this appeal on the basis that the claimant's allegations of primary fact must (unless plainly fanciful, which is not the case here) be accepted as true and allowance must be made for the possibility that further facts may emerge on discovery or at trial. The question is whether, on these assumptions, he has a real prospect of success. For this purpose, I shall first set out the facts as alleged in the statement of claim together with some incontrovertible background material which is either contained in the evidence or common general knowledge. I shall then consider whether as a matter of law there is any prospect of the claimant being able to establish a cause of action.

THE BRITISH GEOLOGICAL SURVEY

[7] NERC is incorporated by royal charter pursuant to s 1(1)(b) and (3) of the Science and Technology Act 1965 for the objects of research, instruction, the dissemination of knowledge and the provision of advice relating to the earth sciences and ecology. Its members are appointed by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and it is funded by grants from that department and fees for activities undertaken for other departments, foreign governments or the private sector.

[8] The British Geological Survey (BGS) was founded in 1835 as a branch of the Ordnance Survey and is now a department of NERC. It has an annual budget of £37m; about half consists of grants from public funds and the rest from paid research. It employs about 800 permanent staff and, among other things, undertakes research in hydrogeology. It has a specialised aquifer properties laboratory at Wallingford.

THE BANGLADESH SECOND DEEP TUBEWELL PROJECT

[9] The Overseas Development Agency (ODA) was in 1992 a functional wing of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, charged with providing aid to poor countries. It subsequently became the Overseas Development Administration and in 1997 its functions were taken over by the Department for International Development (DFID). During the period 1983–1992 it was one of the donors funding a project known as the Bangladesh Second Deep Tubewell Project (DTWII) to increase food production in Bangladesh by assisting the Bangladesh Agricultural Development Corporation (BADC) to provide 4,000 deep tubewells (artesian wells) for irrigation purposes in an area north of Dacca. These were wells of substantial capacity (50–60 litres per second) equipped with a vertical turbine or electrical submersible pump.

[10] In 1984 the ODA commissioned the BGS to undertake hydrogeological work for the purpose of testing the efficiency of tubewell designs. For this purpose Mr Jeffrey Davies, a geologist specialising in hydrogeology, was employed by the BGS to test 16 well designs. He tested these wells in a relatively small area north-west of Dacca, forming part of the area covered by DTWII, which was chosen for its relatively homogeneous geological character. This project was concluded in 1988.

[11] In 1990 Mr Davies proposed a programme to check on whether there had been deterioration in the performance of the DTWII tubewells. He proposed first to revisit the 16 test wells sunk by BGS and then, if he found deterioration, to undertake a more detailed study in the following year. Funding for both stages of this programme was approved by ODA.

THE GEOLOGICAL SURVEY

[12] Mr Davies made his initial field trip early in 1991 and found no signs of deterioration. He therefore declared a second visit to be unnecessary and proposed instead that the BGS should spend the £40,000 allocated by ODA on a study of the hydrochemistry of the main aquifer units of the whole area covered by the DTWII project. This involved taking water and sediment samples at various places and sending them to the laboratory at Wallingford for chemical analysis. The proposal claimed that, in addition to adding to the general stock of geological knowledge, his project would be useful in two ways. First, it would provide a better understanding of the way in which the DTWII irrigation wells worked. Secondly, following a suggestion from a colleague at the Institute of Aquaculture at Stirling University, he said that the chemical analysis could reveal the presence of trace elements such as aluminium and iron which might be toxic to the fish which (in a project in which the Stirling Institute was involved) rural Bangladeshis were being encouraged to farm. Indeed, such elements might be toxic to humans also. It appears that the Wallingford laboratory has a standard procedure which can test simultaneously for all the major and minor ions and the most common trace elements. As these include aluminium and iron, the information concerning the fish was obtainable at no extra cost.

[13] Mr Davies did his field work in the first three months of 1992, obtaining groundwater samples from 150 sites in central and north-eastern Bangladesh. Most of the samples were taken from deep tube wells but more than a third came from hand pumped shallow wells which were commonly sunk to provide drinking water. After they had been analysed at Wallingford, he wrote up his report.

THE REPORT

The report was entitled: 'Short term BGS Pilot Project to Assess the Hydrochemical Character of the Main Aquifer Units of Central and North-eastern Bangladesh and Possible Toxicity of Groundwater to Fish and Humans.'

[14] It began with an executive summary. This described the project as a 'reconnaissance study' which had the primary aim of producing a reliable body of data that could be used to describe the hydrochemistry of the main aquifer units of central and north-eastern Bangladesh. Such data was required to understand the hydrochemical nature of the main aquifers, the genesis of the alluvial aquifers and the modes of occurrence of 'trace elements that may be toxic to biological systems'. The 'Study Inputs' were the obtaining of samples from 150 widespread sites and submitting them to Wallingford 'for the determination of 31 major, minor and trace elements'. The report included an atlas showing the distribution of major, minor and trace elements within the study area, which could be used 'to indicate the distribution of elements and groundwater properties that can be of benefit or harmful to aspects of life in Bangladesh'. The summary gave examples relating to the elements which had been identified: deficient iodine in the water supply in some areas, which could produce goitre, high dissolved iron, manganese and zinc in other areas, which could be harmful to fish, and high phosphate content, which could also harm fish. It recorded that aluminium was not found in quantities likely to be toxic to biological systems. Finally, the summary concluded with a proposal for additional work:

> 'This type of rapid reconnaissance survey produces information of relevance not only to hydrogeologists but also to those who are concerned with availability and quality of groundwater for domestic, agricultural, aquaculture and industrial usage. Similar studies undertaken in other parts of Bangladesh could produce comparable results given limited hydrogeological inputs.'

[15] The main body of the report, under the heading 'Background', describes the participation of the BGS in DWTII, the fish farming project and the lack of adequate facilities in Bangladesh for obtaining hydrogeological data for the purposes both of designing and siting the most efficient irrigation wells and assessing the suitability of the water for fish. It went on:

> 'The above experiences indicate the need to upgrade the groundwater analysis capabilities of institutions in Bangladesh. Improved equipment and staff training are needed urgently ... Such a situation must also be of concern to public health workers who, especially during the recently completed "World Water Decade", actively promoted the installation of thousands of hand pumped wells as being the best sources of clean, wholesome (ground) water for local domestic use especially at village level ...
>
> To overcome the above difficulties a countrywide baseline study of hydrochemical, hydrogeological and geological factors needs to be undertaken. As a first step this report presents the results of a study of the hydrochemistry of aquifer units within central and northern Bangladesh. Within this area ... reasonable geological data are available from deep tubewells installed under the [DWTII] Project.'

Mr Davies then set out the study objectives:

> 'This study aimed to acquire sufficient data to permit baseline hydrochemical characterisation of aquifer units recognised and recognition of processes controlling variations in groundwater chemistry within these aquifer systems.
>
> Such data should reflect and indicate groundwater flow patterns, location of groundwater recharge and discharge areas, and delineation of groundwater bodies. Detailed studies will be made of the occurrence and interaction of aluminium, manganese, silica, phosphorus and iron and their effects upon biological systems in the context of fish cultivation, crop irrigation and potable water supply.'

[16] There followed a detailed account of the results, including the maps forming the 'atlas' which showed the geographical distribution of traces of each element for which the samples were analysed: dissolved iron, silicon, manganese, phosphorus, aluminium, zinc, bromide, fluoride, iodide etc. It discussed the aluminium content and said that 'Aluminium is therefore not considered to be a health risk in the majority of the groundwaters surveyed in this study'. There were similar discussions of iron and manganese. In the conclusions, the report said that the hydrochemistry of the aquifers reflected a number of factors which were imperfectly understood. After setting these out, it said:

> 'The above factors appear to control the distribution of minor elements some of which can be toxic to aspects of agricultural, health and aquacultural fields of interest. Such reconnaissance hydrochemical surveys will give timely indication of the possible presence and distribution of such toxic substances in groundwater systems in Bangladesh.'

[17] Finally, App 3 set out the raw data of the hydrochemical analyses of Mr Davies's samples, showing the elements for which the samples had been tested and the results.

[18] Copies of the report were supplied to the ODA, Mott MacDonald Ltd (the main engineering consultant which had been engaged on DWTII), Dacca University, the Bangladesh Agricultural Development Corp and certain non-governmental organisations involved in water resource managements. These copies were no doubt available to anyone who wanted to read them.

ARSENIC IN THE DRINKING WATER

[19] At the same time as the modest DWTII programme for sinking 4,000 irrigation wells, there was in progress a vast scheme, initially funded by the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the World Bank and other non-governmental organisations, to install more than four million shallow hand-pumped tube wells to supply drinking water in rural areas all over the country. The object of this programme was to give the people of Bangladesh access to clean drinking water instead of the contaminated pond and other surface water which had been responsible for gastrointestinal diseases and high infant mortality in the past.

[20] Unfortunately it appears that in a good many cases the water from these shallow wells, though free of harmful bacteria and other organisms, is contaminated with arsenic. Tests of a limited number of wells have revealed the presence of arsenic at levels considerably higher than the standard measure of safety prescribed by the World Health Organisation. It seems that at least until 1993, and, according to the claimant, considerably later no one thought of testing the tubewell drinking water for arsenic. Mr Peter Ravenscroft, a hydrogeologist who worked for Mott MacDonald Ltd at the relevant time, says in a witness statement made on behalf of the claimant:

> 'The majority of investigations into water resources related to quantity, and a high proportion of the practitioners working on water resource or supply projects (whether in Government, aid agencies or as consultants) did not concern themselves about most aspects of water quality. The question of groundwater quality had been very largely (with the exception of coliform bacteria, and to a lesser extent salinity and iron) neglected by both government and aid agencies.'

[21] The BGS did not test their samples for arsenic and there is no mention of arsenic in Mr Davies's report. UNICEF says that standard procedures for testing ground water at the time did not include tests for arsenic. There is considerable controversy over whether the responsible organisations should have been aware of the danger at an earlier stage. Mr Ravenscroft says that when he read the 1992 report he paid no attention to the absence of tests for arsenic and other toxic chemicals because 'I was not looking for them'. It was only in 1995 that he heard reports of arsenic poisoning in neighbouring West Bengal and drew the conclusion that there might be similar problems in Bangladesh.

[22] The consequences of the failure to test for arsenic have been most unfortunate: a paper published by the World Health Organisation (Smith, Lingas and Rahman Contamination of drinking-water by arsenic in Bangladesh: a public health emergency Bulletin of the World Health Organization, vol 78 (2000) pp 1093–1103) estimated that, of the 125 million inhabitants of Bangladesh, between 35 million and 77 million are at risk of drinking contaminated water and described the situation as the greatest environmental disaster that had ever happened.

THE CLAIMANT

[23] The claimant is one of the people affected by arsenic in his drinking water. He lives in the Brahmanbaria region to the north-east of Dacca, from which Mr Davies took some of his samples. He is a villager, now nearly 50, who says that until about 1983 he drank pond water. Then a tubewell was sunk in his village and he drank its water instead. In 1991 he developed symptoms associated with arsenical poisoning (melanosis, keratosis, foot ulceration) which, over the years, have become worse.

THE ALLEGATIONS OF NEGLIGENCE

[24] The claimant says that BGS caused or materially contributed to his illness, either by failing to draw attention to the presence of arsenic or by issuing a report which represented that his water was safe to drink. He, of course, had never seen the report or, one would imagine, heard of BGS. But he says that if the report had said that the water contained arsenic or had not given the impression that the water was safe, the public health authorities in Bangladesh would have taken steps to ensure that it was. So the question is whether BGS owed the claimant and others like him a duty to take reasonable care to test whether the water contained arsenic or not to issue a report which gave the impression that testing for arsenic was unnecessary. The defendants say that there is no arguable case that they were in a relationship of proximity with the population of Bangladesh which could make them liable on either of these grounds. They do not submit that there are any other grounds upon which the claimant would be bound to fail, although they point out the very considerable difficulties he would have on other issues.

[25] I have put the claimant's case in two different ways: BGS owed him a duty to test for arsenic or BGS should not have issued a report which gave the impression that there was no arsenic. It is important to distinguish between these two formulations. The first is that BGS owed him a positive duty to test for arsenic. That way of putting the matter makes it necessary to inquire what could have created such a duty. The second is essentially a claim of misrepresentation: the report is said to have given the impression, by its omission of any tests for arsenic, that the water was free of arsenic, or at any rate safe to drink, and this, as should have been foreseen, lulled the Bangladesh public health authorities into a false sense of security and inhibited them from testing the water themselves and discovering its toxic properties.

[26] Lord Brennan QC, who appeared for the claimant, disavowed the allegation of a positive duty to test for arsenic and emphasised the misrepresentation aspect of the case. He realistically saw the considerable difficulties in the way of a claim that BGS, out of all the geological experts in the world, owed such a duty to the people of Bangladesh. Nevertheless, it is important to say why BGS were under no duty to test the water for arsenic because the reasons are relevant to whether any claim can be founded upon the terms of their report.

[27] BGS had no connection with the drinking water project and no one asked them to test the water for potability. They owed no duty to the government or people of Bangladesh to test the water for anything. If Mr Davies had not found some spare money in the budget and never done his survey, BGS could not have incurred any liability. The fact that they tested for the elements specified in the report was an accident of the availability of funds, Mr Davies's idea of adding to useful knowledge and Stirling University's concerns about fish farming.

The statement of claim places much emphasis upon the expertise, world renown and so forth of BGS, and contrasts this with the impoverished state of Bangladeshi geological facilities. This was a matter to which Mr Davies himself drew attention in the report (see [15], above). But the fact that one has expert knowledge does not in itself create a duty to the whole world to apply that knowledge in solving its problems. True, the BGS was working in Bangladesh and Mr Davies did test the water for a number of trace elements. But the fact that he or the BGS in Wallingford chose to run tests for some elements cannot create a duty upon them to test for other elements. BGS therefore owed no positive duties to the government or people of Bangladesh to do anything. They can be liable only for the things they did and the statements they made, not for what they did not do.

[28] I turn therefore to whether any claim can be based upon the terms of the report. The essence of the claimant's allegation is that BGS knew or ought reasonably to have known that the report would be relied upon as a statement that the tubewell water of Bangladesh was fit to drink. More specifically, that it did not contain arsenic or any other toxic substances.

[29] In my opinion it is quite impossible to find any such statement in the report. Ms Sara Bennett, who describes herself as an Environmental Consultant and has filed a witness statement for the claimant, says that she 'accepted the statements made by the study as meaning what they said'. If this means that the report contained statements that there was no arsenic in the water, it is simply untrue. The report states absolutely clearly that the samples had been tested at Wallingford for the presence of a number of named elements and draws attention to the fact that the presence or absence of some of these elements (presence of iron, absence of iodine) may be relevant to the toxicity of the water to animals and humans. It says nothing about arsenic. No one could suppose that the BGS had tested the water for arsenic. The report does not say why they did not include arsenic in the suite of elements for which they ran tests. But the highest that the matter can be put for the claimant is that the absence of a test for arsenic implies that BGS (like, it seems, everyone else at the time, including the government, UNICEF and those closely involved in the drinking water programme) thought that the presence of arsenic was so unlikely that it was not necessary to test for it. The report can therefore at best be regarded as an implied statement by BGS that they shared that belief.

[30] It is important to be clear about the basis of the claim because the claimant, supported by the witness statements filed on his behalf, goes on to say that if the BGS had warned about the presence of arsenic, the government or some aid agency or non-governmental organisation would have done something about it. Thus Mr Ravenscroft says that 'if arsenic had been identified in 1992 an arsenic mitigation programme would have been quickly implemented'. Ms Bennett, who worked on the Northeast Regional Water Management Plan (NERP) in 1991–1994, says that if the report had identified arsenic 'it would have been highlighted as an urgent issue in the NERP April 1993 report' and measures to mitigate exposure would have been set in train. (This allegation faces formidable difficulties in the light of the measures actually taken (or not taken) by the authorities after the problem was identified, but for the purposes of this application for summary judgment I think it must be accepted as true.) It is, however, a statement about what would have happened if the BGS had tested the water for arsenic and, as I have already said and I think Lord Brennan accepts, the BGS owed no duty to test the water for arsenic. In this respect both the witness statements and the statement of claim display some confusion about exactly what the nature of the claim is. In fact the claim depends upon the very different proposition that the BGS owed a duty not to make an implied statement that in their opinion it was unnecessary to test for arsenic and that it was this implied statement by BGS (rather than the similar implied statements being made at the time by all other experts involved in the drinking water programme) which caused the failure of the government to take protective measures.

[31] Is it then arguable that the BGS owed a duty to the population of Bangladesh not to publish a report which, although containing useful information about many other matters, implied, by what it did not say, that the BGS shared the conventional wisdom about arsenic? My Lords, I think that this question has only to be stated in order to show how improbable it is.

[32] The grounds upon which courts will decide whether or not a claimant is owed a duty of care have been examined by the House on numerous occasions. The standard framework within which this question is usually examined is to ask whether the damage was reasonably foreseeable, whether there was sufficient 'proximity' between the claimant and the defendant and whether it is fair, just and reasonable to impose a duty (see Lord Bridge of Harwich in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 573–574, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 617–618). It has often been remarked that the boundaries between these three concepts are somewhat porous but they are probably none the worse for that. In particular, the requirement that the imposition of a duty should be fair, just and reasonable may sometimes inform the decision as to whether the parties should be considered to be in a relationship of proximity and may sometimes provide a special reason as to why no duty should exist, notwithstanding that the relationship would ordinarily qualify as proximate. In these proceedings the defendant does not allege any such special reason but the concept of fairness and justice obviously looms large in the question of whether it is fair, just and reasonable that the author of a geological survey should be treated as having a relationship of proximity to the population of Bangladesh.

[33] The possibility of a duty of care in tort not to make negligent statements was first established by the decision of the House of Lords in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465. Until then, the law had taken the view, exemplified by the statement of Bowen LJ in Le Lievre v Gould [1893] 1 QB 491 at 502 that 'the law . . . does not consider that what a man writes on paper is like a gun or other dangerous instrument', that in the absence of contract, fraud or a fiduciary relationship, there is no liability for negligent statements.

[34] The old rule applied whatever the type of loss which might follow from the negligent statement: whether physical injury or financial loss. In Candler v Crane Christmas & Co [1951] 2 KB 164 at 194 Asquith LJ, in support of a majority judgment which upheld the previous law, gave an illustration:

> 'Singular consequences would follow if the principle laid down in [Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1] were applied to negligent misrepresentation in every case in which the representee were proximate to the representor. The case has been instanced by Professor Winfield and referred to by my brother Denning of a marine hydrographer who carelessly omits to indicate on his map the existence of a reef. The captain of the "Queen Mary", in reliance on the map and having no opportunity of checking it by reference to any other map, steers her on the unsuspected rocks, and she becomes a total loss. Is the unfortunate cartographer to be liable to her owners in negligence for some millions of pounds damages? If so, people will, in future, think twice before making maps. Cartography would become an ultra-hazardous occupation.' (See also [1951] 1 All ER 426 at 442.)

[35] Denning LJ, in a famous dissenting judgment, favoured the possibility of liability for negligent statements. But not on the basis of the kind of 'proximity' which would satisfy the requirements of Donoghue v Stevenson for conduct causing direct physical injury without any intermediate element of reliance, whether by the claimant or a third party. He proposed a much narrower test for a duty of care in respect of statements: the maker must be exercising a profession in which he can be expected to take care, he must know that the statement is going to be used by the person relying upon it and he must have known the particular transaction for which the information was required:

'. . . a scientist or expert (including a marine hydrographer) is not liable to his readers for careless statements in his published works. He publishes his work simply for the purpose of giving information, and not with any particular transaction in mind at all. But when a scientist or an expert makes an investigation and report for the very purpose of a particular transaction, then, in my opinion, he is under a duty of care in respect of that transaction.' (See [1951] 2 KB 164 at 183; see also [1951] 1 All ER 426 at 435.)

[36] This dissenting judgment was upheld by the House of Lords in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465 (see Lord Hodson [1963] 2 All ER 575 at 597, [1964] AC 465 at 509, Lord Devlin [1963] 2 All ER 575 at 611, [1964] AC 465 at 530 and Lord Pearce [1963] 2 All ER 575 at 617, [1964] AC 465 at 538–539). It seems to me that the alleged implied statement about arsenic in the BGS report is no different from a statement in an authoritative textbook on geology to the effect that the aquifers of Bangladesh are very unlikely to contain arsenic. It is clear that Lord Denning would not have regarded the author of such a book as in a relationship of proximity with the population of Bangladesh.

[37] Lord Brennan said that the law had developed since the pioneering days of Candler v Crane Christmas & Co and Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd and, as an indication of current thinking, relied upon the judgment of Hobhouse LJ in Perrett v Collins [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep 255. This was an action by a passenger who was injured in an aircraft accident, allegedly caused by the unairworthy state of the aircraft, against an inspector who had certified that it was fit to fly. Under the terms of the Air Navigation Order 1989, SI 1989/2004, the aircraft could not lawfully fly unless such a certificate had been issued. Hobhouse LJ said that the inspector owed a duty of care to potential passengers to use reasonable care in inspecting the aircraft and issuing the certificate. He said that in respect of claims for personal injury there was now no difference in principle between liability for negligent statements and liability for other forms of conduct. The question was the degree of control and responsibility which the defendant had over the situation which involved potential injury to the claimant:

'Where the plaintiff belongs to a class which either is or ought to be within the contemplation of the defendant and the defendant by reason of his involvement in an activity which gives him a measure of control over and responsibility for a situation which, if dangerous, will be liable to injure the plaintiff, the defendant is liable if as a result of his unreasonable lack of care he causes a situation to exist which does in fact cause the plaintiff injury.' (See at 262.)

[38] I do not propose to comment upon this statement, formulated with characteristic care and precision. It may or may not be possible now to subsume liability for negligent statements together with other conduct causing physical injury under a single principle. But that principle is not that a duty of care is owed in all cases in which it is foreseeable that in the absence of care someone may suffer physical injury. There must be proximity in the sense of a measure of control over and responsibility for the potentially dangerous situation. Such a principle does not help the claimant. In Perrett v Collins the inspector had complete control over whether the aircraft flew or not. If he refused a certificate it could not fly. The purpose of the system of certification established by the 1989 order was equally clearly the protection of persons who might be injured by unairworthy aircraft and therefore placed responsibility for affording such protection upon the inspector. For my part, therefore, I have no difficulty with the proposition that the inspector owed a duty to potential passengers to exercise due care and this may be why Perrett v Collins has not been reported in the official series of law reports. (Compare also Clay v AJ Crump & Sons Ltd [1963] 3 All ER 687, [1964] 1 QB 533 in which an architect had complete control over whether a dangerous wall was left standing and Watson v British Boxing Board of Control Ltd [2001] QB 1134, [2001] 1 WLR 1256 in which the Board had control over the medical services provided at boxing matches.) But the claimant does not come even remotely within the principle stated by Hobhouse LJ. The BGS had no control whatever, whether in law or in practice, over the supply of drinking water in Bangladesh, nor was there any statute, contract or other arrangement which imposed upon it responsibility for ensuring that it was safe to drink. Lord Brennan said that while it was true that the BGS had no control over or responsibility for the water supply, they had control over and responsibility for their report. But this emendation of Hobhouse LJ's principle would turn it into complete nonsense. Everyone has control over and responsibility for their own actions. The duty of care depends upon a proximate relationship with the source of danger, namely the supply of drinking water in Bangladesh.

[39] Simon J refused to strike out the claim on the ground that the law was developing and that 'part of the argument [for the defendant] proceeds on the basis that a leading judgment in the Court of Appeal is wrong' (see [2003] All ER (D) 87 (May) at [54]). That was apparently a reference to Hobhouse LJ in Perrett v Collins [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep 255 and it may be that the defendant made such a submission to the judge. However, so far as the judge thought that the case could arguably come within the principle stated by Hobhouse LJ or any conceivable development of that principle, I respectfully think that he was wrong. He also appears ([2003] All ER (D) 87 (May) at [49]) to have proceeded on the basis that the BGS had arguably been under a duty to test for arsenic ('The failure to test for arsenic can, at least for the purposes of the present application, properly be viewed in the context of the overall activity of conducting a competent hydrogeological survey'). This is an argument which Lord Brennan now disavows and which, as I have said, has no prospect of success. While therefore it is true that the decision to give summary judgment involves the exercise of a discretion, the judge in my opinion exercised his discretion upon a misapprehension about the relevant principles of law and the Court of Appeal were right to reverse him.

[40] In his dissenting judgment, Clarke LJ said ([2004] All ER (D) 357 (Feb) at [44]) that it was arguable that 'the defendant should have tested for all trace elements including arsenic or made it clear in the report that it had not tested for arsenic'. But in my opinion there could not have been any duty upon the BGS to test for arsenic and the report made it perfectly clear that they had not done so.

[41] My Lords, the claimant in my opinion fails at the first hurdle of showing an arguable case that he was owed a duty of care. It is however worth considering the other formidable difficulties which, even if his case on this point had not been as hopeless as I think it is, he would have had to overcome in order to establish liability. He would have to show that it was negligent of the BGS, in the context of a report which did not purport to be a certificate of the potability of drinking water, not to have questioned the current orthodoxy that it was not necessary to test for arsenic. He would have to establish the causative effect of the report in the sense of showing that but for the publication of the report containing its implied endorsement by the BGS of the unlikelihood of arsenic being present in the water, that orthodoxy would have been questioned by the Bangladesh government or someone else who would have alerted the government to the dangers. He would have to show that the government would have done something to provide alternative water supply for the claimant's village. All of these points are conceded to be arguable, but the claimant must succeed on all of them and, as any punter will know, if your chances on each of four issues are 20%, your chances of succeeding on all four are less than 0·2%.

[42] The overriding objectives of the Civil Procedure Rules include achieving justice for both claimants and defendants and saving time and expense. These objectives sometimes conflict and compromises are required. It is not the case that the administration of justice, alone among the services provided by the state, is exempt from any considerations of cost. It is obvious that a trial of this action, involving an examination of the water resources programme in Bangladesh over a number of years, would be an enormous and expensive undertaking. Your Lordships were told that the costs incurred in these proceedings by the claimant and other residents of Bangladesh who wish to bring similar actions, at the expense of United Kingdom public funds, already exceed £380,000. That takes no account of the costs incurred, also at the public expense, by NERC. That is a factor which, however unpalatable it may be to those who think that justice is priceless, must be taken into account. And justice to the defendant requires one to have regard to the burden which a long and complicated trial would impose upon NERC. Speaking for myself, I think that even if the resources of the state and NERC were infinite, it would still be wrong for this case to proceed to trial. But when one considers the scale and cost of a trial, the case for stopping the proceedings now appears to me to be overwhelming. I am also in complete agreement with the speech to be delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Brown of Eaton-under-Heywood, which I have had the privilege of reading in draft. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

[43] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. For the reasons set out in his opinion, with which I agree, I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD BROWN OF EATON-UNDER-HEYWOOD.

[44] My Lords, I too would dismiss this appeal and in doing so agree with everything said by my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. I nevertheless want to add a short judgment of my own simply to highlight what seem to me the critical features of the case.

[45] I agree with Lord Hoffmann (at [41], above) that there could be no duty on BGS to test for arsenic and I agree too that their report made it perfectly clear that they had not done so. I agree therefore that the relevant question is that earlier posed by Lord Hoffmann (at [32], above): is it arguable that BGS owed a duty to the population of Bangladesh not to publish a report which implied, by what it did not say, that BGS shared the conventional wisdom about arsenic (namely—see [30], above—that its presence was so unlikely that it was not necessary to test for it)?

[46] Lord Hoffmann rightly points out (at [42], above) that, the existence of a relevant duty of care aside, one of the other formidable difficulties in the claimant's path would be to show that it was negligent of BGS, in the context of a report which did not purport to be a certificate of the potability of drinking water, not to have questioned the current orthodoxy that it was unnecessary to test for arsenic. For the purpose of deciding whether BGS were under a duty of care, however, we must assume that their report, in impliedly stating that arsenic was not a hazard, constituted a negligent misstatement. If the claimant could prove that, but for such negligent misstatement, the government of Bangladesh or other relevant Bangladeshi authorities would have discovered the hazard and eliminated it from the water supply thereby safeguarding the claimant from the injury he sustained (each of these representing further formidable difficulties in the claimant's path as Lord Hoffmann also points out at [42], above) would he be entitled to succeed in this claim? That critically seems to me the true issue.

[47] Beguilingly though the argument was put by Lord Brennan QC, there seems to me to be only one answer to that question, the answer no. Clay v AJ Crump & Sons Ltd [1963] 3 All ER 687, [1964] 1 QB 533, Perrett v Collins [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep 255 and Watson v British Boxing Board of Control Ltd [2001] QB 1134, [2001] 1 WLR 1256 are the authorities principally relied upon by the appellant in this appeal. But in the present case there is nothing like the directness and immediacy between the defendant's role in events and the claimant's injuries which characterise each of those cases: an architect who was responsible for the safety of the site buildings negligently left standing a wall which then collapsed on the plaintiff workman; an inspector responsible for certifying airworthiness negligently certified an aircraft as fit to fly; and the British Boxing Board of Control, with the responsibility for determining the medical care and facilities to be immediately available for those injured in the boxing ring, negligently failed to specify a sufficient level of care. It is the contrasts rather than the similarities between those cases and this which are so striking.

[48] Here the essential touchstones of proximity are missing. BGS had no 'control over' or 'responsibility for' (see Hobhouse LJ's judgment in Perrett v Collins [1998] 2 Lloyd's Rep 255 at 262 quoted by Lord Hoffmann at [38], above) the provision of safe drinking water to the citizens of Bangladesh in the same way as the architect, the air safety inspector and the British Boxing Board of Control had control over and responsibility for ensuring respectively a safe wall, a safe aircraft and a safe system for treating injured boxers. There was here no 'particular transaction' (Denning LJ's phrase in his dissenting judgment, later to be vindicated, in Candler v Crane Christmas & Co [1951] 1 All ER 426 at 435, [1951]

2 KB 164 at 183) such as the preparation of accounts to be shown to a known potential investor—or, indeed, such as triggered the implied statements attesting to the safety respectively of the wall, the aircraft and the boxing ring in the later three cases. BGS's position is akin rather to that of the notionally negligent marine hydrographer referred to by both Denning LJ and Asquith LJ in Candler v Crane Christmas & Co. Moreover (and this perhaps is just a mirror image of the last point), unlike the comparatively narrow classes of potential claimants in the other cases—those likely to be injured respectively by the collapsing wall, the crashing aeroplane or the inadequate provision of immediate care for injured boxers—the class of potential claimants here (assuming BGS were indeed to owe the duty of care contended for) is the entire population of Bangladesh or at the very least that of the areas tested during the 1992 survey.

[49] I recognise, of course, that the three pre-conditions to the imposition of a duty of care classically formulated in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605—the foreseeability of harm, a sufficient proximity between the parties, and that it is fair, just and reasonable to impose a duty of care in all the circumstances—to a substantial degree overlap. There are copious statements throughout the case law and the academic commentaries to that effect. And I recognise too that we are to assume for present purposes that the appellant can establish both the foreseeability of harm and that it would be fair, just and reasonable to impose a duty of care here, in the sense that there are no sufficient policy reasons for denying a duty which would otherwise exist, as, for example, in cases of psychiatric injury (see White v Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1999] 1 All ER 1, [1999] 2 AC 455), 'wrongful birth' (see Parkinson v St James's and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 530 at [46], [2001] 3 All ER 97 at [46], [2002] QB 266), or actions brought in respect of police investigations (see, most recently, Brooks v Metropolitan Police Comr [2005] UKHL 24, [2005] 2 All ER 489, [2005] 1 WLR 1495). But all that said, if ever there were a case which is bound to fall at the proximity hurdle this surely is it. Whatever is required to constitute a sufficient proximity to support a duty of care—and I acknowledge the imprecision of the concept and the many criticisms it has attracted down the years—it is not to be found on any possible view of the facts here. That is the long and the short of it. The appellant's claim must inevitably fail and so too, therefore, must his appeal.

LORD MANCE.

[50] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friends Lord Hoffmann and Lord Brown of Eaton-under-Heywood. For the reasons they give, with which I agree, I would dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Patel and another v Pirabakaran

[2006] EWCA Civ 685

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
WILSON LJ AND SIR PETER GIBSON
3 MARCH, 26 MAY 2006

Landlord and tenant – Forfeiture of lease – Premises let as a dwelling – Enforcement of right of re-entry or forfeiture unlawful otherwise than by proceedings in court – Lease of shop premises and residential flat – Landlord peaceably re-entering shop premises – Whether lease forfeit – Whether premises let as a dwelling – Meaning of 'let as a dwelling' – Protection from Eviction Act 1977, s 2.

The defendant tenant held premises which consisted of a ground floor shop with a flat above. He conducted a retail business on the ground floor and resided on the first floor. The lease contained a right of re-entry for the landlord into the premises 'or any part thereof in the name of the whole'. The tenant fell into arrears of rent and the claimant landlords purported to exercise their right of re-entry by causing the locks of the shop to be changed. The tenant remained resident in the flat, which had a separate entrance. The landlords issued a claim for an order for possession of the flat on the basis that the lease had become forfeit by their re-entry. Section 2[a] of the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 provided that where any premises were let as a dwelling on a lease which was subject to a right of re-entry or forfeiture it was not lawful to enforce that right otherwise than by proceedings in the court while any person was lawfully residing in the premises or part of them. The tenant argued that the premises were 'let as a dwelling' within the terms of s 2 of the 1977 Act in that the premises were 'let wholly or partly as a dwelling', so that the lease had not been lawfully forfeited. The judge considered that 'let as a dwelling' in s 2 meant 'let exclusively as a dwelling', so that the landlords had not been precluded from exercising their right of re-entry otherwise than by proceedings in court. He made an order for possession and the tenant appealed.

Held – In circumstances in which premises were let partly for residential purposes and partly for business purposes and in which the tenant was residing in the part let for residential purposes, the landlord was required by s 2 of the 1977 Act not to enforce any right of forfeiture under the lease otherwise than by proceedings in court. The phrase 'let as a dwelling' in s 2 meant 'let wholly or partly as a dwelling' and so applied to premises which were let for mixed residential and business purposes. When the precursor of s 2 of the 1977 Act had been introduced in the Rent Act 1965 that was understood to be the established meaning of the phrase, contained in a series of prior enactments and so construed in a series of judgments of the Court of Appeal. If that was what the phrase then meant in the 1965 Act, that was what it now meant in s 2 of the 1977 Act. There was no reason to suppose that in enacting s 2 Parliament had intended that tenants who held tenancies for mixed purposes should not also enjoy the protection which was afforded to purely residential tenants. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [1], [25], [34], [37], [46]–[48], [52], [56], below).

a Section 2 is set out at [3], below

Epsom Grand Stand Association Ltd v Clarke [1919] WN 170, Maunsell v Olins [1975] 1 All ER 16, Cheryl Investments Ltd v Saldanha, Royal Life Saving Society v Page [1979] 1 All ER 5, Pulleng v Curran (1980) 44 P&CR 58, Webb v Barnet London BC (1988) 21 HLR 228, Wagle v Trustees of Henry Smith's Charity Kensington Estate [1990] 1 QB 42 and Wellcome Trust Ltd v Hamad, Ebied v Hopkins, Church Comrs for England v Baines [1998] 1 All ER 657 considered.

National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty v Knipe [1997] 4 All ER 627 distinguished.

Notes

For entry: residential occupiers, see 27(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 547.

For the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, s 2, see 23 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2004 reissue) 565.

Cases referred to in judgments

Billson v Residential Apartments Ltd [1992] 1 All ER 141, [1992] 1 AC 494, [1992] 2 WLR 15, HL.

British Land Co Ltd v Herbert Silver (Menswear) Ltd [1958] 1 All ER 833, [1958] 1 QB 530, [1958] 2 WLR 580, CA.

Cheryl Investments Ltd v Saldanha, Royal Life Saving Society v Page [1979] 1 All ER 5, [1978] 1 WLR 1329, CA.

Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639, ECt HR.

Epsom Grand Stand Association Ltd v Clarke [1919] WN 170, CA.

Farrell v Alexander [1976] 2 All ER 721, [1977] AC 59, [1976] 3 WLR 145, HL.

Hicks v Snook (1928) 27 LGR 175, CA.

Lambeth London BC v Kay, Leeds City Council v Price [2006] UKHL 10, [2006] 4 All ER 128, [2006] 2 WLR 570.

Maunsell v Olins [1975] 1 All ER 16, [1975] AC 373, [1974] 3 WLR 835, HL.

National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty v Knipe [1997] 4 All ER 627, [1998] 1 WLR 230, CA.

Pulleng v Curran (1980) 44 P&CR 58, CA.

R v Brighton and Area Rent Tribunal, ex p Slaughter [1954] 1 All ER 423, [1954] 1 QB 446, [1954] 2 WLR 289, DC.

Wagle v Trustees of Henry Smith's Charity Kensington Estate [1990] 1 QB 42, [1989] 2 WLR 669, CA.

Webb v Barnet London BC (1988) 21 HLR 228, CA.

Wellcome Trust Ltd v Hamad, Ebied v Hopkins, Church Comrs for England v Baines [1998] 1 All ER 657, [1998] QB 638, [1998] 2 WLR 156, CA.

Appeal

The defendant, Rasiah Pirabakaran, who was the tenant of shop premises and residential accommodation under a lease dated 20 August 1999, appealed with permission of Judge Oppenheimer from his decision in the Brentford County Court on 25 August 2005 granting the claimant landlords, Navichandra Manibhai Patel and another, an order for possession of the premises. The landlords had re-entered the shop premises on 13 February 2004. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Jan Luba QC and Erol Topal (instructed by Van-Arkadie & Co, Harrow) for the tenant.

Tom Weekes (instructed by Albin Hunt & Stein) for the landlords.

Cur adv vult

26 May 2006. The following judgments were delivered.

WILSON LJ.

THE QUESTION

[1] In circumstances in which premises are let partly for residential purposes and partly for business purposes and in which the tenant is residing in the part let for residential purposes, is the landlord required by s 2 of the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 not to enforce any right of forfeiture under the lease otherwise than by proceedings in court?

[2] Such is the question raised by this appeal. It is surprising that it has not previously been answered.

INTRODUCTION

[3] Section 2 of the 1977 Act, which is entitled 'Restriction on re-entry without due process of law', provides:

> 'Where any premises are let as a dwelling on a lease which is subject to a right of re-entry or forfeiture it shall not be lawful to enforce that right otherwise than by proceedings in the court while any person is lawfully residing in the premises or part of them.'

[4] So, more focussed, the question becomes whether premises let partly for residential purposes and partly for business purposes are 'let as a dwelling' within the meaning of s 2 of the 1977 Act. The appeal is against an order for possession made by Judge Oppenheimer in the Brentford County Court on 25 August 2005. His answer to that question was negative. But, recognising its importance and difficulty, he gave permission to appeal against his order. Mr Luba QC, who now appears for the appellant tenant, contends that the judge's answer should have been affirmative. Mr Weekes, who, as he did before the judge, appears for the respondent landlords, maintains that the judge's negative answer was correct.

[5] In effect, therefore, Mr Luba suggests that the phrase 'let as a dwelling' in s 2 of the 1977 Act means 'let wholly or partly as a dwelling', whereas Mr Weekes suggests that it means 'let exclusively as a dwelling'.

THE FACTS

[6] The issue arises out of a lease dated 20 August 1999 of premises described therein as 'all that land together with shop premises and residential accommodation above' at 44 Syon Lane, Osterley, Middlesex, granted by the respondent landlords to third parties for a term of 16 years at a rent of £7,230 pa subject to review. In 2003, with the licence of the landlords, the third parties assigned the lease to the appellant tenant (the tenant). By then the rent had risen to £10,845 pa.

[7] By cl 3(13) of the lease the tenant covenanted—

> 'Not to use or permit the Demised Premises to be used otherwise than as to the ground floor as a shop for the business of a retail grocers greengrocers and provisions merchant the sale of newspapers periodicals magazines and a stationery and the sale of intoxicating liquors of all descriptions for consumption off the Demised Premises AND as to the upper floor for residential accommodation for a single family.'

[8] It was agreed in the lease that the landlords should have a right of re-entry as follows:

b 'That if the said rents or any part thereof shall be unpaid for twenty one days after any of the days hereinbefore appointed for payment thereof whether or not the same shall have been lawfully demanded or if . . . or if . . . or if any covenant on the Tenant's part herein contained shall not be performed or observed then and in any of the said cases it shall be lawful for c the Landlord or any person or persons duly authorised by the Landlord in its behalf to enter into and upon the Demised Premises or any part thereof in the name of the whole to re-enter the same and to repossess and enjoy without prejudice to any right of action or remedy of the Landlord in respect of any antecedent breach of any of the covenants by the Tenant.'

d [9] The tenant conducted a retail business on the ground floor of the premises and resided on the first floor. By 13 February 2004 he was, so the judge found, in arrears of rent for at least 21 days in the sum of £1,059. On that day the landlords purported to exercise their right of re-entry by causing bailiffs to change the locks of the shop on the ground floor. Until the hearing before the judge in August 2005 the tenant remained excluded from the shop. Until September 2004, e however, he remained resident in the flat, which has a separate entrance.

[10] On 8 September 2004 the landlords issued a claim against the tenant for an order for possession of the flat. The basis of the claim was that, by their re-entry on 13 February 2004, the lease had become forfeit.

[11] On 12 September 2004 water cascaded from the flat into the shop through f the ceiling. In that regard the tenant was charged with committing criminal damage to the premises and it became a condition of his bail that he should not return to the flat. On 13 September the landlords peaceably changed the locks of the flat. On 20 September the tenant issued a claim against the landlords for an injunction that they should be restrained from excluding him from either part of the premises. The basis of the claim was that, by reason of s 2 of the 1977 Act, the g purported forfeiture of the lease on 13 February 2004 was unlawful. On 24 September, explaining that he hoped to secure an alteration of the bail condition, the tenant obtained an interim injunction against the landlords that they should not prevent him from occupying the flat. In the event, however, he failed to secure an alteration of the condition. In January 2005 he was convicted h of causing criminal damage to the premises and, apart from being sentenced to community service, he was ordered to pay £4,000 to the landlords by way of compensation. The conclusion of the criminal proceedings enabled him to return to reside in the flat; and, at the time of the hearing before the judge in August 2005, he remained resident in it.

j [12] The events of September 2004 are irrelevant to the forfeiture or otherwise of the lease. For the contractual right of re-entry is into the premises 'or any part thereof in the name of the whole'. Thus, unless the landlords were precluded by s 2 of the 1977 Act from exercising their right of re-entry otherwise than by proceedings in court, their actions on 13 February 2004 achieved forfeiture of the lease referable to the whole premises and the tenant thereupon became a trespasser in the flat.

[13] In a succinct judgment the judge held, by reference to an authority to which I will refer in [32], below, that the demised premises were not 'let as a dwelling'; that accordingly the landlords were not constrained by s 2 of the 1977 Act; and that therefore the lease had been lawfully forfeited on 13 February 2004. He went on to hold—against which there is no appeal—that, partly by reference to the criminal damage, there was no ground for granting the tenant relief from forfeiture under s 146(2) of the Law of Property Act 1925. So in the claim brought by the landlords he ordered the tenant to give them possession of the flat and to pay them damages for trespass; and he dismissed the claim brought by the tenant.

THE 1977 ACT

[14] The first task is to set s 2 of the 1977 Act in context. Along with ss 1, 3 and 4, it is in Pt I, entitled 'Unlawful Eviction and Harassment'. Section 5, on the other hand, is in Pt II, entitled 'Notice to Quit'. The remaining sections are in Pt III, entitled 'Supplemental Provisions'.

[15.1] One does best to start with s 3, which is entitled 'Prohibition of eviction without due process of law' and which, as amended, provides:

> '(1) Where any premises have been let as a dwelling under a tenancy which is neither a statutorily protected tenancy nor an excluded tenancy and—(a) the tenancy (in this section referred to as the former tenancy) has come to an end, but (b) the occupier continues to reside in the premises or part of them, it shall not be lawful for the owner to enforce against the occupier, otherwise than by proceedings in the court, his right to recover possession of the premises.'

[15.2] By s 8(1), the phrase 'statutorily protected tenancy' now means eight specified types of tenancy. The third, which has been in the list from the beginning and which is set out at (c), is 'a tenancy to which Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 applies'. This leads to s 23 of that Act (the 1954 Act), which provides:

> '(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, [Part II] of this Act applies to any tenancy where the property comprised in the tenancy is or includes premises which are occupied by the tenant and are so occupied for the purposes of a business carried on by him or for those and other purposes.'

[15.3] So the ambit of s 3 becomes clear. If the circumstances are that (a) the premises have been 'let as a dwelling'; (b) the tenancy has come to an end; and (c) the occupier, ie anyone lawfully residing in them at the termination of the tenancy, continues to reside in them, then it is unlawful for the owner to recover possession of them from him otherwise than by proceedings in court. If, however, by another source, the former tenant already enjoys security of tenure or other statutory protection following the termination of his tenancy, he has no need for the protection of s 3 and so is excluded from it on the footing that he has 'a statutorily protected tenancy'.

[15.4] The inclusion within the phrase 'statutorily protected tenancy' of a tenancy to which Pt II of the 1954 Act applies may also be significant. Part II applies to a tenancy, such as in the present case, of premises occupied partly for residential purposes and partly for business purposes because, within the meaning of s 23, the property 'includes' premises occupied for business purposes. The possible significance is that Parliament thought it necessary specifically to exclude such a tenancy from the ambit of s 3 by including it in s 8 as a type of 'statutorily protected tenancy'. Had Parliament considered that it was not of premises 'let as a dwelling', such a tenancy would not in any event have fallen within s 3 and there would have been no need to provide that it should be thus excluded. Accordingly the perceived need to exclude it may suggest that, at any rate for the purpose of s 3, such a tenancy is indeed of premises 'let as a dwelling'. I will return to this argument, to which it will be convenient to refer as 'the s 8 argument'.

[16.1] Next one should turn to s 2 itself, set out at [3], above. On any view it is closely related to s 3. Thus the requisite circumstances are, again, that the premises are 'let as a dwelling' and that a person is lawfully residing in them. The difference is, however, that the proscription in s 2 is against enforcement of a right of forfeiture otherwise than by court proceedings and therefore, in that termination of the tenancy is achieved only at the moment of such enforcement, the section, unlike s 3, does not cater for the situation in which, at the time of recovery of possession, the tenancy has already come to an end. No doubt the proscription could have been insinuated into s 3 but at a cost in terms of terminological complexity. So it is given a section of its own; and, since it addresses an immediately prior stage in the relationship between landlord and tenant, it is presumably given an immediately prior position in the Act.

[16.2] Statutorily protected tenancies, although excluded from s 3, are not excluded from s 2. The reason is that no tenant has statutory protection, otherwise than by virtue of s 2 itself, against peaceable re-entry pursuant to a forfeiture clause. Violent re-entry is in any event prohibited by the criminal law, namely s 6 of the Criminal Law Act 1977; but the offence can be committed only if the tenant or some other person happens to be present at the time of re-entry.

[17] Finally one should turn to s 1. Although it has a much wider sweep, the section has a direct nexus with ss 2 and 3. It creates criminal offences of unlawfully depriving a 'residential occupier' of his occupation of premises and of harassing him. Under s 1(1) the phrase 'residential occupier' is defined to mean:

> '. . . a person occupying the premises as a residence, whether under a contract or by virtue of any enactment or rule of law giving him the right to remain in occupation or restricting the right of any other person to recover possession of the premises.'

The persons protected under ss 2 and 3 are prime examples of persons in the third category of 'residential occupier', namely persons occupying premises as a residence by virtue of the restrictions therein upon the right of others to recover possession of them.

[18] The links between ss 1, 2 and 3 reflect their collection together within Pt I. Section 5, however, has an entirely different subject and so comprises Pt II. Its only similarity with ss 2 and 3 is that it addresses premises 'let . . . as a dwelling'. It provides that a notice to quit such premises shall not be valid unless it is in writing, contains prescribed information and is given not less than four weeks in advance.

THE ORIGINS OF THE PROVISIONS IN THE 1977 ACT

[19] The 1977 Act was an Act of consolidation. Subsequently, however, it has been amended and so now it does more than to reflect legislation passed prior to 1977. Section 5 has a pedigree different from that of ss 1–3, in that, as originally enacted, it re-enacted a provision of the Rent Act 1957 as amended. By contrast ss 1–3, as originally enacted, re-enacted ss 30–32 respectively of the Rent Act 1965 as amended. But two of those sections of the 1965 Act, namely ss 30 and 32, derive, with modifications, from s 1 of the Protection from Eviction Act 1964, being an Act passed with only temporary effect pending the bringing forward of the new government's Bill later to become the 1965 Act. Thus, whereas ss 1 and 3 of the 1977 Act have their genesis in s 1 of the 1964 Act, s 2 of the 1977 Act has its genesis only in s 31 of the 1965 Act, of which it is indeed a replica.

[20] Sorely in need of assistance in resolving such ambiguity in s 2 of the 1977 Act as prompts respectable rival arguments that the phrase 'let as a dwelling' means 'let wholly or partly as a dwelling' or, instead, means 'let exclusively as a dwelling', the court would have been entitled to consider any relevant explanation proffered in Parliament while what was to become s 31 of the 1965 Act travelled into enactment. But resort to Hansard proves to be of no assistance. In introducing to the House of Lords the clause which was to become s 31 of the Act Lord Mitchison said only:

> '. . . this is a proposed new clause, and I think that I had better read out to the House the first sentence of what I have been told about it. This new clause deals with a small and technical lacuna in Clauses 30 and 31. I am perfectly prepared to explain the small but technical lacuna, but it is very dull, and I wonder whether your Lordships will accept that from me. I beg to move.' (See 269 HL Official Report (5th series) col 475.)

Insertion of the clause was agreed; nothing more was said.

'LET AS A DWELLING' IN OTHER CONTEXTS

[21] The phrase 'let as a dwelling', although never directly the subject of construction in the context of s 2 of the 1977 Act, has been the subject of extensive construction in other provisions. But such construction has not been entirely consistent; and the inconsistency is no doubt testament to the desire of the courts to serve the different purposes perceived to underlie different provisions.

[22] Rent control and security of tenure were introduced on an emergency basis by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (War Restrictions) Act 1915. Section 2(2) of the 1915 Act provided that the Act applied 'to a house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling . . . and every such house or part of a house shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which this Act applies . . . ' In Epsom Grand Stand Association Ltd v Clarke [1919] WN 170 this court considered the applicability of the Act to the letting of premises on the race-course upon terms under which the tenants were to run part of them as a public-house and to occupy the other part themselves. The court held that the premises were 'let as a separate dwelling'. Bankes LJ, with whose judgment Scrutton and Atkin LJJ concurred, said (at 171):

> 'The house was dwelt in by the defendants and let to them for that purpose. It is in the fullest sense a dwelling-house, and none the less so because it is also a public-house. [Counsel for the landlord] contended that the Acts do not apply to houses if let for business purposes. I cannot accept that view. No doubt if the word "dwelling-house" is given its ordinary meaning the Act may seem to include cases not contemplated by the Legislature; but a restricted meaning would exclude many cases which were intended to be included. The object of the Legislature was to include all houses which are occupied as dwelling-houses provided they are of the class a ascertained by their value as prescribed by the Act, notwithstanding that they are also used by the tenant for other purposes as well as those of a dwelling-house.'

In Maunsell v Olins [1975] 1 All ER 16 at 24, [1975] AC 373 at 389 Lord Wilberforce observed:

b

> 'Everybody knows . . . that protection under the Rent Acts is given not merely to single, identifiable, pure dwelling-houses or dwelling units, but also to units of a mixed character—houses . . . part (even a substantial part) of which is used for business purposes.'

c In Wellcome Trust Ltd v Hamad, Ebied v Hopkins, Church Comrs for England v Baines [1998] 1 All ER 657 at 665, [1998] QB 638 at 650 this court observed that the line of authority to which Lord Wilberforce there referred began with the Epsom case.

[23] The 1915 Act was replaced by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act 1920. By s 12(2) it was again provided that the Act applied to d premises 'let as a separate dwelling'. But Parliament expressly endorsed the construction favoured in the Epsom case by including in the subsection a proviso that:

> '(ii) the application of this Act to any house or part of a house shall not be excluded by reason only that part of the premises is used as a shop or office e or for business, trade or professional purposes; . . .'

This second proviso to s 12(2) of the 1920 Act, repeated in almost identical terms in s 3(3) of a supplementary enactment, namely the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act 1939, led to a confident continuation of the line of authority which favoured the generous construction, begun in the Epsom case, of the phrase f 'let as a dwelling' so as to cover a tenancy for mixed residential and business purposes ('for mixed purposes'). The line continued through, for example, the decisions of this court in Hicks v Snook (1928) 27 LGR 175, in R v Brighton and Area Rent Tribunal, ex p Slaughter [1954] 1 All ER 423, [1954] 1 QB 446 and in British Land Co Ltd v Herbert Silver (Menswear) Ltd [1958] 1 All ER 833, [1958] 1 QB 530.

g [24] I have explained at [15.4], above that, when the 1954 Act was enacted in order, in Pt II, to provide security of tenure for business tenants, the definition in s 23(1) of the tenancy to which Pt II applied was wide enough to cover a tenancy for mixed purposes (provided that there was continued occupation for business use). For three years, however, premises 'let as a dwelling' were precluded by s 43(1)(c) of the 1954 Act from falling under the protection of that h Act and remained under that of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts. Then, however, came the Rent Act 1957, which removed the protection of these Acts from a large number of residential lettings above a modest rateable value. From then onwards a letting of premises above the specified value for mixed purposes (provided that there was continued occupation for business use) fell j under the protection of the 1954 Act: see s 11(7) of, and para 11 of Sch 4 to, the 1957 Act. A letting of premises below that value for mixed purposes (provided that there was continued occupation for business use) was ultimately also brought under the protection of the 1954 Act by s 64(2) of the Housing Act 1980. Even when, in the interim, the 1965 Act had reversed much of the effect of the 1957 Act by establishing a regime of regulated tenancies, it had barred tenancies which fell under the protection of the 1954 Act from falling into the new regime:

see s 1(3). It had also excised both the second proviso to s 12(2) of the 1920 Act and s 3(3) of the 1939 Act: see paras 1(1) and 3 of Sch 1.

[25] Thus it has been clear since 1957 that a tenancy for mixed purposes falls under the protection of the 1954 Act, provided that there is continued occupation for business use. For the purpose of discerning whether such a tenancy was protected and if so by what regime, it thus ordinarily became irrelevant to ask whether the premises were 'let as a dwelling'. So, after 38 years, the line of authority begun in the Epsom case largely came to an end. Does it follow however that, when, in other contexts and of course in particular in s 31 of the 1965 Act and also in s 32 thereof, Parliament used the phrase 'let as a dwelling', it did not intend the generous construction favoured by that line of authority to apply to it?

[26] Sir Ashley Bramall, a distinguished commentator in the field, wrote the notes to the Rent Act 1965 upon its publication in Current Law Statutes. In relation to s 32 he noted that '[t]here would seem to be no reason why the rules which have been established under the earlier Rent Acts for construing [the phrase "let as a dwelling"] should not apply to this section'; and he cited the case of Ex p Slaughter. In relation to s 31 he wrote:

> 'This section deals with the special case of enforcement of the right of re-entry under a lease. The lease has not come to an end before the right is enforced, so that s.32 has no application, but once the eviction has started it cannot be said that the tenant, or anyone claiming under him, occupies under the contract of tenancy so as to bring him within the definition of "residential occupier" in s.30 (5). Special provision is therefore required . . . It is to be observed that the section applies to ["statutorily protected"] tenancies . . . cf. s. 32).'

By the last sentence, Sir Ashley thus put forward the s 8 argument.

[27] Mr Julian Farrand, also a distinguished commentator in the field, wrote the notes to the 1977 Act upon its publication in Current Law Statutes. In relation to the phrase 'let as a dwelling' in s 2, he referred to his notes in the same volume to s 1 of the Rent Act 1977, which was enacted on the same day as was the 1977 Act. There he cited then recently reaffirmed authority in this court to the effect that it included premises used for business purposes as well as for a dwelling.

[28] Between 1978 and 1988 followed a quartet of authorities of this court which, as Mr Luba concedes, present difficulties for his construction. Directly or indirectly they each addressed a situation, far removed from the present, in which there had been a letting for mixed purposes, following which the tenant had ceased business use and argued that the cessation enabled him to invoke either the more benign protection of the Rent Act 1977 or the right to buy under the Housing Act 1985. In the quartet the court unsurprisingly rejected such an argument; but, unfortunately for Mr Luba, it did so by suggesting that the premises had not been 'let as a dwelling'.

[29.1] The first case is Cheryl Investments Ltd v Saldanha, Royal Life Saving Society v Page [1979] 1 All ER 5, [1978] 1 WLR 1329. The facts did not reflect the situation to which I have just referred; but, in what he called his fourth illustration, Lord Denning MR chose to address it ([1979] 1 All ER 5 at 10, [1978] 1 WLR 1329 at 1334). He said that in that situation the tenant's argument would fail 'because [the premises were] never let to him as a separate dwelling'.

[29.2] The second case is Pulleng v Curran (1980) 44 P&CR 58. In the event the tenant failed to establish that his business use had ceased and so his argument fell at the first hurdle. But, in passages later construed not to be obiter but to represent a second ground for the dismissal of his appeal, all three members of the court proceeded to reject his argument that, if his business use had ceased, he was protected by the Rent Act 1977. Although in their judgments Sir George Baker and Cumming-Bruce LJ in my view steered clear of casting their conclusion on the basis that the premises had not been let as a dwelling, Stephenson LJ (at 74) adopted that basis; and (at 75) he supported it by reference to the dictum of Lord Denning MR in the case of Cheryl Investments.

[29.3] The third case is Wagle v Trustees of Henry Smith's Charity Kensington Estate [1990] 1 QB 42, [1989] 2 WLR 669. Here the business use had undeniably ceased and the court held that the tenants did not thereby become protected under the Rent Act 1977. Counsel for the tenants had submitted that there was a long line of authority which precluded the court from holding that the premises were not 'let as a dwelling'. He had also submitted that the facts that in 1920 and 1939 Parliament had endorsed the conclusion that a letting for mixed purposes enjoyed the protection of the Rent etc Acts, that in 1957 it had changed the protection of such a letting to the 1954 Act and that in 1965 it had declined to reverse the change and had excised the provisions in the Acts of 1920 and 1939 were all irrelevant to the construction of the phrase when the need for it still arose. But the submission was rejected. Dillon LJ held ([1990] 1 QB 42 at 51, [1989] 2 WLR 669 at 676) that in particular Pulleng's case obliged the court to reject it. Taylor LJ ([1990] 1 QB 42 at 53, [1989] 2 WLR 669 at 678) said that he saw some force in the submission. But he cited the dictum of Lord Denning MR in the case of Cheryl Investments; held that the effect of the statutory excision was that the meaning of the phrase 'let as a separate dwelling' had contracted and no longer included a tenancy for mixed purposes; and stated that the court was in any event bound to accept that view. Sir John Megaw agreed with both judgments.

[29.4] The fourth case is Webb v Barnet London BC (1988) 21 HLR 228, decided by the court only weeks after its decision in the case of Wagle. The letting for mixed purposes was of premises owned by the local authority and the tenant, who had ceased business use of the premises, wished to exercise the right to buy them under the 1985 Act. For that purpose he needed to establish that he had a secure tenancy and thus, for the purpose of s 79(1) of the 1985 Act, that the premises were 'let as a . . . dwelling'. In giving the substantive judgment Taylor LJ again relied heavily on the excision by the 1965 Act of the provisions in the Acts of 1920 and 1939, which he described as excision of the 'statutory extension' in those Acts of the phrase 'let as a dwelling'. Then, by reference in particular to the cases of Cheryl Investments, Pulleng and Wagle, he proceeded to explain why the court was bound to hold that the premises were not 'let as a . . . dwelling'.

[30] Mr Luba reserves the right to complain elsewhere, were it helpful to his argument for him to do so, that in the above quartet of cases this court fell into error. But he accepts that we are bound by the decisions and that, had his client voluntarily ceased business use of the premises, we could not hold him to be an assured tenant under s 1 of the Housing Act 1988 (which applies to premises 'let as a . . . dwelling'). He submits, however, that construction of s 2 of the 1977 Act, which occupies an entirely different area of the law, should be unaffected by them; that its construction should indeed be informed by the line of authority which began with the Epsom case [1919] WN 170; and that a more recent decision of this court, namely the Wellcome Trust case [1998] 1 All ER 657, [1998] QB 638, shows that, at least in a third area of the law, the line of authority remains valid.

[31] In the Wellcome Trust case there was a tenancy for mixed purposes and, with the landlord's permission, the tenant sublet one of the residential flats within the premises to the defendant, who enjoyed protection under the Rent Act 1977. The question was whether, when the tenant surrendered his tenancy of the premises, the defendant enjoyed protection under the Rent Act 1977 against the claimant freeholder. The answer depended upon whether, within the meaning of s 137(3) of the Rent Act 1977, the defendant's flat formed 'part of premises which have been let as a whole on a superior tenancy but do not constitute a dwelling-house let on a statutorily protected tenancy'. In Maunsell v Olins [1975] 1 All ER 16, [1975] AC 373 the House of Lords had held by a majority that, in that context, the word 'premises' meant dwelling-houses or premises treated as dwelling houses for the purposes of the Rent Acts pursuant to the line of authority which began with the Epsom case. In the Wellcome Trust case, by one valuable judgment, this court explained that, in accordance with that line of authority, the premises had been let to the tenant 'as a dwelling' and that accordingly the defendant enjoyed protection against the claimant under the Rent Act 1977. Although the case of Webb was cited to it, the court in the Wellcome Trust case was not persuaded of the relevance of the excision in 1965 of the provisions in the Acts of 1920 and 1939. It said:

> 'It does not follow that by omitting the [provisions] Parliament produced the opposite result. The effect of the omission is to bring premises, part of which are used for business purposes, within the scope of the 1954 Act. But such premises may still essentially remain a dwelling house.' (See [1998] 1 All ER 657 at 672, [1998] QB 638 at 657.)

[32.1] I come to the decision of this court in National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty v Knipe [1997] 4 All ER 627, [1998] 1 WLR 230. It was by reference to this authority that in the present case the judge held that the premises were not 'let as a dwelling' for the purpose of s 2 of the 1977 Act; and it is by reference thereto that Mr Weekes submits that we are required to dismiss the appeal.

[32.2] In the National Trust case the tenancy was of what was described in the agreement as an agricultural holding; and it was agreed to be protected by the Agricultural Holdings Act 1986. The holding comprised 350 acres of pasture, together with two farmhouses. The tenants covenanted not to use the holding for any purpose other than agriculture, to farm it in accordance with the rules of good husbandry and personally to reside in the farmhouses. They fell into arrears of rent; and, having complied with the pre-requisites set by the 1986 Act, the landlords served a notice to quit. In the ensuing action for possession the tenants contended that the notice was invalid in that, contrary to s 5 of the 1977 Act, it had omitted material required to be included by regulations made pursuant thereto. The omitted material was apparently of no practical interest to the tenant of an agricultural holding. The landlords responded that, in that the premises had not been 'let . . . as a dwelling', s 5 did not apply. The tenants' contention prevailed in the county court but the landlords' appeal was allowed.

[32.3] In the National Trust case the primary submission on behalf of the tenants to this court was the s 8 argument, suitably adapted. The fourth of the eight types of tenancy specified in s 8 of the 1977 Act as comprised in the phrase 'statutorily protected tenancy', set out at (d), is 'a tenancy of an agricultural holding within the meaning of the [1986 Act].' The argument of the tenants was therefore that: (a) Parliament thought it necessary by s 8 specifically to exclude a tenancy of an agricultural holding from the ambit of s 3; (b) if the phrase 'let as a dwelling' in s 3 had not included a tenancy of an agricultural holding upon which there was a dwelling-house intended for residential use, the exclusion would have been unnecessary; (c) thus the phrase in s 3 included such a tenancy; (d) the phrase bore an identical meaning in all sections of the Act in which it appeared, namely ss 2, 3 and 5; (e) thus in s 5 the phrase included such a tenancy; and (f) in that it was common ground that s 8 did not apply to s 5, such a tenancy was not thereby excluded from the ambit of s 5.

[32.4] Pill LJ noted ([1997] 4 All ER 627 at 633, [1998] 1 WLR 230 at 236) that leading counsel for the landlords was inclined to acknowledge not only the difficulty presented by the s 8 argument on behalf of the tenants but also its inexorable logic. Judge LJ ([1997] 4 All ER 627 at 635, [1998] 1 WLR 230 at 238), who gave the only other substantive judgment, specifically associated himself with the fourth limb of the argument by saying that 'unnecessary confusion would be caused unless each term in the 1977 Act is given the same meaning wherever it appears'; and he referred ([1997] 4 All ER 627 at 636, [1998] 1 WLR 230 at 239) to the apparent logic of the argument.

[32.5] Nevertheless the unanimous conclusion of the court was that the premises which were the subject of the tenancy were not 'let . . . as a dwelling' for the purpose of s 5. Pill LJ said:

> '. . . the "premises" are the subject matter of the letting, that is the entire acreage, but they are let as an agricultural holding and not as a dwelling. The subject matter of the letting includes a dwelling but I cannot read the section as if it used the expression "premises which include a dwelling" or "any dwelling house let as a part of premises". The difficulty, which I share, in understanding why Parliament saw the need to make specific reference to agricultural holdings in s 3 of the Act dealing with prohibition of eviction without due process of law, does not lead me to the conclusion that agricultural holdings are included in s 5.' (See [1997] 4 All ER 627 at 633–634, [1998] 1 WLR 230 at 237.)

For his part, Judge LJ: (a) pointed out ([1997] 4 All ER 627 at 636, [1998] 1 WLR 230 at 239) that, prior to the Act of 1977, the precursor to s 5 was contained in an Act (the 1957 Act) different from the Act (the 1965 Act) which contained the precursors to ss 3 and 8, with the result that the s 8 argument would not then have been available; (b) referred ([1997] 4 All ER 627 at 636–637, [1998] 1 WLR 230 at 239 – 240) to purportedly comprehensive provisions relating to notices to quit agricultural holdings contained in a statute enacted only four months prior to enactment of the 1977 Act; (c) concluded ([1997] 4 All ER 627 at 637, [1998] 1 WLR 230 at 241) that, in construing the phrase 'let as a dwelling', it was crucially important to focus on the specific statutory provision in which it was contained; (d) found ([1997] 4 All ER 627 at 639–640, [1998] 1 WLR 230 at 243) that the tenancy was, as the agreement stated, an agricultural tenancy, as defined by the 1986 Act; (e) held ([1997] 4 All ER 627 at 639, [1998] 1 WLR 230 at 243) that s 5 did not, as it might have done, clearly include agricultural tenancies and should not be treated as if it did so; and (f) held ([1997] 4 All ER 627 at 640, [1998] 1 WLR 230 at 243) that the farmhouses were part of the agricultural holding and that their presence did not mean that the premises were 'let . . . as a dwelling'.

[33.1] There are three other recent statutory provisions which deserve sideways reference.

[33.2] Section 81 of the Housing Act 1996 forbids exercise of a right of forfeiture for a tenant's failure to pay a service charge which has been neither agreed nor already adjudged to be payable. By s 81(1) the provision applies to 'premises let as a dwelling'; and s 81(4) provides that the phrase does not include premises let on a tenancy to which Pt II of the 1954 Act applies.

[33.3] Section 167 of the Commonhold and Leasehold Reform Act 2002 forbids exercise of a right of forfeiture for failure on the part of a tenant under a long lease to pay—in the shorthand words of the section's title—'[a] small amount for [a] short period', whether in respect of rent or otherwise. By s 167(1) the provision applies to a 'long lease of a dwelling'; and s 167(4) provides that the phrase does not include a tenancy to which Pt II of the 1954 Act applies.

[33.4] Section 168 of the 2002 Act forbids the landlord under a long lease to serve a forfeiture notice, set by s 146(1) of the 1925 Act as a pre-condition of exercise of a right of forfeiture, unless the breach specified therein has been either admitted or already adjudged to have occurred. By s 168(1), analogous to s 167(1), the provision applies to a 'long lease of a dwelling'; and s 169(4), analogous to s 167(4), provides that the phrase does not include a tenancy to which Pt II of the 1954 Act applies.

[33.5] Each of the three provisions has a dual relevance to the present issue. Their first relevance is that they each prompt an argument analogous to the s 8 argument. The argument is that, in its separate consideration of three recent provisions, Parliament has taken the view that, unless it were specifically to provide for the exclusion of tenancies for mixed purposes, the phrases 'let as a dwelling' and 'lease of a dwelling' would be wide enough to include them and would therefore have an effect which, in relation to those provisions, it did not intend. Their second relevance is that each represents yet a further step, beyond those taken by Parliament in providing, ever since the Conveyancing Act 1881, for relief from forfeiture and in enacting what became s 2 of the 1977 Act, towards substantial circumscription, albeit in specified circumstances, of the facility for a tenant to find himself deprived of his home by forfeiture: the policy of further reining in the exercise of contractual rights of forfeiture is evident.

CONCLUSION

[34] I conclude that the phrase 'let as a dwelling' in s 2 of the 1977 Act means 'let wholly or partly as a dwelling' and so applies to premises which are let for mixed residential and business purposes. I am convinced that, when its precursor was introduced as s 31 of the 1965 Act, such was understood to be the established meaning of the phrase, contained, as it had been, in a series of prior enactments and so construed, as it had been, in a series of judgments of this court. If such is what the phrase then meant in s 31 of the 1965 Act, such is what it must now mean in s 2 of the 1977 Act: for the words are identical and lie on the page without any later qualification, direct or indirect. Their meaning cannot in my view have fluctuated with the tides which have ebbed and flowed in this court in relation to the meaning of the phrase in other contexts.

[35] This view of the meaning of the phrase in s 2 of the 1977 Act is strongly supported by the s 8 argument, which I hold to be unanswerable. The exercise of statutory construction encourages the attribution to each word, and all the more to each provision, of a reasonable value and discourages the dismissal of any such word or provision as idle surplusage. The inclusion of a tenancy for mixed purposes in s 8 of the 1977 Act, as in the other three provisions referred to in [33] above, is not idly surplus: its purpose is to exclude such a tenancy from s 3 of the 1977 Act because otherwise the phrase 'let as a dwelling' would have included such a tenancy in it. It is the clearest window into the meaning of the phrase at least in s 3 and, by reference, in s 2.

[36] Whereas, however, s 3 of the 1977 Act may be regarded as a full brother of s 2, s 5 is no relation to the brothers at all: it simply happens to inhabit the same statute, albeit a different part. Mr Weekes persuaded the judge first to extract from the National Trust case [1997] 4 All ER 627, [1998] 1 WLR 230 the conclusion of Judge LJ, set out at [32.4], above, that the phrase 'let as a dwelling' should bear the same meaning in ss 2, 3 and 5 and then to marry it with the conclusion of Pill LJ, set out at [32.5], above, that s 5 did not refer to the letting of 'premises which include a dwelling'. But s 2 did not fall for any direct consideration in that case; its different genesis was irrelevant; and, although my respect for the views of the members of that court goes without saying, it seems to me, in the light of the analysis of the genealogy of the whole Act set out above, that it would be almost absurd that dicta in the National Trust case should weigh significantly in the construction of s 2, and still less should determine it. Unlike the letting in the present case, which was expressly for the mixed purposes apt to 'shop premises and residential accommodation', the letting in the National Trust case was of what was described in the agreement as an agricultural holding. I believe that the essence of that decision is simple, namely that the premises were not let as a dwelling because they were let as an agricultural holding. But if that analysis, instead of being simple, were to be simplistic, then in my view we would need, albeit with regret, to tolerate a difference in the meaning of the phrase 'let as a dwelling' in s 5, on the one hand, and in ss 2 and 3, on the other.

[37] It is high time for me to stand back and to ask a basic question: is there any reason to suppose that, in enacting s 2 of the 1977 Act and its precursor, Parliament intended, notwithstanding what I consider to be the likely meaning of the words which it chose, that tenants who hold tenancies for mixed purposes should not also enjoy the protection which on any view it was affording to purely residential tenants? I suggest that three main considerations underlie the limited prohibition in s 2 against what, in Billson v Residential Apartments Ltd [1992] 1 All ER 141 at 146, [1992] 1 AC 494 at 536, Lord Templeman described as the 'dubious and dangerous' method of enforcing a right of forfeiture by re-entry without due process of law: (a) A tenant should not be at risk of returning home to discover that, unbeknown to him, he and his family have been locked out and are homeless. If they are to be evicted, the eviction should be conducted in an orderly fashion, upon at least some prior notice, by officers subject to court direction. (b) If there is to be an issue as to whether the landlord is entitled to forfeiture under the terms of the tenancy, it is preferable, particularly in relation to a home, for the court to determine it in advance of eviction rather than in proceedings brought by the tenant for an injunction and damages in the wake of it or in criminal proceedings against the landlord under s 1 of the 1977 Act. (c) If there is to be an issue as to whether the tenant is entitled to relief against forfeiture pursuant to s 146(2) of the 1925 Act, it is, again, preferable, particularly in relation to a home, for the court to determine it in advance of eviction rather than in its wake. I see no reason why these considerations should not apply to a tenant for whom the premises represent not only his home but also his place of business.

HUMAN RIGHTS

[38] My suggested interpretation of s 2 of the 1977 Act, namely that it applies to premises let to a tenant for mixed residential and business purposes, has been reached for the reasons set out above, unrelated to his human rights. But reference to his human rights fortifies the interpretation.

[39] So far as it is possible to do so, s 2 must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the tenant's rights under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998): s 3 of the 1998 Act. There can be no doubt that the present issue engages the tenant's right to respect for his private life and for his home pursuant to art 8(1) of the convention and that the exercise by the landlords of their purported right of re-entry interfered with his right. Article 8(2) of course provides that:

> 'There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right [under art 8(1)] except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society . . . for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.'

[40] In this regard counsel have made brief oral submissions to us on the case of Connors v UK (2004) 16 BHRC 639; and, aware that only days after the hearing before us the House of Lords would in its judgment upon Lambeth London BC v Kay, Leeds City Council v Price [2006] UKHL 10, [2006] 4 All ER 128, [2006] 2 WLR 570 survey the impact of the case of Connors upon entitlement to possession of a person's home in accordance with domestic principles of law, we have allowed counsel to make written submissions upon any relevant effect of the judgment following publication.

[41] There is no doubt that the cases both of Connors v UK and of Kay v Lambeth London BC lie at a considerable distance from the present case. They address the question whether rights under art 8 represent a reservoir of entitlement upon which the occupier of a home can draw in order to resist an order for possession when domestic law leaves him defenceless. Nevertheless in my view they assist performance in the present case of our obligation under s 3 of the 1998 Act to strive for compatible interpretation. For in the former the European Court stressed—and in the latter the House accepted—that, in considering whether interference with rights of the occupier under art 8(1) is 'necessary in a democratic society' for the protection of the rights of the landowner, the court has to consider whether the interference is proportionate to that aim; and that the absence of procedural safeguards for the occupier may well lead to a conclusion that it is not proportionate.

[42] In the case of Connors v UK enforcement of the right given to local authorities under United Kingdom domestic law to evict a gipsy from a designated site upon termination of his licence by a bare notice to quit was held by the European Court to be incompatible with his rights under art 8. The court defined ((2004) 16 BHRC 639 at 663 (para 85)) the central issue as whether the domestic legal framework provided sufficient procedural protection for his rights. And (at 666 (para 94)) it concluded that:

'The power to evict without the burden of giving reasons liable to be examined as to their merits by an independent tribunal has not been convincingly shown to respond to any specific goal . . .'

It was thus held to have been insufficient that there had been court proceedings of a formal character in which the local authority's right to possession had been endorsed; for the adequacy of the reasons behind its election to terminate the applicant's licence had never been established.

[43] That such is the foundation (or a major part of it) of the judgment in the case of Connors v UK is confirmed in the speeches in the case of Lambeth London BC v Kay, in particular in those of Lord Hope of Craighead (at [67]) and of Lord Scott of Foscote (at [160] and [172]).

[44] From the case of Connors v UK I confidently derive the following: that an interpretation of s 2 of the 1977 Act which prohibits a landlord from exercising—otherwise than by proceedings in court—an alleged right of re-entry upon premises let for use as a dwelling as well as for business purposes is an interpretation which would be compatible with the tenant's rights under art 8; and, by contrast, that the opposite interpretation of it would be incompatible with them.

[45] I should add that Mr Weekes complains that there is a serious fault in this line of argument, namely that it takes no account of the fact that art 8(2) circumscribes interferences with rights under art 8(1) on the part only of a 'public authority' rather than of private landlords such as his clients. In my view, however, his point does not affect the interpretative obligation under s 3 of the 1998 Act. Had s 2 of the 1977 Act not borne the meaning which I ascribe to it, a question might have arisen as to whether the positive obligations on public authorities to protect citizens from infringements of their rights under art 8 were such as to oblige the state to legislate against enforcement by private landlords of contractual rights of re-entry of premises let for mixed purposes otherwise than by proceedings in court. My conclusion, however, is that happily such legislation is already in place.

THE ANSWER

[46] My answer to the question in [1], above, is yes.

ORDERS

[47] I would allow the appeal and set aside the order for possession.

SIR PETER GIBSON.

[48] I agree that this appeal should be allowed. As we are differing from the judge and in deference to the careful arguments of counsel and because of the importance of the question raised on the appeal, I add a few words of my own. I adopt the definitions used by Wilson LJ.

[49] In Pulleng v Curran (1980) 44 P&CR 58 at 65 Sir George Baker said of tenanted premises similar to those which are the subject of this appeal: 'There must be tens of thousands of similar leases where the person running the business lives above the shop.' That must have been as true in 1977 when the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 was passed as it was in 1965 when the Rent Act 1965, containing the predecessor provisions to ss 2 and 3 of the 1977 Act, was passed and I do not doubt that it continues to be true today. Every lease contains a forfeiture clause such as that in cl 6(1) of the lease in the instant case. I share Wilson LJ's surprise that the question which has arisen in this case has not previously been answered directly by an authoritative decision on s 2 of the 1977 Act.

[50] Section 2 directs attention, as Mr Weekes pointed out, to the terms of the tenancy and the use of the premises to be made by the tenant: are demised premises 'let as a dwelling'? If one looks at the statutory language, one can readily see indications pointing in two different directions. One notes that in s 2 itself, whereas the opening words are 'Where any premises are let as a dwelling', the concluding words are 'the premises or part of them', and that suggests that the whole of the premises must be let as a dwelling. Against that can be set the s 8 argument as described by Wilson LJ and in particular the noticeable absence from s 2, in contrast with s 3, of the exclusion of a statutorily protected tenancy, including a business tenancy subject to Pt II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954.

[51] It is ordinarily both unnecessary and undesirable to construe a consolidation Act by reference to statutory antecedents, but it is permissible to do so in a case where the consolidation Act is unclear (Farrell v Alexander [1976] 2 All ER 721, [1977] AC 59). The present is such a case.

[52] Mr Weekes submitted that, if anything, the legislative history of ss 2, 3 and 5 helped the landlords. Mr Luba QC has persuaded me that the opposite is true. I note in particular that ss 2 and 3 of the 1977 Act derive from ss 31 and 32 of the 1965 Act whereas s 5 derives from a different source, the Rent Act 1957. I am also persuaded that in 1965 the words 'let as a dwelling' had an established meaning through a long line of authority developed in the context of the statutory phrase 'let as a separate dwelling' in the Rent and Mortgage Restrictions Acts. The inclusion of the word 'separate' in those Acts must have made it more difficult for the courts to find that a letting for mixed purposes was a letting as a separate dwelling, but from Epsom Grand Stand Association Ltd v Clarke [1919] WN 170 onwards until the time of the enactment of the 1965 Act such a letting was held to be a letting as a separate dwelling. Parliament must be taken to have been aware of those decisions when enacting the predecessors of ss 2 and 3 of the 1977 Act.

[53] I respectfully agree with the comments of Wilson LJ on what he has called the quartet of cases between 1978 and 1988. In this context the decision of this court in Wellcome Trust Ltd v Hamad, Ebied v Hopkins, Church Comrs for England v Baines [1998] 1 All ER 657, [1998] QB 638 is of particular importance, because the quartet of cases were among those cited to the court. Nevertheless this court did not accept the suggestion of Dillon LJ in Wagle v Trustees of Henry Smith's Charity Kensington Estate [1990] 1 QB 42 at 48, [1989] 2 WLR 669 at 673 that the Epsom case could not really carry much authority ([1998] 1 All ER 657 at 665, [1998] QB 638 at 650). On the contrary, this court reaffirmed the line of authority commencing with the Epsom case.

[54] The decision of this court in National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty v Knipe [1997] 4 All ER 627, [1998] 1 WLR 230 formed the basis of the judge's decision in the present case and was heavily relied on by Mr Weekes before us. Again I respectfully agree with Wilson LJ's comments on that case. The judge did not take sufficient note of the fact that that case concerned a letting of premises (over 350 acres including farmhouses) as an agricultural holding, whereas by virtue of the user covenant in cl 3(13) of the lease in the present case unquestionably the letting of the upper floor of the premises was as a dwelling; nor did he take sufficient note of the fact that the National Trust case was a decision on s 5 in Pt II of the 1977 Act whereas the present case is concerned with s 2 in Pt I of that Act. Whilst I have some sympathy with the judge who not surprisingly followed dicta of this court, I respectfully disagree with his conclusion.

[55] Mr Luba disclaimed any defence based on human rights because no such defence was pleaded below and counsel then appearing for the tenant was not permitted to develop one in argument at trial. But Mr Luba suggested that the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act) assisted on the interpretation of s 2 and supported the tenant's submission. I agree.

[56] For these as well as the reasons given by Wilson LJ I too would allow this appeal and make the order he suggests.

Appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Scottish & Newcastle plc v Raguz

[2006] EWHC 821 (Ch)

CHANCERY DIVISION

HART J

30, 31 JANUARY, 1–3, 6–9 FEBRUARY, 11 APRIL 2006

Landlord and tenant – Assignment of lease – Implied covenant – Indemnity for unpaid rent – Reversioner claiming rent from original tenant after current tenant defaulting – Original tenant claiming under implied covenant – Whether original tenant liable for rent – Whether notice of liability valid – Whether notice served within specified period of date when rent became due – Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 17(2).

The claimant was the original tenant of two underleases. It assigned the underleases to the defendant. By virtue of the Land Registration Act 1925 the assignments contained an implied covenant by the defendant that he and his successors would pay the rent reserved by the underleases, and comply with the covenants and conditions contained them, and would indemnify the claimant in the event of breach. By March 1992 the underleases had become vested in a company, H, and the reversion in another company, N. H defaulted on payment of rent in June 1999 and administrative receivers were appointed. The accrued liability of H in respect of rent was not then known as the levels of rent had been subject to rent review since 1995, in the case of the first underlease, and since 1996, in the case of the second. In 2001 N first served statutory demands on the claimant for the sums which it claimed then to be owing in respect of rent. The claimant paid the sums claimed and brought proceedings against the defendant on the indemnity covenant. Section 17[a] of the Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995 applied as the underleases had been granted before 1 January 1996. Under that section, where a person (the former tenant) was as a result of an assignment no longer a tenant under a tenancy but, inter alia, remained bound by a covenant of the tenancy under which any fixed charge was payable, the former tenant was not to be liable under that covenant to pay any amount unless, within the period of six months beginning with the date when the fixed charge became due, the landlord served on the former tenant a notice informing him that the charge was then due and that the landlord intended to recover from the former tenant such amount as was specified in the notice. A 'fixed charge' included rent. Where a notice had been served under s 17(2) the amount the former tenant was liable to pay was not to exceed the amount specified unless his liability was subsequently determined to be for a greater amount, the notice informed him of that possibility, and within the period of three months beginning with the date of the determination, the landlord served a further notice informing the original tenant that the landlord intended to recover that greater amount. N had served the claimant with a number of s 17(2) notices, including, on 8 March 2001, in relation to the first underlease, a notice specifying a sum of additional rent for the period 18 April 1995 to 28 September 2000 pursuant to a rent review concluded on 23 September 2000 (the March notice), and on 20 July 2001, in relation to the second underlease, a notice specifying a sum of additional rent for the period 25 December 1996 to 28 September 2001 pursuant to a rent review agreed on a Section 17, so far as material, is set out at [20], below

10 July 2001 (the July notice). The defendant contended, inter alia, on the basis that its indemnity extended only to rent not paid by H and for which the claimant had itself been liable, that the claimant had not been liable to N in relation, inter alia, to the sums claimed under the March notice and the July notice, as they had not been served within the period of six months of the charge becoming due. The claimant contended that the 'date when the charge becomes due' in s 17(2) of the 1995 Act referred to when the charge became 'demandable', which where rent had not yet become demandable, being subject to an unresolved process of review, meant that a landlord did not need to serve a notice under s 17(2) in order to preserve the original tenant's liability.

Held – On the true construction of s 17 of the 1995 Act subsequently determined rent was due at the date of its accrual as a liability, not at the date of its demandability. Section 17(2) was designed to relieve a former tenant of liability in respect of any fixed charge unless the landlord had taken a purely formal step of notification to preserve the former tenant's liability. No hardship to the landlord resulted. In the case of a long drawn out process of rent review he could protect himself against the possibility of the current tenant proving in due course unable to meet his liability by serving protective notices on the original tenant. The original tenant then got the requisite early warning of what the future might hold. Accordingly, in the instant case, the March notice and the July notice had been ineffective to render the claimant liable in respect of those sums of additional rent specified in them (see [24], [31], [34]–[36], below).

Notes

For implied indemnity covenants on transfers of pre-1996 leases, see 26 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2004 reissue) para 974, and for the liability of original tenant for rent, see 27(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 256 and Supp to 27(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 256.

For the Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995, s 17 , see 23 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2004 reissue) 1192.

Cases referred to in judgment

Allied London Investments Ltd v Hambro Life Assurance Ltd [1984] 1 EGLR 62.

Bank of India v Trans Continental Commodity Merchants Ltd [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep 298, CA.

Beanby Estates Ltd v Egg Stores (Stamford Hill) Ltd [2003] EWHC 1252 (Ch), [2004] 3 All ER 184, [2003] 1 WLR 2064.

Dawson v Lawes (1854) 23 LJ Ch 434, 69 ER 119.

Ikerigi Cia Naviera SA v Palmer, Global Transeas Corp v Palmer, The Wondrous [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep 400; affd [1992] 2 Lloyd's Rep 566, CA.

Jervis v Harris [1996] 1 All ER 303, [1996] Ch 195, [1996] 2 WLR 220, CA.

MacTaggart v Watson (1835) 3 Cl & Fin 525, 6 ER 1534, HL.

Scottish & Newcastle plc v Raguz [2003] EWCA Civ 1070, [2004] L & TR 11.

Socomex Ltd v Banque Bruxelles Lambert SA [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep 156.

South Tottenham Land Securities Ltd v R & A Millett (Shops) Ltd [1984] 1 All ER 614, [1984] 1 WLR 710, CA.

United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley BC [1977] 2 All ER 62, [1978] AC 904, [1977] 2 WLR 806, HL.

Webber (CA) (Transport) Ltd v Railtrack plc [2003] EWCA Civ 1167, [2004] 3 All ER 202, [2004] 1 WLR 320.

Claim

The claimant Scottish & Newcastle plc brought proceedings for the payment of the sum of £346,313·32 (later amended by the addition of £245,714·55) and for declaratory relief against the defendant Zeljko Stephen Raguz on an indemnity covenant contained in an assignment of underleases dated 17 March 1967 and 7 March 1969 of hotel premises in Leicester by the claimant to the defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Christopher Stoner (instructed by Eversheds LLP, Newcastle upon Tyne) for the claimant.

Edward Bannister QC and Marion Lonsdale (instructed by LHP Law LLP, Redditch) for the defendant.

Cur adv vult

11 April 2006. The following judgment was delivered.

HART J.

[1] This action concerns two underleases dated respectively 17 March 1967 (the 1967 lease) and 7 March 1969 (the 1969 lease) whereby Colston Property Holdings Ltd demised to the claimant hotel premises in Leicester for a term of years expiring on 22 March 2062. By each underlease the claimant covenanted to pay rent in advance on the usual quarter days, the rent being reviewable every 14 years of the term.

[2] The claimant assigned the underleases to the defendant on 29 September 1982 for a consideration of £1. At the same time the hotel business then carried on at the premises by the claimant was assigned to a company in which the defendant was interested, Impney Hotel Properties Ltd. The assignments of the underleases contained, by virtue of s 24 of the Land Registration Act 1925, a covenant by the defendant that he and his successors would pay the rent reserved by, and comply with the covenants and conditions contained in, the underleases and would indemnify the claimant in the event of breach (the s 24 indemnity). The precise terms of that covenant are examined in more detail below.

[3] Not long afterwards, it would seem in about March 1983 but the defendant remembers it somewhat differently, the defendant assigned the underleases to a company called Villafield Ltd, which in turn gave covenants for indemnity to the defendant guaranteed by two gentlemen, apparently brothers, called Virani.

[4] By March 1992 the underleases had become vested in a company called Hotel St James Ltd (HSJ). HSJ defaulted on payment of rent in June 1999 and its mortgagees appointed administrative receivers on 6 October 1999, the administrative receivers being a Mr Kinlan and Mr Dattani, partners in the well-known firm of BDO Haywood.

[5] By that time the reversioner to the underleases was National Car Parks Ltd (NCP). Its inability to recover rent from HSJ meant that the claimant, as original underlessees, became a potential target of a claim by NCP for the rent under the lease so long as it remained unpaid. Subject to the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995 the claimant had no answer to that claim.

[6] The amount of NCP's potential claim against the claimant suffered from uncertainty in two respects. First, as regards the past, the accrued liability of HSJ in respect of rent was not known: the level of the passing rent had been the subject of an unresolved process of review since 1995 in the case of the 1967 lease and 1996 in the case of the 1969 lease. The amount of accrued liability in respect of the reviewed rent would only be known when that review process was completed. Secondly, so far as the future was concerned, there was potential liability for the claimant until 2062. The only way of mitigating that potential liability was to find someone who was prepared to take on the liability under the two underleases.

[7] The defendant was similarly on the hook. To the extent that the claimant was made liable for the rents, it could prima facie pass on the liability to him.

[8] An additional feature of this situation, horrid for both claimant and defendant, was that it was in the highest degree unlikely that NCP would resolve matters for both of them by forfeiting the lease. The claimant is a major quoted public company and, from the point of view of any landlord, a 'blue chip' covenant. There are also peculiarities about the premises which can usefully be described at this stage.

[9] The premises demised by the 1967 and 1969 leases comprise the top storey or two of a late 1960s multi-storey car park in what was once, but has ceased to be, the commercial heart of Leicester. Access to the premises under those underleases was by virtue of an easement from ground floor level by lift. There were, in addition, reserved parking spaces for the hotel in the upper storeys of the car park. From an aesthetic, planning or commercial point of view, the vision behind the development, clear and bright-eyed as it may have been in the late 1960s, is difficult to recapture through twenty-first century spectacles which see only the multi-storey car park with, at street level, some down-market commercial premises (a sauna and massage parlour giving some indication of the overall tone). The original conception had no doubt been the creation of a high class hotel (as required by the user covenants) offering easy city centre parking with commanding views over the city. It was originally badged as the Abbey Motor Hotel.

[10] At some point in the history of the premises the access arrangements had been improved by the acquisition of an alternative access at street level through a lobby. The lease of this access (the lobby lease) post-dated the involvement of either the claimant or the defendant but had, by 1999, become integral to the way in which the hotel actually operated. The lobby lease had also expired by that date, and HSJ had only the benefit of a continuing lease under the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954.

[11] What has given rise to the dispute between the parties to this action is the steps which the claimant took in order to protect its own position in the unpleasant situation with which it was faced. In very summary form the claimant's approach was as follows: (i) it decided that the solution was that the administrative receivers should be supported in their attempts to dispose of the underleases as soon as possible to a person who would then assume responsibility for the rent; (ii) it hoped that such a person (the purchaser) would pay a premium to the administrative receivers sufficient to enable HSJ to discharge its liability for any accrued liability in respect of rent; (iii) it was persuaded that those aims were more likely to be achieved if the hotel business kept running while the premises were being marketed; (iv) in the face of a threat by the administrative receivers that they would have to close the business before the purchaser could be found, it agreed to assist the administrative receivers in keeping the business running.

[12] That policy had some merit. The decision to support the administrative receivers was taken in May 2000 (although not formalised until August 2000) and by October 2000, a purchaser had been found at a premium of £200,000 who appeared anxious to complete quickly. This was a company (Skymede Enterprises Ltd) of whom the moving force was a Mr Rizvi. As a result, however, of a chapter of unforeseen events, the sale to Mr Rizvi's company was not completed until 28 February 2003. In the meantime HSJ had paid no rent. On 13 June 2001 NCP had served statutory demands on the claimant for sums totalling £346,313·32 (£323,515·96 under the 1967 lease and £22,797·36 under the 1969 lease) which it claimed then to be owing in respect of rent. The claimant paid that sum to NCP on 5 July 2001.

[13] By 28 February 2003 further rent (and other sums) had accrued due under the leases (including the lobby lease). NCP made it a condition of the assignment that those sums (which included £245,714·55 in respect of rent arrears under the 1967 lease and the 1969 lease) should be paid off. The claimant took steps to ensure that this happened, providing the necessary sums from its own resources.

[14] Those proceedings were commenced on 17 September 2001. As originally formulated they sought payment of the sum of £346,313·32 and declaratory relief as regards future liabilities. By amendment made on 30 January 2006 they were amended by the addition of a claim to the £245,714·55.

[15] A summary judgment application made by the claimants in November 2001 and not determined at first instance until 9 December 2002 yielded the claimant only a limited success. In his judgment dated 9 December 2002, Judge Norris held that a distinction had to be drawn between rent for which the claimant had become liable prior to 3 August 2000 and that which had accrued subsequent to that date. The significance of the date was that it was the date on which the claimant (or more accurately its subsidiary S&N Pubs and Restaurants Ltd (Pubs)) formally entered into the agreement with the administrative receivers which was intended to enable the latter to continue trading the hotel business while the purchaser was being sought (the maintenance agreement). The judge held that the question whether the defendant should be liable to the claimant in respect of rental demanded after that date had to go to trial. But he held that the defendant had no answer to the claim for rent demanded before that date, a sum claimed to be £39,978·08. He rejected the defendant's argument that the s 24 indemnity was in the nature of a guarantee and therefore discharged altogether as a result of the arrangements entered into between the claimant and the administrative receivers. Judgment was therefore given for the £39,978·08 and interest, and directions given for trial of the balance of the claim. That judgment was upheld on appeal: see Scottish & Newcastle plc v Raguz [2003] EWCA Civ 1070, [2004] L & TR 11 (Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, May and Sedley LJJ).

ISSUES

[16] The principal points taken by the defendant are as follows: (i) that the s 24 indemnity extends only to rent not paid by HSJ and for which the claimant was itself liable. Issue is taken as to whether the claimant ever was liable to NCP in relation to any of the sums claimed as a result of the application to the facts of s 17 of the 1995 Act (the s 17 argument). (ii) The fact of entry into the maintenance agreement and the steps taken by the claimant pursuant to it or under its general aegis had the effect of altering the character of the payments made by the claimant so as to take them outside the scope of the s 24 indemnity. These are my own very general words seeking to summarise a number of discrete points made on behalf of the defendant and summarised by Mr Bannister and Miss Lonsdale in their skeleton opening submissions in the proposition that—

'the indemnity cannot be used by the original lessee as cover for a private commercial gamble, where the original lessee in effect takes over control of the current tenant and attempts a speculative venture of his own.'

(iii) As a separate but related point, it was argued that certain of the steps taken by the claimant had had the effect of increasing its liabilities in a manner which would not have occurred had the claimant's intervention not occurred. Those steps allegedly included: (a) embarking on a fruitless exercise of seeking to sell the hotel to a purchaser who wished to use it as an asylum seekers' hostel; (b) deterring the administrative receivers from accepting what would have been an advantageous offer by NCP to settle the 1967 lease rent review rather than having it determined by an independent expert; (c) causing the hotel to be marketed at too high a premium; (d) prompting NCP to serve s 17 notices which would not otherwise have been served. (iv) In relation to the payment on 28 February 2003 it was submitted that this payment fell outside the s 24 indemnity since, on a true analysis, it was not a payment by the claimant to NCP in respect of a liability of the claimant but a payment by the claimant on behalf of HSJ in respect of HSJ's liability.

[17] In addition to those points, some detailed points on the quantum of the claim are raised, turning on the way in which NCP had (or had not) credited HSJ with certain rent deposits which it held. I deal with these at the end of my judgment.

THE SECTION 17 ARGUMENT

[18] It is convenient to take this first since it is a stand-alone legal point which requires little further by way of detailed factual narrative.

[19] At common law the claimant retained a primary liability to pay the rent under the 1967 lease and the 1969 lease until 2062. The fact that it had assigned the leases as long ago as 1982 matters, as Walton J put it in Allied London Investments Ltd v Hambro Life Assurance Ltd [1984] 1 EGLR 62 at 63, 'not one jot or tittle' as regards its contractual liability to the reversioner for the time being.

[20] In relation to tenancies granted after 1 January 1996 that situation no longer obtains: see ss 1(1) and 5 of the 1995 Act. So far as concerns tenancies granted before that date, the matter is governed by s 17 of the 1995 Act which, so far as material, is in the following terms:

'(1) This section applies where a person ("the former tenant") is as a result of an assignment no longer a tenant under a tenancy but . . . (b) (in the case of any tenancy) he remains bound by such a covenant.

(2) The former tenant shall not be liable under . . . the covenant to pay any amount in respect of any fixed charge payable under the covenant unless, within the period of six months beginning with the date when the charge becomes due, the landlord serves on the former tenant a notice informing him—(a) that the charge is now due; and (b) that in respect of the charge the landlord intends to recover from the former tenant such amount as is specified in the notice and (where payable) interest calculated on such basis as is so specified . . .

(4) Where the landlord has duly served a notice under subsection (2) . . . the amount (exclusive of interest) which the former tenant . . . is liable to pay in respect of the fixed charge in question shall not exceed the amount specified in the notice unless—(a) his liability in respect of the charge is subsequently determined to be for a greater amount, (b) the notice informed him of the possibility that that liability would be so determined, and (c) within the period of three months beginning with the date of the determination, the landlord serves on him a further notice informing him that the landlord intends to recover that greater amount from him (plus interest, where payable) . . .

(6) In this section—"fixed charge", in relation to tenancy, means—(a) rent, (b) any service charge as defined by section 18 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985 (the words "of a dwelling" being disregarded for this purpose), and (c) any amount payable under a tenant covenant of the tenancy providing for the payment of a liquidated sum in the event of a failure to comply with any such covenant . . .'

[21] Section 27 of the 1995 Act provides for the form of any notice for the purpose of, inter alia, s 17 to be prescribed by regulations (see s 27(1)). Section 27(3) and (4) provide as follows:

'(3) The regulations shall require any notice served for the purposes of section 17 to include an explanation of the significance of the notice.

(4) If any notice purporting to be served for the purposes of section . . . 17 is not in the prescribed form, or in a form substantially to the same effect, the notice shall not be effective for the purposes of . . . section 17 . . .'

[22] The Landlord and Tenant (Covenants) Act 1995 (Notices) Regulations 1995, SI 1995/2964 prescribe two relevant forms of notice, one (Form 1) for use under s 17(2) and the other (Form 2) for use under s 17(4).

[23] Form 1 contains the following substantive paragraphs:

'3. I/we as landlord[3] hereby give you notice that the fixed charge(s) of which details are set out in the attached Schedule[4] is/are now due and unpaid, and that I/we intend to recover from you the amount(s) specified in the Schedule [and interest from the date and calculated on the basis specified in the Schedule][5]. (see Notes 2 and 3)

4.[6] There is a possibility that your liability in respect of the fixed charge(s) detailed in the Schedule will subsequently be determined to be for a greater amount. (see Note 4)'

Paragraph 3 is footnoted (fn 4) as follows:

'The Schedule must be in writing, and must indicate in relation to each item the date on which it became payable, the amount payable and whether it is rent, service charge or a fixed charge of some other kind (in which case particulars of the nature of the charge should be given). Charges due before 1 January 1996 are deemed to have become due on that date, but the actual date on which they became due should also be stated.'

Paragraph 4 is footnoted (fn 6) as follows:

'Delete this paragraph if not applicable. If applicable (for example, where there is an outstanding rent review or service charge collected on account) a further notice must be served on the former tenant or guarantor within three (3) months beginning with the date on which the greater amount is determined. If only applicable to one or more charge of several, the Schedule should specify which.'

In addition Note 4, as referred to in the text of para 4, is in the following terms:

'4. Change in amount due.—Apart from interest, the landlord is not entitled to recover an amount which is more than he has specified in the notice, with one exception. This is where the amount cannot be finally determined within six months after it is due (for example, if there is dispute concerning an outstanding rent review or if the charge is a service charge collected on account and adjusted following final determination). In such a case, if the amount due is eventually determined to be more than originally notified, the landlord may claim the larger amount if and only if he completes the paragraph giving notice of the possibility that the amount may change, and gives further notice specifying the larger amount within three months of the final determination.'

[24] The problem to which those provisions give rise is, shortly stated, this. Under a typical upwards only rent review provision such as obtained in the present case, the rent capable of being demanded by the landlord will be limited to the unreviewed rent so long as the review process has not been completed. Once, however, that process has been completed the reviewed rent will become payable retrospectively with effect from the review date and can be demanded by the landlord as from the rent day next following the completion of the review process (see South Tottenham Land Securities Ltd v R & A Millett (Shops) Ltd [1984] 1 All ER 614 at 618, [1984] 1 WLR 710 at 715 and United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley BC [1977] 2 All ER 62 at 76, [1978] AC 904 at 935, per Lord Diplock). The question is as to what if anything the landlord needs to do to preserve his ability to claim the reviewed rent retrospectively as against the original tenant. Can he wait until the reviewed rent becomes demandable and then serve a notice in Form 1 within six months of that date identifying the amount of the reviewed rent which has become demandable? Or must he serve a Form 1 notice within six months of the rent day on which the reviewed rent first accrues, and then serve a Form 2 notice within three months of the date on which, having been determined, the reviewed rent becomes demandable?

[25] In posing the question in that way I have used the word 'demandable' in order to avoid the slipperiness of the words 'due' or 'payable'. For this purpose the time at which it is 'demandable' is the time at which the tenant could not resist an immediate claim for its payment as a liquidated sum.

[26] The notices served by NCP in the present case for the most part proceeded on the view that the first of the answers was the correct one. Thus, taking first the notices given under the 1967 lease, the following notices were given to the claimant:

	Date of Notice	Fixed Charges
(1)	11.11.99	Rent for ¼ 24/6/99	£7,108·75
		Rent for ¼ 29/9/99	£7,108·75
		Maintenance charges 29/9/99	£352·77
(2)	16.6.00	Balance of

		Rent for ¼ 25/12/99	£2,979·93
		Rent for ¼ 25/3/00	£7,108·75
(3)*	3.8.00	Rent for ¼ 24/6/00	£7,108·75
(4)	8.3.01	Rent for ¼ 29/9/00	£19,975·00
		'Additional rent for the period 18th April 1995 to 28th September 2000 payable pursuant to a valuation published by Ian Jones FRICS on 23rd September 2000 of'	£279,849·00
(5)	8.3.01	Rent for ¼ 25/12/00	£19,975·00

[27] In all these cases save for (3)* the notice was in Form 1 with para 4 struck out. Notice number (3) did, however, contain para 4 and thus preserved the possibility of claiming a subsequent increase in the rent for the quarter commencing on 24 June 2000 by the mechanism of a s 17(4) notice served within three months of 29 September 2000 (that increased rent having become payable on the quarter day next following its determination). That mechanism was not in fact employed. Instead the increased rent for that quarter was simply included in the overall lump of additional rent claimed in notice number (4).

[28] A similar, although not identical, pattern appears in the notices given under the 1969 lease:

	Date of Notice	Fixed Charges
(1)	11.11.99	Rent for ¼ 24/6/99	£1,857·97
		Rent for ¼ 29/9/99	£1,857·97
(2)	16.6.99	Balance for ¼ 25/12/99	£778·50
		Rent for ¼ 25/3/00	£1,857·97
(3)*	3.8.00	Rent for ¼ 24/6/00	£1,857·97
(4)*	8.3.01	Rent for ¼ 29/9/00	£1,857·97
		Rent for ¼ 25/12/00	£1,857·97
(5)*	20.07.01	Rent for ¼ 25/3/01	£1,857·97
		Rent for ¼ 24/6/01	£1,857·97

'Additional rent for the period 25th December 1996 to 28th September 2001 payable pursuant to the rent review agreed and documented in a Rent Review Memorandum dated 10th July 2001 of'	£53,998·61

The asterisked notices are, once again, those in which para 4 has not been struck out.

[29] The general submissions made on behalf of the defendant may be summarised as follows: (1) where a notice which has been served in respect of rent due for any quarter has, by striking out para 4 in the statutory form, not preserved the possibility of the original tenant being liable in a greater sum than that specified in the notice, the original tenant can never be made liable for a greater sum in respect of that quarter; (2) where such a notice has been served it is implicit, not only that there will be no such liability asserted in respect of that quarter, but also that no such increased sum will be sought in respect of any earlier period; (3) since in relation to the 1967 lease and the 1969 lease the respective notices of 11 November 1999 and 16 June 2000 struck out para 4, it follows that the tenant could not be liable for increased rent in respect of the quarters covered by those notices, but also that there could be no liability for increased rent in relation to any of the preceding quarters.

[30] The claimant challenges both the first and the second steps in this argument. On its behalf Mr Stoner submitted that the critical words were those in s 17(2) which refer to 'the date when the charge becomes due', to the notice informing the tenant that 'the charge is now due', and to the fact that 'the landlord intends to recover from the former tenant such amount as is specified in the notice'. All those expressions point to the charge in question having become 'demandable'. Accordingly, where rent has not become demandable because, being subject to an unresolved process of review, its amount has not been determined, a landlord does not need to serve any notice under s 17(2) in order to preserve the original tenant's liability in respect of such sum. Moreover if no notice has been served under s 17(2), no question of having to serve a notice under s 17(4) can arise.

[31] If s 17(2) stood alone there would be much to be said for the claimant's submissions. However s 17(4) assumes that there may be a case in which the amount of the fixed charge (which is 'now due' under s 17(2)) may subsequently be determined to be in a greater amount. The concept of the fixed charge being 'now due' under s 17(2) is thus distinct from the amount in respect of that fixed charge for which the original tenant is potentially liable. If a fixed charge can be 'now due' but in an amount which has not yet been determined, 'now due' cannot mean 'demandable', but must mean 'in respect of which a liability has now arisen'.

[32] Note 4 to Form 1 shows that the draftsman of the 1995 regulations adopted this interpretation of the statutory provisions, treating s 17(4) as dealing with the case where 'the amount cannot finally be determined within six months after it is due (for example, if there is dispute concerning an outstanding rent review . . .)' (my emphasis). The same view of s 17(2) is, for what it is worth, taken by the editors of 23 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2004 reissue) 1194 in their general note on the section where they state:

> 'Under sub-s (2), the landlord would be unable to recover the difference between the sum in the notice and the higher sum to which he was entitled by the subsequent determination (because he would not have served on the former tenant notice that the sum representing that difference was due within the requisite six-month period), and this would be unfair on the landlord. Sub-s (4) therefore enables . . .'

[33] Such an approach does, however, lead to an apparent oddity. It means that in a case such as the present, where the rent review process spread over a number of years, the landlord would only be entitled to claim the subsequently determined rent from the original tenant if he had served notices throughout the period, even though there was no default whatsoever by the current tenant in paying the demandable rent and no reason to suppose that the current tenant would default in paying the subsequently determined rent. On this scenario the landlord would not within the six-month period have any intention of claiming the demandable rent from the original tenant (because it had been paid). His s 17(2) notice would therefore have to specify 'the amount' which he intends to claim either as 'nil' or as 'nothing at the moment, but wait and see'.

[34] I do not think that there is any way of resolving this difficulty. It does not appear to me that the solution can lie in construing s 17(2) and (4) differently depending on whether or not a s 17(2) notice has been served. Either the subsequently determined rent is 'due' at the date of its accrual as a liability or at the date of its demandability. I have (somewhat to my own surprise) come to the conclusion that the former is the correct construction.

[35] That conclusion does, in my judgment, fit with the policy underlying the section. Subsection (2) is designed to relieve the former tenant of liability in respect of any fixed charge unless the landlord has taken a purely formal step of notification to preserve the former tenant's liability. If the law is as I think it is no hardship to the landlord results. In the case of a long drawn out process of rent review he can protect himself against the possibility of the current tenant proving in due course unable to meet his liability by serving protective notices on the original tenant. The original tenant then gets the requisite early warning of what the future may hold. By contrast if the law is as the claimant contends, considerable hardship may result for the original tenant. Years after a particular rental period has passed the original tenant may be faced with a claim in respect of that rental period whereas the statute appears designed to allow the original tenant to be free from claims if he has not received a notice within the period of six months of a particular rent payment date. The facts of the present case dramatically illustrate how severely that can impact on the original tenant. A construction of the section which permits an original tenant to sleep easily in respect of a rental period once six months has elapsed without having received a protective notice from the landlord seems to me entirely consistent with Parliament's intention.

[36] Accordingly, in my judgment, NCP's notice dated 8 March 2001 which specified the additional rent of £279,849 under the 1967 lease and its notice dated 20 July 2001 which specified the additional rent of £53,998·61 under the 1969 lease were not effective to render the claimant liable in respect of those sums.

[37] The defendant contended that those notices were also ineffective to render the claimant liable in respect of (in the case of the 1967 lease) the £19,975 claimed for the quarter commencing 29 September 2000 and (in the case of the 1969 lease) the two sums of £1,857·97 for the quarters 25 March 2001 and 24 June 2001. This was on the basis that, although effective notices could have been given at those dates in respect of those amounts, the inclusion in each case of the additional invalid claims for the additional rent rendered the whole notice 'hybrid' and therefore non-compliant with the statute. I do not accept that contention: the inclusion of identifiable 'out of time' amounts in a notice does not render the notice ineffective in relation to properly identified amounts with respect to which it is timeous.

WIDER ARGUMENTS

[38] I turn therefore to consider the wider arguments relied on by the defendant. These arguments proceed on the assumption that the claimant was liable to NCP for all the sums in respect of which it seeks an indemnity from the defendant, and seek to provide a reason why, notwithstanding that liability and the terms of the indemnity, the claimant ought not to succeed.

[39] The effect of s 24(1) is to imply a covenant in each of the relevant transfers in the following terms:

> '(b) on the part of the transferee, a covenant with the transferor, that during the residue of the term the transferee and the persons deriving title under him will pay, perform, and observe the rent, covenants, and conditions by and in the registered lease reserved and contained and on the part of the lessee to be paid, performed and observed, and will keep the transferor and the persons deriving title under him indemnified against all actions, expenses, and claims on account of the non-payment of the said rent or any part thereof, or the breach of the said covenants or conditions or any of them.'

[40] The covenant therefore has two limbs, the first consisting of the covenant that the rent will be paid, and the second consisting of the covenant to indemnify against 'actions expenses and claims on account of the non-payment of the said rent'. One question which I canvassed with counsel in argument was whether the second limb added anything to the first or was simply an expression of the legal consequences of a breach of the first? The thought behind my question was that if the latter was correct then the question of whether the defendant was liable to the claimant in the particular sums claimed could be answered by applying tests appropriate to any other claim for damages for breach of contract, namely whether the particular damage suffered fell within the scope of the duty created by the contractual promise, whether it was caused by the breach complained of, whether it was too remote in law to be recovered, and whether the claimant had fallen short in its duty to mitigate. These questions, while by no means free from difficulty in themselves, at least presented a familiar terrain. As matters stood the defendant's pleaded case in relation to its more general arguments appeared to rely rather on some suggested principle of law, or implied term, applicable to contractual indemnities which precludes recovery by the indemnified: (i) where the indemnified has 'caused or connived' at the default of the current tenant; (ii) where the indemnified has done something injurious to the indemnifier or inconsistent with his rights; (iii) in respect of losses or liabilities which have been 'prolonged or increased' as a result of acts of the indemnified; (iv) in respect of losses or liabilities which have been incurred in consequence of reckless conduct on the part of the indemnified; (v) in respect of losses and liabilities which while of the same type as those covered by the indemnity have in fact been suffered or incurred 'as a result of a course of action voluntarily undertaken by' the indemnified.

[41] Those formulations are taken from paras 13 and 13A of the re-re-amended defence. In addition the defendant pleaded in para 14 duties owed by the claimant to the defendant not to pay to NCP sums not lawfully due from the claimant to NCP and/or to challenge the amounts due where they were arguable.

[42] In argument Mr Bannister QC did not seek to argue that my suggestion (that the question could be approached as if the second limb of the covenant could be approached on the basis that it simply set out the legal consequences of a breach of the first limb) was wrong. Nor, however, did he in terms adopt it. For his part, Mr Stoner submitted that it was wrong. He argued that the distinction between the two limbs was that breach of the first gave rise to a claim for unliquidated damages, whereas the second creates a claim in debt. A person who has a claim in debt—

> 'need not prove anything beyond the occurrence of the event or condition on the occurrence of which the debt become due. He need prove no loss; the rules as to remoteness of damage and mitigation of loss are irrelevant . . .'

(See per Millett LJ in Jervis v Harris [1996] 1 All ER 303 at 308, [1996] Ch 195 at 202.)

[43] I record these matters at this stage in my judgment in order to provide a context for identifying the nature of the factual issues upon which I have heard evidence and been addressed. The area of disputed fact is relatively limited, and does not require an elaborate narrative of all the events which took place between November 1999 (when the first s 17 notice was served on the claimant) and 28 February 2003 (when HSJ completed the assignment to Mr Rizvi). Apart from the existence and effect of the maintenance agreement no pleaded allegation by the defendant complains that any act of the claimant caused or contributed to the lengthy period of time which it took to complete that transaction which, from as early as October 2000 almost continually looked as if it was likely to be completed within a period of weeks from whatever date one cares to look at. The various difficulties which arose, and which conspired at every point to dash what was a reasonable expectation at the time, are catalogued in the lengthy witness statement of Mr Anderson of Eversheds who acted throughout on behalf of the claimant, and who also acted on behalf of HSJ (on the instructions of the administrative receivers) in the sale to Mr Rizvi. I found him to be a careful and conscientious witness whose evidence on these matters could be accepted.

[44] I focus therefore only on those parts of the narrative which throw up issues of potential legal relevance

[45] The story can be taken up from April 2000. Prior to that date consideration had been given by the claimant to its position in the light of the s 17 notices which had been served on it, and notification of the position had been given by the claimant to the defendant. It had appeared, however, that matters were quite likely to resolve themselves. Eversheds (acting by Miss Martin) had understood from the administrative receivers that they were paying current rent and had every expectation of being able to achieve an early sale. The premises had in fact been on the market prior to the administrative receivers' appointment at an asking price of £995,000, and it appeared entirely possible that a premium might be obtained on sale which would both enable any arrears of rent to be discharged and produce a result satisfactory to HSJ's mortgagees (at whose instance the administrative receivers had been appointed).

[46] A letter from the administrative receivers to Miss Martin dated 4 April 2000 read as follows:

> 'The issue of rent review is at an advanced stage, having not apparently been addressed to any great degree by the parties prior to our appointment on 6 October 1999. The landlords have proposed on a without prejudice basis a rental of £53,000 p.a. on the main lease (due from about April 1995) and £16,000 p.a. on the extension, due from December 1996. An independent expert was appointed in March 1996 and he issued further revised directions in February 2000 proposing a timetable for submissions by the parties and the tenant must respond by 7th April 2000.
>
> Prior to our appointment, the company had been marketing the hotel through Christie & Co at an asking price of £995,000 but no firm offers had been received, largely we surmise because of the price and the unresolved rent reviews.
>
> Following our appointment, Christie & Co informally advised that the proposed rent increases were not unreasonable. We decided to seek further specialist advice from the hotel and licensed property valuers Messrs Fleurets and their detailed report suggests that, on balance, the proposed rent is reasonable, although there has been some difficulty in view of the length of time since the review date and the lack of information on certain matters e.g. the extent of the works carried out by the original tenant. (Your client may be able to assist in this respect).
>
> If the tenant agrees the rent as proposed, this will crystallise rent in arrears at the March 2000 quarter day of some £200,000 (exc. any interest which may be payable) against which there is a rent deposit of about £45,000. It appears that your client as original tenant is liable to the landlord for the arrears and any ongoing liability for the remaining term of the lease, up to 2062.
>
> The position of the tenant is that trading at best has been break-even but there are outstanding professional costs in the Receivership. In order for trading to continue, the Receivers need to be satisfied that all trading and professional costs can be met pending a sale and we will be asking the mortgagees whether they are prepared to put us in funds so as to enable trading to continue up to a sale of the business as a going concern.
>
> So far as concerns the prospects for a sale, it is difficult to be confident. Christie & Co suggest a marketing guide of £550,000 but that consideration be given to any offers in the region of £400,000. Fleurets informal view is that although the rack rent for the hotel could be of the order of £100/£125,000, the current poor trade may mitigate against a party paying a material premium to obtaining the business. Therefore, the mortgagees may be reluctant to invest any more money into the business.
>
> In summary, urgent discussions need to be taken on several issues:
>
> - The rent reviews

- Continuation of trade
- Selling the business

It seems to us that as original tenants, your clients are most at risk and I would invite your early considerations of the position. In particular, I am proposing to instruct Fleurets not to object to the proposed rent by the landlords by the deadline of 7 April. I would be happy to meet with your clients to discuss these matters.'

[47] Miss Martin's immediate response, so far as the rent review was concerned, was that the claimant had insufficient information on which to offer a view. In the meantime the administrative receivers, on the instructions of the mortgagees, made a counter-offer to NCP, which NCP appears almost immediately to have rejected. By virtue of the stage which the rent review had by then reached the consequence was that the matter then became one for the determination of the independent expert. He had already set a timetable for submissions by the parties' respective experts.

[48] In hindsight it is easy to see that a mistake was made by the administrative receivers in not having accepted NCP's offer since in due course the independent expert proceeded, having received submissions from NCP that the rent should be £102,000 and from HSJ that it should not be increased at all above the 1995 level of £24,000, to determine that the rent should be £68,000.

[49] The mistake was an expensive one. It meant that by 28 February 2003 the arrears were some £138,000 greater than they would have been had NCP's offer been accepted. The accuracy of that calculation was not the subject of argument before me and I have not checked it. But on any view the increase (of £15,000 pa over a period of six years) was a large one.

[50] The issue here is as to why NCP's offer was not accepted. A letter from the administrative receivers to Eversheds dated 12 April 2000 asserts that Eversheds had instructed the administrative receivers to make no concessions. The defendant relied on this as evidence of the fact stated. Mr Kinlan, in whose name the letter was written and who was called as a witness on behalf of the defendant, could not recall why this assertion had been made, but conceded that nothing in Miss Martin's written communications to the administrative receivers had justified the assertion. At the same time, when re-examined on the point, he observed that Eversheds had never taken the opportunity to deny the assertion. Miss Martin, although available to be called as a witness by the claimant in the sense that it was able to proffer a very limited witness statement from her despite the fact that she had ceased to be an employee of Eversheds since the autumn of 2002, was not called to give evidence.

[51] I think it extremely improbable that there was any relevant communication between Eversheds and the administrative receivers prior to 12 April 2000 which justified the assertion made in the letter of that date. The fact is, as the contemporary letters show, that the claimant did not feel able to say one way or the other whether NCP's offer should be accepted and that Miss Martin was concerned that her client should not be seen as having any responsibility for whatever decision was taken, at least until her client was better informed. The tenor of the written communications was that the claimant was not in a position to instruct the administrative receivers to make what might be a concession. That is not the same thing as relaying instructions from her client to the administrative receivers that they should not make concessions. I do not attach significance to the fact that, in subsequent correspondence, she did not pick up and quarrel with the way in which the administrative receivers had chosen to interpret her response. In any event expression of the view that the administrative receivers should not make concessions, made from a position of total ignorance, could not amount to an 'instruction' to the administrative receivers not to accept NCP's offer. The claimant was not in a position to give the administrative receivers instructions.

[52] The issue is, in any case, academic in the light of the fact that the administrative receivers in fact proceeded not merely to not accept NCP's offer but to reject it by making a counter-offer at the suggestion of the mortgagees. The claimant was not consulted at all about this step and cannot be blamed for its having been taken. If the administrative receivers were acting on anyone's instructions in not accepting the offer it appears to have been instructions given by the mortgagees.

[53] What the written record gives no clue about is whether NCP's offer could at any stage have been revived. What subsequently happened was that an extension of time was obtained for Fleurets (the valuers retained by the administrative receivers) to put in their submission to the joint expert and that in the interval the claimant obtained the assistance of Messrs Humberts to advise it generally about the prospects for the premises, including the rent review process. Messrs Humberts (in the person of Mr Haigh who gave evidence before me) in due course considered and approved the submission eventually made by Fleurets to the joint expert. He could not recall the question having been raised of seeking to revive NCP's offer rather than proceeding to the expert determination. Nor could Mr Kinlan recall having given consideration to the point. So far as the claimant itself was concerned, the relevant evidence was given by Mr Hime who was at that time the claimant's Group Estate Manager and Miss Martin's principal source of instructions. He too could not recall having had an attitude that the rent should be settled by the review process rather than by negotiation with NCP and settlement by agreement. So far as he was concerned the question of review was fundamentally a matter for the administrative receivers, and he had not himself tried to evaluate what the likely outcome of the review process would be.

[54] On all the evidence I am not satisfied that the absence of any attempt by the administrative receivers to revive NCP's offer was caused by any intervention on the part of the claimant. On the contrary the conduct of all concerned seems to me consistent rather with a recognition that, having missed the opportunity to settle on NCP's terms by 7 April, the only game in town was to do the best that could be done in relation to the independent expert's determination. That might either have been because the view was taken that the independent expert's determination would probably come out closer to the Fleurets' submission than NCP's, or (which I think more likely) that the reality was that NCP's offer was no longer on the table and was most unlikely to be resurrected. Given the previous delays in the rent review process (the independent expert had been appointed as long ago as 29 March 1996) it is hardly surprising that NCP's offer should have been a final one.

[55] Accordingly I reject the submission that the claimant was in any relevant sense responsible for the fact that the NCP offer was not accepted.

[56] The second strand in the letter dated 4 April 2000 was the administrative receivers' desire to get the claimant financially involved in the project of keeping the hotel operating pending its sale. Given the claimant's unenviable position, it is not in the least surprising that it came to the conclusion that its best option was to accept in principle the concept of supporting that project financially. This it had done by 18 May 2000. The choices available to it were limited to the following. (i) To require NCP to grant it an 'overriding lease' under s 19 of the 1995 Act. The effect of exercising that right would have been to reconstitute the claimant as a direct tenant in possession vis-à-vis NCP under new leases which would have enabled the claimant to deal with those leases free from HSJ's leases (which could then have been forfeited). (ii) To support the administrative receivers' efforts to sell the premises to an assignee who would take on the liabilities in respect of future rent, at (it was to be hoped) a premium which might extinguish or at least reduce the liability for arrears which had accrued; or (iii) do nothing and let matters take their course.

[57] The defendant does not complain that the claimant was in any sense at fault in not taking the first course. Its claim is based on the proposition that if the third course had been taken, the eventual outcome would have been more favourable. It is implicit in this proposition that 'more favourable' means for this purpose more favourable both to the claimant and to the defendant. What the defendant contends is that, had the third course been taken, the consequence would have been that HSJ would have gone into insolvent liquidation and that then one of two things would probably have happened. Either the defendant or some other person would have obtained an assignment of the leases for a negligible premium on a forced sale, or, had the liquidator disclaimed the leases, the defendant or some other person within s 118(2) of the Insolvency Act 1986 would have obtained a vesting order. In either case, the claimant's liability for the continuing rent would have been determined and any liability of the defendant to the claimant would have determined at the same time.

[58] By 17 May 2000 Mr Hime had come to the view that the claimant's interests were best served by supporting the administrative receivers' project of trying to sell the business as a going concern and for that purpose to enter into a conditional and temporary arrangement with the administrative receivers. At that stage the possibility of the claimant being able to claim against the defendant was known but not relied on in any way in choosing the course adopted, Mr Hime's memorandum to his director (Mr Izatt) merely noting that:

> 'The original individual to whom S&N made the assignment is believed to still be running/owning a number of hotels and there might be a chance (albeit small) that the indemnity that he provided following the assignment could be called upon by S&N to cover any losses for the property. Again, this aspect is being looked into.'

Miss Martin seems to have taken the view that entering into a voluntary arrangement with the administrative receivers might impair the claimant's ability to claim against the defendant and she so advised Mr Hime by letter dated 19 May 2000. The claimant's decision to proceed despite that advice shows that it was concerned to do what was perceived to be in its own commercial best interests irrespective of its ability to claim against the defendant. On the same day she wrote to the defendant's solicitors (Harefield) advising them in general terms of the position as at that date and inviting proposals from the defendant. No effective response was received to that letter.

[59] The claimant and the administrative receivers then proceeded, through their respective solicitors, to hammer out the terms of what became the maintenance agreement, dated 3 August 2000. Mr Anderson from Eversheds did the drafting on behalf of the claimant. It took the form of an agreement between (1) Pubs[a] (2) the claimant and (3) the administrative receivers. After reciting inter alia that Pubs had agreed to indemnify the claimant against the claimant's liabilities to NCP, the operative provisions of the agreement provided for Pubs to pay the administrative receivers up to £6,000 per month in respect of 'Trading Losses' as defined. That sum was calculated on the footing that the administrative receivers would be paying rent to NCP at the current level but the agreement recognised that once the rent review was finalised the sum of £6,000 would need to be revised upwards. Either party could terminate the agreement on 14 days' notice. There were provisions to ensure that sale proceeds were used to pay down expenses incurred by Pubs under the agreement and to make provision for outstanding liabilities under the leases which might fall on Pubs. There was also provision for the administrative receivers not to issue a contract for sale without Pubs' prior written approval.

[60] The maintenance agreement was never in fact operated according to its terms. In the first place there never was any indemnity between the claimant and Pubs. The insertion of Pubs as a party seems to have been the result of Mr Hime's view that, since this was hotel trade, the appropriate division within the claimant's group was that represented (in corporate terms) by Pubs. Having been so instructed Mr Anderson thought it logical for the indemnity (a draft of which he supplied) to be in place as between Pubs and the claimant. No such indemnity was however ever executed. Moreover, when the administrative receivers did in due course call for support, it was the claimant (and not Pubs) which gave it. In the second place, although the maintenance agreement contemplated that the trading losses would be calculated after payment of the rent, the administrative receivers in fact never did pay any rent. In practice this meant that they were able to continue trading the hotel without making any call on the claimant for a considerable period of time. It was not until October 2001 that they first looked to the claimant for direct financial assistance. The claimant then gave the assistance requested, not because the maintenance agreement obliged it to (which it did not), but for the purely pragmatic reason (what Mr Fenwick in his evidence called a 'simple commercial approach') that by doing so the hotel could be kept trading and the contemplated transaction with Mr Rizvi kept alive.

[61] Both these features of the practical operation of the arrangements have given rise to substantial controversy in the course of these proceedings. The possibility of the existence of an indemnity provoked a suspicion on the part of the defendant and his advisers that the claimant itself had not in fact suffered the liability in respect of which it was claiming. Further, the fact that the administrative receivers had been permitted and/or encouraged by the claimant to continue trading without paying the rent due to NCP prompted a suspicion that this course of conduct had been deliberately pursued by the claimant in the knowledge that the resulting liability for rent could be passed on to the defendant.

[62] So far as the first point is concerned it was accepted by the defendant by the end of the trial that there was no indemnity in place between Pubs and the a See [15], above.

---

claimant and, moreover, that it was the claimant, rather than Pubs, which had made all the payments in respect of which it was claiming indemnity from the defendant. a [63] So far as concerns the second point, I am quite satisfied (and this was I think largely accepted by Mr Bannister in his closing speech) that the reason for the administrative receivers' non-payment of rent, and the claimant's acquiescence in that, had a much simpler explanation than that suspected by the b defendant. Regardless of whether or not it had an effective claim over against the defendant, the claimant's motivation at all times was to see that the leases were assigned as soon as practicable to an assignee who would then be responsible for future rent. It was assumed throughout that NCP would make it a condition of any such assignment that all arrears of rent would be discharged. Accordingly it c did not matter whether the rent was paid when it was due or not. If it was to be paid when it was due the only source of funds with which it could be paid would have been the claimant. If not paid until the completion of the assignment to the new tenant, it would again have to be funded by the claimant except to the extent that any premium paid by the assignee went to reduce it. Since at all material times it appeared both to the claimant and to the administrative receivers that the d best chance of obtaining a purchaser was to keep the hotel trading it made sense for the claimant not to require the administrative receivers to keep the rent up to date.

[64] The contemplation of both the claimant and the defendant, at the date of the maintenance agreement, was that the arrangements which it envisaged e would be in place for only a relatively short time. It was expected that the hoped for purchaser would appear on the scene in the relatively near future. This happened in October 2000 when agreement was reached in principle for the sale to Mr Rizvi. It is the defendant's case, however, that by this time the claimant's 'interventions' had already critically damaged what would otherwise have been the prospects of a speedy assignment to a new tenant. Three such interventions f are relied on.

[65] First, it is said that the claimant's actions over the rent review caused a delay in the determination of the rent, and that the resulting uncertainty over the rent impaired the marketing process. I have already concluded that responsibility for NCP's offer not having been accepted by HSJ cannot be laid at the door of g the claimant.

[66] Secondly, it was said that the hotel was being marketed at too high a premium. Christie's were marketing it at £500,000. The defendant called expert evidence that it was unrealistic to have expected to achieve offers in relation to such a figure. That evidence, given with the benefit of hindsight, was plainly h correct. There is however not a scrap of evidence to suggest that marketing the hotel in this way deterred anyone at all from making offers at a realistic level, or that any such offers were made and rejected in the hope of attracting higher ones. There is in my judgment nothing in this point.

[67] Thirdly, it was said that the claimant had unrealistically pursued the idea j of selling the hotel to a purchaser for use as an asylum-seekers' hostel, and that this had resulted in the rejection of an offer from Mr Rizvi in May 2000 to purchase for £200,000. The highest at which this point can be put is that the claimant knew by 6 July 2000 that NCP's position was that it would not countenance a change of the user covenants to permit such a use. Despite this the possibility of sale to a company controlled by a Mr Jivraj (who came with excellent references) was explored and continued to be explored until the end of August 2000, by which time it had become clear both that the Jivraj proposal did involve such a change of use and that NCP's attitude was unbending. During August, Miss Martin did legal research on the planning implications of the proposed user and on the concept of seeking to challenge any refusal of NCP to consent to an assignment on grounds of unreasonableness.

[68] The whole of the defendant's case on this point rests on two false premises. One was that Mr Rizvi had made an offer of £200,000 in May 2000 which would have resulted in a contract with him had the Jivraj proposal not been pursued. The other was that the nature of Mr Jivraj's interest was known from the outset of his arrival on the scene. In fact Mr Rizvi had not made such an offer. The most that can be said on the evidence is that some other person had approached Christie's in May 2000 with a 'tentative bid' of £200,000 and that this potential purchaser had not been followed up at the time. The fact that Mr Jivraj wanted to use the hotel as an asylum seekers' hostel was only made clear in a letter from his solicitors dated 4 August 2000 to the administrative receivers which sought to make a case that the proposed user could continue to be described as a hotel user, and that if Mr Jivraj could present his case to NCP the latter's fears would be allayed. Notwithstanding NCP's earlier indication of its attitude it was entirely reasonable, in my judgment, for further consideration to have been given to the possibilities contemplated by that letter. In the event the further approach which was then made to NCP's agents resulted in a disappointing response from them dated 24 August 2000 and one which Miss Martin's legal research could not overcome. Nothing had been lost by the possibility of a sale to Mr Jivraj having been explored.

[69] As previously indicated Mr Rizvi made his offer to buy HSJ's interests in the hotel for £200,000 on 18 October 2000. This was subject to the maximum rental under all the leases not exceeding £100,000 pa. By that time the rent under the 1967 lease had been reviewed, but the position under the 1969 lease and the lobby lease was subject to some uncertainty. Eversheds was instructed by the administrative receivers to act in the sale, and did so by Mr Anderson. Subsequently during the course of the autumn Mr Rizvi withdrew that offer and offered instead to purchase at a nil premium, later revising his offer to £100,000. By the end of the year the administrative receivers, with the claimant's concurrence, had agreed to proceed on this basis. It was at that stage contemplated that the sale was likely to take place within a reasonably short time scale: Mr Rizvi (who by this stage was making the offer not in his own name but that of his company (Skymede)) was pressing for an early completion, and the problems which were subsequently to emerge (of which the principal one concerned the lobby lease) had not fully presented themselves.

[70] A £100,000 premium meant that there was no prospect of any of the arrears of rent being discharged out of the premium. All would be swallowed up in the administrative receivers' costs and expenses.

[71] The prospect of that sale then caused consideration to be given within Eversheds to the claimant's position in relation to the arrears of rent which NCP would expect to be paid at completion as a condition of its consent to the assignments. Both Miss Martin and Mr Anderson took the view that there would be difficulty in asserting any claim for indemnity against the defendant (who by that time had been ascertained to be worth suing) except to the extent that the claimant funded the payment of those arrears as a consequence of being liable for them under valid s 17 notices. At that stage, however, no such notices had been served in respect of the arrears of the reviewed rents under the 1967 lease. These represented by far the largest proportion of the rent which would have to be paid at completion. Consideration was therefore given to whether or not to 'prompt' NCP into serving such notices. Consideration was also given to the question whether the claimant could take advantage of the non-service of s 17 notices by paying up under the existing s 17 notices, claiming an overriding lease, and then dealing with the overriding lease free from arrears of reviewed rent.

[72] Mr Anderson's thinking on these matters is set out in a characteristically careful memorandum to Miss Martin dated 20 March 2001. His conclusion was that it would be necessary for s 17 notices to have been served if the claimant was to be able to recover from the defendant, that the device of claiming an overriding lease would not work, and that it might therefore be necessary to remind NCP to serve s 17 notices in order 'to perfect the cause of action' against the defendant. This seems to have accorded with Miss Martin's own view: she had advised Mr Fenwick (Mr Hime's successor) in early January of the need, if necessary, to prompt service of s 17 notices before completion.

[73] In fact Mr Anderson's ruminations in his 20 March memorandum were academic since by that time the notices dated 8 March 2001 had in any event been given (a footnote to his memorandum indicates that he must have learned of this fact as he was composing it). He was clear in his evidence that neither he, nor so far as he knew anyone else, had prompted the service of the s 17 notices. Mr Bannister persisted, however, in seeking to argue that the claimant had in fact prompted the notices. He based that submission primarily on a letter dated 7 February 2001 from Mr Anderson to NCP's agents Nelson Bakewell. That letter includes the sentence 'we must accept the liability of Scottish & Newcastle plc in respect of s 17 Notices properly served upon them'. Mr Bannister sought to argue that this was a covert nudge to NCP to get on with service of s 17 notices.

[74] Apart from Mr Anderson's denial that this was his intention, there are a number of reasons why I wholly reject this thesis. Chief among them is the fact that the letter has to be read in the context of the letter to which it was a reply which implicitly sought an admission that the claimant accepted liability under the s 17 notices which had been served. Other reasons include the fact that, if a nudge was intended, giving it to Nelson Bakewell, as opposed to NCP's solicitors, was an extremely oblique method of signalling the request, and the fact that when the same issue later arose (in 2003) Mr Anderson had no hesitation in tackling the matter entirely openly.

[75] Mr Bannister alternatively argued that Miss Martin might have covertly prompted the service of the notices dated 8 March 2001. There is no evidence of this at all, and (in the light of the communications passing between her and Mr Anderson during this period) it seems to me highly unlikely that she did so.

[76] Accordingly, I accept the claimant's evidence that it did not prompt the service of these s 17 notices.

[77] For reasons which I have already indicated it is unnecessary for me to dwell on the many difficulties which subsequently arose in the course of the transaction and which were in the event to defer its completion until 28 February 2003. For present purposes the story can be picked up again in early February 2003 by which time the Rizvi transaction was, at last, ready to complete.

[78] NCP's solicitors (Hamlins) sent a completion statement to Eversheds on 10 February 2003. This showed that a total of £381,300·21 had to be paid on completion. Part of this consisted of rent deposits payable by Skymede. Once allowance was made for that, the amount which was going to have to be funded by the claimant was £306,771·99. Of that sum only part consisted of rent arrears under the 1967 and 1969 leases, namely £245,714·55, and that sum had only been made the subject of s 17 notices to the extent of notices which had been given on 4 March 2002 (£39,950 in respect of the 1967 lease and £9,400 in respect of the 1969 lease), and 3 September 2002 (the same figures). No notices had, however, been given in respect of the rent due for the quarters 29 September 2002 and 25 December 2002 (again £39,950 and £9,400 respectively).

[79] Mr Anderson was unsure what the up-to-date position with regard to s 17 notices was, and wrote to Hamlins asking for a complete set of notices. Hamlins' response was that this was irrelevant. Mr Anderson replied saying that he was not suggesting that supply of s 17 notices was a pre-condition of completion, accepted that 'however the arrears are funded, they are being funded in the name of the [HSJ]' but nevertheless repeated his request. By letter dated 20 February 2003, Hamlins repeated their position. Mr Anderson replied on 21 February in the following terms:

> 'As to that dealing with the question of Section 17 Notices, we reiterate that we do understand the point that you make but do not understand your client's reluctance to serve Section 17 Notices in respect of any part of the currently demanded arrears which are not the subject of such a notice in any event.
>
> As, from your client's point of view, this is a purely administrative step but, from our client's point of view, is a step which if untaken will prejudice its ability to recover from its immediate assignee, why not issue the notices?'

[80] Finally by letter dated 27 February 2003 Hamlins replied as follows:

> 'We note that Scottish & Newcastle are funding the discharge of the sums due from the existing tenant. However, you will please note that there are sums shown on the Completion Statement which relate to the Ground Floor Lobby Lease for which Scottish & Newcastle have no liability. Accordingly, that element relating to the Ground Floor Lobby Lease can only be accepted by our client if they are tendered by Scottish & Newcastle as agent for and on behalf of Hotel St. James Limited (In Administrative Receivership). We will require your written confirmation to this effect.
>
> With regard to the September 2002 and December 2002 quarters, we confirm that our client is prepared to serve Section 17 Notices but as a result, our client can only accept the monies from Scottish & Newcastle once those notices have been served unless Scottish & Newcastle confirm that all the monies are in fact tendered as agents for and on behalf of Hotel St. James (In Administrative Receivership).'

[81] Mr Anderson's answer on 28 February 2003 (the day of completion) was in the following terms:

> 'We confirm that the element of the completion statement relating to the Ground Floor Lobby Lease is tendered by Scottish & Newcastle Plc as agent for and on behalf of Hotel Saint James Limited (in administrative receivership).

As to the September 2002 quarters, we confirm that the monies due by reference to these quarter dates are tendered by Scottish & Newcastle Plc as agent for and on behalf of Hotel Saint James Limited (in administrative receivership).

Clearly, it would be of assistance to us if the Section 17 Notices could be served today (in which case those payments will be made by Scottish & Newcastle Plc in discharge of its own liability) but if, for whatever reason, this is not possible, it is more important that the matter should be completed today than that it should be deferred pending the service of those Notices.

Accordingly, if notices are served (by fax) today, the relative liabilities are discharged by Scottish & Newcastle Plc in discharge of its own liability.'

[82] To add to the complication of this part of the story, unknown to Mr Anderson, Hamlins had in fact posted two s 17 notices to the claimant's head office in Edinburgh the previous day under cover of a letter (headed By Recorded Delivery) which also demanded payment of the sums claimed within 14 days. That letter was received in Edinburgh at some time on 28 February.

[83] This episode therefore raises the issues: (i) whether the £245,714·55 was tendered to NCP by the claimant in respect of its own liability or as agent on behalf of HSJ; (ii) if the latter, whether that prevents the claimant from being able to claim it from the defendant; (iii) whether the fact that the claimant prompted the final notices (totalling £49,350) prevents the claimant from being able to recover that sum from the defendant.

[84] It is convenient to defer consideration of the second and third issues until later in my judgment. As to the first, however, I will state my conclusions at this stage. First, I infer as a fact that the notices were sent by recorded delivery. That has not been strictly proved but is more probable than not. The significance of that is that the date of postage is then the date on which the notices were deemed to have been served by s 23 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1927 (which applies for the purposes of s 17 notices by virtue of s 27(5) of the 1995 Act: see Beanby Estates Ltd v Egg Stores (Stamford Hill) Ltd [2003] EWHC 1252 (Ch), [2004] 3 All ER 184, [2003] 1 WLR 2064, and CA Webber (Transport) Ltd v Railtrack plc [2003] EWCA Civ 1167, [2004] 3 All ER 202, [2004] 1 WLR 320).

[85] On that footing the claimant's payment of the relevant moneys was in my judgment in respect of its liabilities. This is a question of construction of the correspondence. Hamlins' letter to Mr Anderson of 27 February 2003 is not easy to construe, but Mr Anderson's letter of 28 February, while giving Hamlins the assurance they sought also made it clear that payments made by the claimant after notices had been served would be discharging its own liabilities. Since a payment by HSJ would discharge the claimant's liabilities it does not appear to me to matter whether the payment, being one which was made by the claimant, was being notionally routed through HSJ or being made direct. Another formula that might, I suppose, have been used would have been for HSJ to tender it both for itself and on behalf of the claimant. It seems to me little short of bizarre to treat the claimant's ability to recover from the defendant as turning on the magic of a particular verbal formula used at completion.

[86] The remaining issue of fact to which I now turn concerns the criticism which is made of the claimant for having embarked on the project of assisting the administrative receivers in keeping the hotel open with a view to improving the prospects of a sale. As to this there can be no doubt that the prospects of an early sale were improved by the fact that the hotel continued to operate. The time which it in fact took to achieve the sale to Mr Rizvi was not prolonged in any way by the fact that the hotel continued to be operated. It seems, on the contrary, much more likely than not that had the hotel ceased to operate at any point in the process that sale would have gone off. There is no reason to suppose in that event that some earlier sale would have been achieved than that in fact concluded with Mr Rizvi. It is true that many of the difficulties which had to be overcome in the course of the Rizvi sale had to do with the fact that the hotel was being sold as a going concern, but the principal component of the delay which occurred was in the event the difficulty of resolving the issues which arose out of the unwillingness of NCP to grant a new lobby lease for a term co-extensive with the 1967 and 1969 leases and the purchaser's unwillingness to accept anything less (a problem ultimately resolved by the claimant giving Mr Rizvi an indemnity). That problem would have had to be resolved whether or not the hotel had been kept in operation.

[87] Accordingly the only question, as it seems to me, is whether the claimant's conduct in some way deprived the defendant of an opportunity which he would otherwise have taken himself to take an assignment. The following paragraphs address that question.

[88] The claimant (by Eversheds) made early contact with the defendant in December 1999 informing him of the s 17 notices which had by then been served and that the claimant would be relying on its indemnity against him. His initial response was to deny that any such indemnity had been given, asserting the existence of some agreement with NCP which had negated it. By January 2000, however, the defendant had put the matter in the hands of Harefield, solicitors, and the position was carefully explained to them by Eversheds. Harefield responded that they were investigating Mr Raguz's own guarantors, a reference to the Virani brothers.

[89] Following the request from the administrative receivers for, and the claimant's agreement in principle to, support to keep the hotel operating, Eversheds wrote to Harefield on 19 May 2000 in the following terms:

> 'We refer to previous correspondence.
>
> Our clients have now been contacted by the Administrative Receivers of Hotel St. James Limited the current tenants of the above-mentioned premises. The Administrative Receivers have informed our clients that they have been trading at the premises but that they are now trading at a loss, and are considering pulling out of the premises and selling the Fixtures and Fittings.
>
> The Administrative Receivers have also informed our clients that they are in the process of finalising the on-going negotiations for the standing rent review and have informed us that there are arrears of rent somewhere in the region of £150,000 and that currently no rent is being paid at the premises.
>
> The Administrative Receivers have approached our clients to ascertain whether our clients would be prepared to indemnify the Administrative Receiver for trading losses at the premises to keep the premises open and we are writing to ascertain whether your client would also be prepared to become involved and underwrite the trading losses at the premises with the view that the Administrative Receivers could sell the premises as a going concern. The Administrative Receivers has indicated to us that they would anticipate that it would be possible to then pay off the current arrears of rent.

We are aware that your client was in the hotel business previously and may still be in the business and we are also interested as to whether or not your client might be prepared to take on these premises.

Can you please contact your client as a matter of urgency and revert to us within the next few days.'

[90] No substantive response was received to that letter until 15 June 2000 when Harefield advised that they would be discussing the matter with their client, and queried how the rent arrears had grown to £150,000. That query was answered by Eversheds, who continued by letters dated 26 July and 17 August 2000 to press for a substantive response to their letter of 19 May 2000. In a telephone call made by Miss Martin to Harefield on 22 August 2000 Miss Martin elicited the information that the defendant was still in the hotel business and was interested in the premises. Eversheds sent two further chasers and were met with the response on 20 September 2000 that Harefield had understood from the earlier telephone conversation that the claimant had been going to put some concrete proposals on the table. This resulted in a suggestion (by letter dated 3 October) that the defendant should take an assignment of the premises, a premium of £100,000 being likely to be sought.

[91] Following receipt of the independent expert's determination of the 1967 lease rent review, Eversheds wrote again on 18 October 2000 to advise that the arrears were now £240,000 and suggesting a meeting. No response was received. They wrote again on 27 October to advise that Mr Rizvi was expressing interest. By 7 November 2000 LHP Law (as Harefield had by then become) themselves wrote suggesting an early meeting. By 9 November the claimants had themselves begun to doubt the value of a meeting, particularly in light of the acceptance of Mr Rizvi's offer. By letter of that date Eversheds invited the defendant instead to make an offer for the premises. This elicited the response that the defendant was indeed interested, and a request for further information in connection with the leases which Eversheds sought to supply.

[92] The defendant was interested. He and his advisers visited the hotel on 12 December 2000. For the defendant, who takes an obvious pride in his trade as an hotelier, it was a depressing sight. The hotel appeared to have suffered from years of neglect and looked very run down. He could see that it needed a very large sum of money spending on it. At his time of life he had no appetite at all for taking it on, but recognised that it might prove to be the only way in which he could mitigate his liability to the claimant and protect himself in relation to future liabilities. But at that stage his 'prayer' was that the sale to Mr Rizvi would proceed.

[93] Eversheds continued to press LHP Law for the defendant to make an offer if he was going to. They also continued to advise as to the mounting level of arrears and to supply LHP Law with such further information as they sought. On 23 March 2001 Eversheds advised of the service on the claimant of the statutory demand (in the sum of £31,011·36) and of the claimant's intention to pay it, and asking for a response within 14 days. That had to be chased. A telephone conversation between Miss Martin and Mr James at LHP Law on 2 May 2001 appeared to indicate that liability in principle was accepted but that the defendant was thinking of putting together some deal under which the freehold might be acquired. Eversheds found themselves once again having to write chasing letters (11 May, 4 June, 12 June, 25 June, 13 July and 30 July) to which they received no response whatsoever until 6 August 2001 when they were told that LHP Law did have authority to accept service.

[94] These proceedings were then served on the defendant on 18 September 2001. They pleaded the claimant's liability under the s 17 notices served up to and including those of 20 July 2001, and the payment by the claimant to date of £346,313·05 in respect of its liabilities to NCP. They do not plead that the payment had been made against any demand by NCP, but statutory demands dated 13 June 2001, had in fact been made in respect of that sum, and payment had been made pursuant to those demands on 5 July 2001.

[95] The litigation proceeded to an application for summary judgment fixed for hearing in February 2002. Before that happened there was, however, an important meeting on 9 January 2002 between the claimant's Mr Fenwick, the defendant and a Mr Fairweather, who was an accountant and financial adviser to the defendant. There are two written records of this meeting, one Mr Fenwick's own file note and the other a note made by Miss Martin recording Mr Fenwick's oral account to her of what had transpired at the meeting. It is clear from these that the impression received by Mr Fenwick was that, while the defendant was not seeking to deny his liability, he was anxious to impress on Mr Fenwick that he might not be worth suing and that, so far as concrete proposals were concerned, what he was looking for was, if anything, to have an overriding lease in the name of his company. Mr Fenwick was puzzled as to why this route was being proposed as opposed to simply taking an assignment, and suspected that the answer lay in some intention to expunge once and for all the defendant's liability under the indemnities.

[96] The meeting ended unhappily so far as the defendant was concerned. He is a gentleman of courtly manners, modest about his abilities as a businessman but proud (and justly so) of his long years of experience as an hotelier. At the end of the meeting he expressed his gratitude to Mr Fenwick for his time and the hope that some gentlemanly agreement could be reached satisfactory to all concerned. According to him (the matter had not been put to Mr Fenwick) Mr Fenwick had replied with some such words as 'Pull the other one Mr Raguz'. The defendant told me with some feeling (which I judged to be entirely genuine) that he had been deeply offended by this remark. Whether or not Mr Fenwick actually said it, it is reasonably clear from his conversation with Miss Martin (as recorded by her) that he did have suspicions as to the genuineness of the defendant's proposals.

[97] In fact the defendant's proposals were, in my judgment, a genuine attempt by him, with Mr Fairweather's assistance, to construct a solution which would be acceptable to the claimant and at the same time free the defendant and in due course his estate from the prospect of a contingent liability stretching to 2062. The proposals were subsequently elaborated with clarity in a letter written by Mr Fairweather to Mr Fenwick dated 15 January 2002 to which the latter replied on 12 February saying that the proposals were unacceptable, that the claimant wished to retain the right to pursue the defendant on his indemnities, that the claimant had rejected the solution of its applying for an overriding lease, but that the claimant was happy for either the defendant or one of his companies to take an assignment of the leases. That letter crossed with one from

Mr Fairweather which withdrew the proposals. The defendant at no time thereafter expressed any interest in taking an assignment.

[98] Mr Fenwick had told Mr Fairweather and the defendant at the meeting on 9 January 2002 that the claimant had an agreement with the administrative receivers concerning the running of the hotel. Indeed Mr Fairweather's letter of 15 January had expressed his understanding that in addition to the claimant having paid off the arrears of £346,313·05 and paying the current passing rent, it was paying:

> '(b) approximately £100,000 per annum to the receiver of the insolvent lessee company—presumably that the payment is being made with a view to avoiding the debtor company being placed in liquidation with the consequential risk of a disclaimer and/or forfeiture thereby crystallising very much greater liabilities.'

Mr Fenwick had also invited the defendant to communicate, if he wished, with the administrative receivers. Miss Martin was dismayed to hear from Mr Fenwick that he had divulged this information. Consistently with her belief (expressed in May 2000) that entry into the maintenance agreement would prejudice the claimant's rights under the indemnity, she now recorded that she had deliberately not given the defendant details about that agreement and she feared that it might complicate matters. She advised that a tight rein be kept on what further information was given to the defendant either by the claimant or the administrative receivers.

[99] Intelligible as this approach of Miss Martin's was, it had some unfortunate consequences for the way in which she conducted the subsequent litigation on the claimant's behalf until her (abrupt) departure from Eversheds in October 2002. In particular she made a witness statement in the course of the summary judgment application in September 2002 in which she sought to give the impression that the claimant had 'no knowledge' concerning the trading activity of HSJ, and 'no role to play' in looking at potential assignees, assertions which were simply unsustainable as matters of fact. There was also a dragging of heels in disclosure relating to the maintenance agreement in the initial disclosure process, a fact which was later to embarrass Mr Anderson who took over the matter from Miss Martin following her departure.

[100] These matters, relevant though they may be to the spirit in which this litigation has been conducted (which has been highly contentious at some of its interlocutory stages), are irrelevant in answering the question whether the claimant's conduct deprived the defendant of an opportunity which he would otherwise have taken himself to take an assignment. I think that his position all along was that he was (as he put it himself) 'praying' that the Rizvi transaction would complete as soon as possible, and hoping at the same time that his professional advisers would be able to construct arguments which would reduce or extinguish what on their face appeared to be unavoidable liabilities to the claimant.

[101] In support of what I have called its wider arguments, which I have summarised at [40], above, the defendant relied on two lines of authority. The first is a line of authority relating to guarantees which recognises that a surety may be discharged where the creditor can be said to have 'caused or connived' at the default by the principal debtor. The main modern authority is Bank of India v

Trans Continental Commodity Merchants Ltd [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep 298 at 302. The origins of the principle (and in particular the use of the word 'connive') can be traced back to the speech of Lord Brougham in MacTaggart v Watson (1835) 3 Cl & Fin 525 at 542–543, 6 ER 1534 at 1540–1541 where he said—

> 'it cannot avail to discharge a surety who has expressly bound himself for a person's doing certain things, unless it can be shown that the party taking the security has, by his conduct, either prevented the things from being done, or connived at their omission, or enabled the person to do what he ought not to have done or leave undone what he ought to have done, and that but for such conduct the omission or commission would not have happened.'

[102] In Dawson v Lawes (1854) 23 LJ Ch 434 at 438, 69 ER 119 at 128 Wood VC commented on this passage that 'All that pointed to active connivance, amounting, in fact, as it would do in such a case, almost if not entirely to a fraud on the part of the persons, and particular officers who were so conducting themselves'.

[103] I do not myself find this analogy from the law of guarantees helpful. The question in what circumstances a surety may be discharged from his obligations turns primarily on equitable considerations (see per Mance J in Socomex Ltd v Banque Bruxelles Lambert SA [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep 156 at 198). No question here arises of there having been conduct on behalf of the claimant which discharges altogether the defendant's liability to indemnify the claimant. The question is, rather, whether the indemnity extends on its true construction to the loss in respect of which the claimant claims.

[104] The second line of authority relied on was that supporting the proposition that an indemnified may not sue in respect of a loss which he has himself caused. Here Mr Bannister invoked the decision of Hobhouse J in Ikerigi Cia Naviera SA v Palmer, Global Transeas Corp v Palmer, The Wondrous [1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep 400. In that case, where a loss of hire insurance indemnified the owners of the vessel against, inter alia, 'restraint or detainment', and, where the relevant restraint or detainment had taken place as the result of the non-payment of harbour dues by the charterer, the owners were held unable to recover. Hobhouse J said (at 415, 416):

> 'it was still necessary for the plaintiffs to show that the detention was fortuitous . . . [W]here a situation comes about as a result of the voluntary conduct of the assured, it would not normally be described as fortuitous. It did not happen by chance but by the choice of the assured. Put another way, it would be in the ordinary course that, if the owners of a vessel do not pay the port dues for which they are liable to the port authority in respect of the stay of the vessel in that port (or provide acceptable security), the vessel will not be cleared. For the purposes of the law of insurance, in the absence of an express agreement to the contrary, a policy should not be construed as covering the ordinary consequences of voluntary conduct of the assured arising out of the ordinary incidents of trading; it is not a risk.'

[105] In my judgment the principle illustrated by that case has nothing to do with the present. The indemnity implied by s 24 of the 1925 Act is not an indemnity by way of insurance against the 'fortuity' of the defendant or some successor of his not paying the rent: it is a promise to keep the claimant harmless if for any reason the defendant or his successor does not pay the rent. a [106] That does not mean that I reject the general proposition that, if the actual reason for the non-payment was action taken by the claimant but for which the payment would have been made, that might have fallen outside the scope of the covenant. However, the reason for that would be that the second b (indemnity) limb of the covenant should not be construed as imposing a wider and more extensive liability than that attaching to the liability for common law damages for breach of the first limb. If therefore the claimant has suffered a loss which its own action could reasonably be expected to have mitigated or avoided altogether, the indemnity covenant should not be construed as covering that loss. c In that respect I do not agree with Mr Stoner's submission that there is any analogy to be drawn here with Jervis v Harris [1996] 1 All ER 303, [1996] Ch 195 (see [42], above).

[107] On the facts, however, there seems to me to be no question of the claimant having failed to mitigate in this way. HSJ's failure or inability to pay the rent was at no material time caused by the claimant. The period during which d that failure continued was doomed to last until an assignee could be found who would assume the liability. On the facts as I have found them, nothing which the claimant did prolonged that period. Indeed had the claimant not taken the steps which it did that period might well have been longer unless the defendant had in the meantime stepped in and taken an assignment, a course of action which he e was anxious to avoid if possible.

[108] The issue before me thus resolves into the questions (i) whether the claimant is debarred from recovering that element of the rent demanded from it in 2001 for which (if I am right in my construction of s 17) it was not liable to NCP; and (ii) whether the claimant is debarred from recovering that element of f the rent which it funded in February 2003 attributable to its liabilities under s 17 notices the service of which it had itself positively invited (and which would not have been served when they were but for that invitation).

[109] Standing back from the way in which the claimant has actually pleaded its claim, I would have little hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the g answer to both questions is negative, for essentially the same reason in each case. In each case the payment falls within the description of a payment in respect of an 'expense' or a 'claim' which was 'on account of the non-payment of the said rent', that is to say which arose as a direct result of the fact that HSJ was not only failing to meet its current liabilities in respect of rent but was plainly going to be unable to discharge any future liabilities, that NCP was not going to give its h consent to an assignment unless HSJ paid all arrears of rent, that unless the claimant funded the payment of those arrears no one else was going to do so, and that if no assignment took place the claimant would continue to accrue liabilities in respect of future rent to NCP. The claimant thus found itself in a position where, in order to stem the onslaught of future liabilities, it had to incur the j expense of meeting the arrears irrespective of its strict liability to NCP to pay the same. If that is the correct analysis, the fact that it paid sums in respect of rent in 2001 which were not the subject of valid s 17 notices, and the fact that it procured the service in 2003 of s 17 notices which would not otherwise have been served, are irrelevant to the question of its being able to recover those sums from the defendant.

[110] Consideration of the way in which the case has actually been put does, however, raise a difficulty. The claim from the outset has been, and remains, that because the claimant was liable to NCP it follows that the defendant was liable to the claimant. If I am right on the s 17 argument (as to which plainly two views are possible) the premise fails in relation to the rent paid by the claimant in response to the 2001 demand; and if the premise is good in relation to part of the 2003 payment, it was only because, by its own act, the claimant procured the service of the relevant notices.

[111] In relation to the 2003 payment my decision is that the fact that the claimant procured the service of the notices does not deprive it of its right to be indemnified against the consequent liability. That is simply because the claimant's actions in procuring the services of the notices did not materially affect the defendant's liability. The matter may be quite simply tested by asking what would have happened had the claimant simply said that it was not going to fund the payment of the arrears. The consequence would have been to alert NCP to the fact that, unless it served s 17 notices, the Rizvi transaction would not complete. If the Rizvi transaction had not completed, the inevitable result would have been that the 'missing' s 17 notices would have been served. The defendant therefore lost nothing as a result of the claimant having invited the service of those notices.

[112] I find the question of the payment in response to the 2001 statutory demands more difficult. If I am right about the s 17 notices, those demands could have been, if not ignored, defeated. It would, however, still have been in the claimant's interest to have paid those sums if they continued to be demanded (as they would have been) by NCP from HSJ as a condition of consenting to an assignment. It was likewise in the defendant's interest that those sums should be paid. Payment of those sums by the claimant in those circumstances would have been a foreseeable 'expense' recoverable by the claimant against the defendant under the s 24 covenant for indemnity. The question which I have found of some difficulty is whether the claimant has sufficiently pleaded this way of putting its case for recovery. Nothing to this effect is to be found in the particulars of claim. There is simply the denial, in para 24 of the re-amended reply that the consequence of the invalidity of the s 17 notices is to relieve the defendant of his liability to indemnify the claimant. I have been in much doubt as to whether this is enough. I have, however, narrowly concluded that, if there is a lacuna in the claimant's pleading in this respect, it should not deprive it of its remedy. This alternative way of putting the case was fully addressed by Mr Stoner in paras 163–167 of his opening skeleton argument. Moreover the points raised by the defendant in his defence permitted, indeed necessitated, a full investigation of the facts relevant to this way of putting the case, in particular an investigation of the issue as to whether or not, and if so why, the claimant would have paid the sums in question even if no valid s 17 notices had been served. Further the pleading point to which I have referred was not in terms taken by Mr Bannister.

MINOR POINTS

[113] There are two further minor points of quantum. One, which is uncontroversial, is that so far as the rent under the 1967 and 1969 leases for the quarter commencing 25 December 2002 is concerned, liability for that was assumed by Skymede in respect of the apportioned period commencing on 1 March 2003 and ought therefore not to have been included in the claim (since it should have come from Skymede). I understood this to be accepted on behalf of the claimant. The second is a more difficult point and relates to a sum of £10,072·21 which NCP had apparently taken from rent deposits held by it in respect of rental due for the period from 24 June 1999 to 5 October 1999. The claimant conceded that, if it could be shown that this sum of £10,072·21 had indeed been taken by NCP in satisfaction of the rent due for the relevant period, it would give credit to the defendant for that sum against the amount of any judgment given by me. The defendant, however, argued that it was entitled as a matter of right to a judgment in this sum.

[114] So far as the facts are concerned I was satisfied on a balance of probabilities that the defendant's premise was correct. Without sight of the rent deposit deed it is not possible to be sure that the sum was not taken in satisfaction of sums other than rent in the strict sense of the word. The accounting information supplied by NCP made this seem unlikely.

[115] The difficulty, however, with the defendant's case is that the sum concerned relates to a period in respect of which judgment was obtained on 9 December 2002. I was not persuaded by Mr Bannister that it was open to me to go behind that judgment. Given, however, the fact that this judgment will result in an order for payment against the defendant, and that the claimant has conceded that in that event it would give credit for the sum, the point is academic.

CONCLUSION

[116] For those reasons, subject to the claimant giving credit for the sum £10,072·21, the claimant is entitled to judgment in the sums claimed.

Neneh Munu Barrister.

Order accordingly.

R (on the application of Baiai and another) v Secretary of State for the Home Department (No 2)

[2006] EWHC 1454 (Admin)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (ADMINISTRATIVE COURT)

SILBER J

16 JUNE 2006

Marriage – Right to marry – Immigration – Discrimination – Requirement for persons subject to immigration control wishing to marry other than according to rites of Church of England to obtain written permission of Secretary of State – Secretary of State refusing permission to person present in United Kingdom unlawfully – Whether breach of right to marry – Whether discriminatory – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, arts 12, 14 – Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc) Act 2004, s 19.

Section 19[a] of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc) Act 2004 applied to marriages involving a party subject to immigration control (defined as any person who was not a European Economic Area (EEA) national and who required leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom) whose marriage was to be solemnised on the authority of certificates issued by a superintendent registrar under Pt III of the Marriage Act 1949. Section 19 did not apply to marriages under Pt II of the 1949 Act, which were marriages according to the rites of the Church of England. The first claimant was an Algerian national who had entered the United Kingdom illegally and intended to marry the second claimant who was an EEA national working in the United Kingdom. The Secretary of State refused his application for a certificate of approval and the claimants, together with others, applied for judicial review. The judge held, inter alia, that s 19 of the 2004 Act infringed the right to marry contained in art 12[b] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998), fell within the prohibition of discrimination contained in art 14[c] of the convention, and was not justified in the interests of immigration control. Following the judgment and the subsequent claims for damages by the claimants and others, a further issue was raised in relation to the first claimant which the judge dealt with by way of written submissions. The issue for determination was whether the decision of the Secretary of State to refuse to grant a certificate of approval to the first claimant on the ground that he was unlawfully in the United Kingdom was compatible with his rights under arts 12 and 14 of the convention.

Held – Where a person was in the United Kingdom illegally that was a factor which could be taken into account in the balancing exercise involved in determining the existence and extent of qualified convention rights and when considering whether the requirements of proportionality had been satisfied. The requirements of the need for effective immigration control were then relevant.

a Section 19, so far as material, is set out at [9], below

b Article 12 is set out at [24], below

c Article 14 is set out at [55], below

A policy of precluding illegal immigrants from obtaining certificates of approval and in consequence from obtaining further rights was rationally connected to the policy of immigration control as otherwise it would be manifestly unfair to other would-be immigrants. Accordingly, the art 12 rights of a person who was not in the United Kingdom lawfully would not be infringed if he were refused permission to marry and required to travel and marry abroad before applying for entry clearance. In relation to the art 14 claim there was, in the instant case, a relevant and justifiable difference between the first claimant who wished to marry in a registry office and another illegal immigrant who wished to marry pursuant to Anglican rites. In addition, there was a justifiable difference between the first claimant and somebody who had the right to stay in the United Kingdom for such a length of time that he would receive a certificate of approval. Accordingly, the Secretary of State had been entitled to refuse the first claimant's applications for a certificate (see [18], [30], [37], [38], [47], [54], [61], [77], below).

R (on the application of Mahmood) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 2 FCR 63 applied.

Notes

For the right to marry and found a family, and for the prohibition of discrimination, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 162, 164.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, arts 12, 14, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2004 reissue) 707, 708.

For the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc) Act 2004, s 19, see 31 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2006 reissue) 674.

Cases referred to in judgment

App No 10914/84 v Netherlands (1986) 8 EHRR 308, E Com HR.

App No 9773/82 v UK (1982) 5 EHRR 296, E Com HR.

De Freitas v Permanent Secretary of Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries, Lands and Housing [1999] 1 AC 69, [1998] 3 WLR 675, PC.

Klip v Netherlands App No 33257/96 (1997) 91 A-DR 66, E Com HR.

Mellacher v Austria (1989) 12 EHRR 391, [1989] ECHR 10522/83, ECt HR.

R v Johnstone [2003] UKHL 28, [2003] 3 All ER 884, [2003] 1 WLR 1736.

R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Daly [2001] UKHL 26, [2001] 3 All ER 433, [2001] 2 AC 532, [2001] 2 WLR 1622.

R (on the application of Carson) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, R (on the application of Reynolds) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2005] UKHL 37, [2005] 4 All ER 545, [2006] 1 AC 173, [2005] 2 WLR 1369.

R (on the application of Mahmood) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 2 FCR 63, [2001] 1 WLR 840, CA.

Szoma v Secretary of State for the Dept of Work and Pensions [2005] UKHL 64, [2006] 1 All ER 1, [2005] 3 WLR 955.

Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271, [2002] 4 All ER 1136, [2003] 1 WLR 617.

Wilson v First County Trust Ltd (No 2) [2003] UKHL 40, [2003] 4 All ER 97, [2004] 1 AC 816, [2003] 3 WLR 568.

Written submissions

Following the judgment of Silber J on the application for judicial review of the decision of the Secretary of State to refuse the application of the first claimant Mahmoud Baiai for a certificate of approval granting him permission to marry the second claimant Izabela Trzcinska in the United Kingdom as required by s 19 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc) Act 2004 on 10 April 2006 ([2006] EWHC 823 (Admin), [2006] 3 All ER 608) and his further judgment on 10 May 2006 ([2006] EWHC 1035 (Admin), Silber J was requested to resolve a further issue. He received written submissions from the claimants, the Secretary of State and the intervener, the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants, on 19, 24 and 26 May 2006 and handed down judgment without an oral hearing. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Ramby de Mello, Satvinder Singh Juss and Adrian Berry (instructed by David Tang & Co) for the claimants.

Monica Carss-Frisk QC, Angus McCullough and Richard Mumford (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State.

Richard Drabble QC and Eric Fripp (instructed by the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants) for the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants.

SUMMARY (THIS DOES NOT FORM PART OF THE JUDGMENT)[a]

1. Paragraph [1] sets out the issue on this application, which is whether the refusal by the Secretary of State to grant a certificate of approval to marry to the first claimant on the grounds that he was unlawfully in this country was incompatible with his rights under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). Paragraphs [2] and [3] give details of the refusal letters of 15 February 2005 and 15 April 2005.

2. Paragraphs [4]–[6] explain the earlier history of this litigation in the previous judgments. The chronology is set out in [7]. Details of the s 19 scheme are described in [8]–[13].

3. The background to the refusal letters is explained in [14]–[15]. Paragraphs [16]–[22] comments on the relevance of the first judgment.

4. The background to the art 12 claim is set out across [24]–[26]. Paragraphs [27]–[29] describe the advantages that the first claimant would obtain by getting married to an EEA national. Paragraph [30] explains why the immigration status of the first claimant is relevant.

5. The issue of whether the measures in the s 19 regime are designed to meet the legislative objective in relation to an illegal immigrant are considered in [30] onwards. The approach of the Secretary of State is set out in [33] and [34]. Paragraph [36] explains what the Court of Appeal in R (on the application of Mahmood) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 2 FCR 63, [2001] 1 WLR 840 stated about the need for effective immigration control and the avoidance of queue jumping.

6. Paragraphs [41]–[44] explain that the art 12 right does not mean that a person is entitled to marry in a country of his or her choice. Paragraphs [45]–[47] show why the reasoning in the first judgment which led to the conclusion that parts of the s 19 regime were incompatible with art 12 rights do not apply in the case of an illegal immigrant. Paragraph [48] explains that substantial deference has to be allowed to the Secretary of State.

7. Paragraphs [50]–[53] explain why the means used to impair the art 12 right in the s 19 regime are no more than necessary to accomplish the objectives of illegal immigrants and do not interfere with their art 12 rights.

a Editor's note: Silber J supplied the following summary of his judgment.

8. The background to the art 14 claim is set out in [55]–[58]. In [59]–[61] it is explained why the art 14 claim must be rejected.

9. Paragraphs [62]–[70] deal with the consequence of the first claimant having been granted temporary admission. This passage was included as there was argument on this issue even though it does not have any effect on the outcome as the first claimant had not been given temporary admission on either of the occasions when the Secretary of State refused his application for a certificate of approval.

10. Paragraphs [71]–[74] explain the position of the s 19 regime in the light of the present judgment and of the first judgment. Paragraphs [75] and [76] explain why a third judgment was necessary in this case and why no oral submissions were made.

11. The conclusions are then set out in [77] and [78].

16 June 2006. The following judgment was delivered.

SILBER J.

I INTRODUCTION

[1] This application raises the issue of whether the decision by the Secretary of State for the Home Department (the Secretary of State) to refuse to grant a certificate of approval (COA) to marry under the scheme introduced by s 19 of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc) Act 2004 to Mr Mahmoud Baiai (the first claimant) on the grounds that he was unlawfully in this country, was compatible with his rights under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). The claimants and the intervener (the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants) (JCWI) contend that the refusal of the Secretary of State constituted an interference with the first claimant's rights under the convention while the Secretary of State submits that his rights were not infringed by the refusal. Subject to certain exceptions, this scheme requires people subject to immigration control to obtain from the Secretary of State a COA in order to be allowed to marry in this country.

[2] The Secretary of State refused the first claimant's application for a COA by a letter dated 15 February 2005 (the first refusal letter). After the first claimant and his partner Izabela Trzcinska (the second claimant) had challenged that refusal letter by way of the present judicial review proceedings, the Secretary of State reconsidered his decision to refuse to grant a COA to the first claimant in the light of the additional reasons set out in the judicial review application.

[3] By a letter dated 15 April 2005 (the second refusal letter), the Secretary of State maintained his earlier refusal of the grant of a COA to the first claimant. In both refusal letters, the Secretary of State explained, as is not disputed, first that the first claimant did not have leave to enter or to remain in the United Kingdom and second that there were no exceptional circumstances in his case.

[4] When this claim together with two similar applications came before me earlier this year, I was asked by counsel to determine an agreed list of more than 20 issues and many more sub-issues formulated by counsel for the claimants and the Secretary of State relating to the compatibility with the convention of various features of the scheme set out in the 2004 Act, which affected the right to marry of those covered by immigration control. In a judgment handed down on 10 April 2006 ([2006] EWHC 823 (Admin), [2006] 3 All ER 608 (the first judgment), I held that various aspects of the scheme set out in the 2004 Act were incompatible with both arts 12 and 14 of the convention. I, like all counsel, expected that my rulings on this long list of issues prepared by counsel for all the claimants and the Secretary of State would then enable all the outstanding issues between the parties to be resolved.

[5] When I was dealing with the subsequent claims for damages by the present claimants and others, it became clear that this long list of issues did not deal with the question of whether the Secretary of State was entitled to reject the application of a person unlawfully in this country without infringing his rights under the convention and that is the issue with which I am now concerned. When I handed down the second judgment on 10 May 2006 ([2006] EWHC 1035 (Admin), [2006] All ER (D) 142 (May)) (the second judgment), I was then asked by counsel for the claimants and the Secretary of State to resolve a further issue—

> 'as to whether the Secretary of State was entitled to refuse the application of the claimant Mahmoud BAIAI (CO/1460/2005) for a Certificate of Approval ("COA") without infringing his rights under the European Convention on Human Rights . . .'

[6] For reasons which I will explain at [76], below, I was asked not only to resolve this matter as a matter of urgency but also unfortunately without the benefit of oral submissions although I have received detailed written submissions from counsel for the claimants, for the Secretary of State and for the intervener. The Secretary of State submits that notwithstanding the first judgment, the s 19 scheme does not involve a disproportionate interference with the convention rights of those (like the first claimant) who are illegally present in this country. Counsel for the claimants and for the intervener contend that the s 19 scheme does interfere with the first claimant's rights under arts 12 and 14 of the convention. There was also argument as to the right of the first claimant to receive a COA after the Secretary of State had granted to him temporary admission on 24 May 2005, which was after the first claimant had received the first and second refusal letters. To understand the rival submissions, it is now necessary to set out the facts relating to the claimants before setting out the main features of the s 19 regime.

II THE CHRONOLOGY

[7] The relevant facts relating to the claimants are:

(a) The first claimant was born on 2 September 1971. He was and remains an Algerian national. According to his witness statement of 2 March 2005, he entered the United Kingdom as an illegal immigrant in February 2002. In about October 2004 he started living with the second claimant, whom he had met two months earlier. She is a Polish national who was born on 2 July 1979 and who is working in the United Kingdom following Poland's accession to the European Union and so she is an European Economic Area (EEA)/European Economic Community (EEC) national.

(b) Under cover of a letter of 31 January 2005, the first claimant applied to the Home Office for a COA and this was refused by the Secretary of State in the first refusal letter dated 15 February 2005 in which it was explained that he had no valid leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom and that there were no exceptional compassionate circumstances applicable in his case.

(c) The immigration authorities first became aware of the first claimant's presence when he applied for a COA to marry after what he described as his illegal entry to the United Kingdom. When he received the first refusal letter, the first claimant was notified that he was required to make his own arrangements to leave the United Kingdom immediately. a

(d) By a letter dated 11 April 2005, the Secretary of State requested the first claimant to attend an interview to ascertain his immigration status in accordance with the usual practice of the Secretary of State when a person present in the United Kingdom comes to the attention of the authorities. b

(e) On 12 April 2005, the first claimant's legal representatives replied stating that they did not consider such an interview to be appropriate in the light of the judicial review application which the first claimant had instituted on 8 March 2005 in order to challenge the first refusal letter and the s 19 regime.

(f) In his judicial review application, the first claimant advanced reasons not only why the s 19 regime was unlawful but also why the Secretary of State ought to exercise his discretion to grant him a COA notwithstanding the fact that he did not satisfy the relevant criteria. The Secretary of State considered these matters and he issued the second refusal letter dated 15 April 2005, giving additional reasons for maintaining his refusal to grant a COA to the first claimant. c

(g) In response to the letter of 12 April 2005, the Secretary of State sent a status questionnaire on 9 May 2005 which the first claimant was asked to complete and to return so that the Secretary of State could determine the immigration status in the United Kingdom of the first claimant. The first claimant was also informed that his failure to complete and return the form or to attend an interview which he had already declined to do would result in the Secretary of State considering him to have entered and remained in the United Kingdom illegally. d e

(h) The first claimant did not complete the questionnaire but in a letter dated 16 May 2005, the first claimant's legal representatives explained that:

> 'Our client has never claimed asylum and does not intend to do so. It is conceded that he entered the UK as an illegal entrant in or about February 2002. No doubt you are aware that our client has obtained permission to apply for judicial review. His case will be fully argued before the court and we do not believe that it is appropriate to return this questionnaire to you at this stage . . .' f

(j) As the first claimant had admitted through his legal representatives that he had entered the United Kingdom illegally, the Secretary of State did not pursue his request for the first claimant to attend for an interview or to complete the questionnaire as the purpose of interviewing the first claimant was to ascertain whether he had entered the United Kingdom lawfully. g

(k) By letter dated 24 May 2006, the Secretary of State served on the first claimant form IS 96ENF, which specifically stated that the papers which granted him temporary admission were served on the first claimant 'as an illegal immigrant' and the first claimant was informed of the reporting and residence restrictions imposed on him. He was also notified that he was liable to be detained. h

(l) On 15 May 2006, the first claimant was provided with form IS 75 and he was asked to provide the immigration authorities with any reason why he might consider himself eligible to remain in the United Kingdom and any justification as to why he should not be removed or required to leave the United Kingdom. j

(m) By a letter dated 20 June 2006, the representatives of the first claimant returned the form IS 76 stating that the first claimant had already explained why he should be allowed to remain in the United Kingdom and confirming why he did not wish to advance any other grounds.

(n) On 23 April 2006, the first claimant was granted an extension to his temporary admission.

III THE SECTION 19 SCHEME

[8] Section 19 of the 2004 Act imposes certain requirements before a person subject to immigration control is able to marry, otherwise than in accordance with the rites of the Church of England under Pt II of the Marriage Act 1949. A person 'subject to Immigration control' is a person who is not an EEA national and who requires leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom (see s 19(4)(a)). The first claimant, who is a national of Algeria, is such a person.

[9] Section 19(3) of the 2004 Act provides that:

> 'The superintendent registrar shall not enter in the marriage notice book notice of a marriage to which this section applies unless satisfied, by the provision of specified evidence, that the party subject to immigration control—(a) has an entry clearance granted expressly for the purpose of enabling him to marry in the United Kingdom, (b) has the written permission of the Secretary of State to marry in the United Kingdom, or (c) falls within a class specified for the purpose of this paragraph by regulations made by the Secretary of State.'

[10] The relevant statutory provision in the first claimant's case is s 19(3)(b) because he is an illegal entrant to the United Kingdom and so at the time of the first and second refusal letters, he plainly did not have entry clearance for the purpose of marriage within the meaning of s 19(3)(a), nor did he fall within a specified class for the purposes of s 19(3)(c). He therefore needed the written permission of the Secretary of State to marry in the United Kingdom pursuant to s 19(3)(b).

[11] Permission by the Secretary of State is granted by the issuing of a COA pursuant to the procedure provided for in the Immigration (Procedure for Marriage) Regulations 2005, SI 2005/15 for which a fee of £135 is payable on each application for a COA.

[12] The practical effect of the new regime is that applicants, who first do not have a valid right to enter or remain in the United Kingdom beyond a short term status (ie more than six months with more than three months remaining at the time of the application for the COA) or second have an initial application for immigration status or an appeal outstanding for 18 months or third have compelling compassionate circumstances, which make it unreasonable to expect the couple to travel and marry abroad, the expectation is that either the couple should travel abroad and marry, and then for the partner requiring entry clearance to obtain this from abroad on the basis of his or her marriage; or for the individual requiring entry clearance to travel abroad (with or without his or her fiancé(e)) to obtain entry clearance, from abroad, on the basis of his intended marriage in the United Kingdom. The compassionate circumstances may be seen to be applicable where neither expectation is reasonable.

[13] The Secretary of State contends first that as the first claimant was an illegal entrant into the United Kingdom who did not have valid leave to enter or remain, he did not qualify for a COA under the general policy set out in the guidance and second that there were no exceptional compassionate circumstances which would have merited a grant of discretion in his favour.

IV THE BACKGROUND TO THE REFUSAL LETTERS

[14] The Secretary of State's decisions in the refusal letters have to be considered against the background of three important facts. First, it is not suggested by the first claimant that there were any exceptional compassionate circumstances which made it unlawful for the Secretary of State to refuse the COA on that basis.

[15] Second, in so far as counsel for the first claimant contends that the Secretary of State should have accorded weight to the fact that the first claimant had been granted temporary admission to the United Kingdom, this submission fails to appreciate that the first and second refusal letters were dated 15 February 2005 and 15 April 2005 respectively while temporary admission was not granted to the first claimant until 24 May 2005. So at the date of both of the refusal letters, the first claimant was an illegal immigrant, who had not been given temporary admission. Third, the claimants' submissions have referred to applications being made under various European Union enactments but they are not the subject of the present applications and so I will not consider them.

V THE RELEVANCE OF THE FIRST JUDGMENT

[16] The claimants and the JCWI contended that the Secretary of State was not entitled to reject the application for the COA and they point in support to the orders made in the first judgment in which I made declarations of incompatibility in respect of the s 19 regime. I do not consider that those orders mean that the Secretary of State was obliged to accede to the first claimant's application for a COA in the light of the following factors, which I set out in no particular order of importance.

[17] First, s 4(6) of the 1998 Act provides that a declaration of incompatibility: '(a) does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of the provision in respect of which it is given; and (b) is not binding on the parties to the proceedings in which it is made.'

[18] Second, the first judgment was concerned with those who had a right to enter and to remain in the United Kingdom. None of the issues which I was asked to resolve were concerned with the position of somebody, who is unlawfully in this country. Such a person's status will be relevant on the extent of his or her convention rights. An illegal immigrant will be entitled to the absolute rights specified in the convention, such as those set out in art 3. Where, however, a right under the convention is qualified then, as I will explain at [33]–[38], below, the fact that the person concerned is in the United Kingdom illegally is a factor which can be and frequently should be taken into account first in the balancing exercise involved in determining the existence and extent of such qualified convention rights and second when considering whether the requirements of proportionality have been satisfied. This means that when the qualified convention rights of an illegal immigrant (such as the first claimant) are being considered, it is necessary to attach weight to the legislative objective of effective immigration control against illegal immigrants, which, as I will explain, is an integral part of the policy of the Secretary of State. As I explained in the first judgment ([2006] 3 All ER 608 at [61]), art 12 is not an absolute right as it requires a balance to be struck.

[19] It follows that the fact that an applicant for a COA is an illegal immigrant must be a relevant factor on the issue of whether the grant of the COA would be consistent with effective immigration control. When I was given the agreed list of issues to be resolved in the first judgment, none were specifically concerned with the position of the illegal immigrant applicant. Thus, the specific consequences of an applicant being an illegal immigrant were not considered in the first judgment and nothing in it resolves the convention rights and in particular the art 12 rights of a person in that position. In consequence, the declaration of incompatibility does not mean that the Secretary of State was obliged to grant a COA to an illegal immigrant such as the first claimant or that that his decision to refuse a COA to the first claimant can be quashed.

[20] Third, the agreed list of issues which were the subject of the first judgment, led to very general submissions while in the present case I am concerned with specific facts. My critical findings in respect of non-Anglican religious ceremonies are not relevant as the first and second claimants were intending to marry in a registry office and that fact would have been known to the Secretary of State at least when he issued the second refusal letter as both the claim form and the first witness statement of the first claimant refer to his attempts to marry in a registry office and they both pre-date the second refusal letter. Different considerations apply to such a wedding especially as I explained in the first judgment at [71], [72], there is detailed cogent evidence that registry offices have frequently been used for sham weddings.

[21] Fourth, one of these reasons why I considered that the s 19 regime to be incompatible with the convention in the case of people lawfully in the United Kingdom was that there was no consideration of their particular circumstances. The terms of the first and second refusal letters show first that the Secretary of State considered carefully the first claimant's application for a COA including his personal circumstances and second that he refused the application after having considered the first claimant's full circumstances and his representations as is particularly clear from the second refusal letter.

[22] For all these reasons, the reasoning and conclusions in the first judgment do not mean that the decision of the Secretary of State to refuse the first claimant's request for a COA must be impugned.

[23] My task is to ascertain if the art 12 and art 14 rights of the first claimant have been infringed and I will focus my attention particularly on those conclusions in the first judgment, which led to the claimants succeeding in order to decide if those conclusions are applicable to the first claimant, who was an illegal immigrant.

VI THE ARTICLE 12 CLAIM

(i) Introduction

[24] Article 12 of the convention provides that: 'Men and women of marriageable age have the right to marry and to found a family, according to the national laws governing the exercise of this right.'

[25] In the first judgment, I considered whether the s 19 regime interfered with the art 12 rights of those who were in the United Kingdom and who were subject to immigration control but who were here lawfully. I concluded that (i):

> 'In my view, the jurisprudence of the European Commission of Human Rights expressly permits the introduction of legislation to prevent marriages entered into for the purpose of avoiding immigration control notwithstanding that this legislation might interfere with the right to marry' (see [57]);

(ii) 'The legislative objective [of preventing sham marriages entered into so as to avoid immigration control] is sufficiently important to justify limiting the fundamental [art 12 right]' (see [73]); and (iii) 'the art 12 claim succeeds as the s 19 regime is not proportionate and it constitutes a substantial interference with art 12 rights ...' (see [108]).

[26] The reason why the s 19 regime was not proportionate in respect of those who were lawfully in the United Kingdom was because I concluded that the regime failed to comply with two of the three requirements of proportionality specified in the classic approach propounded by Lord Clyde in De Freitas v Permanent Secretary of Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries, Lands and Housing [1999] 1 AC 69 at 80, [1998] 3 WLR 675 at 684 and followed by Lord Steyn in R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Daly [2001] UKHL 26 at [27], [2001] 3 All ER 433 at [27], [2001] 2 AC 532, namely the requirements that:

> '(ii) the measures designed to meet the legislative objective are rationally connected to it; and (iii) the means used to impair the right or freedom are no more than is necessary to accomplish the objective.'

[27] I must now consider if these two crucial requirements have been satisfied in the case of the first claimant as he was an illegal immigrant at the time of the refusal letters so that, according to Miss Carss-Frisk QC, his art 12 rights were not infringed. These two requirements have to be considered in the light of the facts first that the first claimant was at the time of each of the refusal letters liable to be detained and deported as an illegal immigrant and second that on his marriage to the second claimant, his Polish partner, the first claimant's status in this country would or might change radically as a consequence of this marriage to an EEA national. The second factor is important because the first claimant has explained in his sixth witness statement dated 26 April 2006 that on marrying his partner: 'I would obtain permission to remain in the United Kingdom under EU law and EU residence document.'

[28] As I will explain at [33] and [34], below, the concern of the Secretary of State is the need to have effective immigration control, which, as the Court of Appeal has stated, means that there must be consistency of treatment between one aspiring immigrant and another with the result that there should be no queue-jumping by those who enter the United Kingdom illegally without any form of entry clearance over those who apply in the proper manner for permission to enter the United Kingdom.

[29] In summary, the first claimant on marriage would obtain the right to residence in the United Kingdom if his wife was exercising treaty rights in the United Kingdom. Even though he entered the United Kingdom illegally, the first claimant would be entitled to a residence card if he entered into a marriage to an EEA national, who was exercising treaty rights in the United Kingdom. This right arose under reg 14 of the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/2326 which were in force at the time of both refusal letters and which remained in force until 30 April 2006, when they were replaced by the Immigration (European Economic Area) Regulations 2006, SI 2006/1003. Further, after four years, the first claimant would then become entitled to permanent residence if his wife was still exercising treaty rights. A residence permit can be refused if the marriage is shown to be marriage of convenience in the form of a 'sham' marriage or if it can be demonstrated that the EEA national is not exercising his or her treaty rights. Miss Alison Bennett, an Assistant Director of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate of the Home Office, has stated that it is very difficult in practice to prove that a marriage is not genuine after it has taken place. The further advantages which the first claimant would enjoy by marrying an EEA national, the second claimant, are very great and in some respects, they were greater than those enjoyed by those who marry British nationals; these advantages are set out in the first judgment ([2006] 3 All ER 608 at [68], [69]) and so I will not repeat them. Even if the first claimant did not acquire these rights, he would still be able to rely on his marriage to an EEA national resident in the United Kingdom to challenge a removal direction issued by the Secretary of State on the basis that such removal would infringe his art 8 rights because of the difficulties, which his wife would experience if she had to move to Algeria and which he has described in his witness statements. Although such a claim would probably fail in the light of the present state of the law, the first claimant would be able to use this claim (and in particular that he was married to a United Kingdom resident) to delay his removal for a long period in the light of the serious delays in the immigration and the immigration appeal system.

[30] The main submission of counsel for the first claimant is that the immigration status of the first claimant is not a relevant factor when considering his right to marry. I am unable to agree because as I have explained in paras [46]–[59] of the first judgment the Secretary of State is entitled to impose restrictions or conditions on the right to marry in the interests of an effective immigration policy without infringing art 12 rights provided that each condition or restriction satisfies the three requirements of proportionality. In addition, I explained in paras [64]–[73] of the first judgment, the legislative object of preventing sham marriages entered into so as to avoid immigration control is sufficiently important to justify limiting art 12 rights. The issue to which I must now turn is whether the requirements of immigration control against illegal immigrants means that the decisions to refuse the first claimant a COA were proportionate. That exercise entails considering the two issues on which the Secretary of State failed at the first hearing.

(ii) Are 'the measures [in the s 19 regime] designed to meet the legislative objectives . . . rationally connected to it' for an illegal immigrant?

[31] While the first judgment was concerned with the position of people lawfully present in the United Kingdom, the position of the first claimant at the time of both the first and second refusal letters was radically different because he was an illegal immigrant without any right to remain in the United Kingdom. The Secretary of State contends that the fact that the first claimant was an illegal immigrant was of critical, if not crucial, importance. The case for the first claimant and the JCWI is that the immigration status of the first claimant is irrelevant to the decision as to whether to grant him a COA.

[32] In my opinion as I will explain, the fact that the first claimant was an illegal immigrant is of critical importance because to allow him to marry an EEA national and thereby to obtain the right of residence in spite of the fact that he had entered the United Kingdom illegally would undermine immigration policy with the result that the Secretary of State's decisions in the two refusal letters to refuse a COA to the first claimant was 'rationally connected' to his policy of immigration control. So this requirement of the proportionality test was satisfied.

[33] Evidence has been adduced by the Secretary of State in the form of a witness statement from Miss Bennett, who explains that the Secretary of State 'attaches great importance to maintaining effective immigration control'. He considers that: 'there is a distinction between (i) those who have leave to enter or remain (albeit short-term or limited leave) and so have a right to be present in this country; and (b) those who have no such right, being either illegal entrants or over-stayers.'

[34] Miss Bennett states that the Secretary of State—

> 'considers that the importance of maintaining effective immigration control provides a powerful justification for his policy in relation to someone in [the claimant's] position, who is an illegal immigrant, having no leave to enter or remain in the [United Kingdom].'

[35] I would add that this point is important because an illegal immigrant would have a very great incentive to marry an EEA national as his status after such a marriage would change overnight from that of somebody liable to be removed to a person with all the rights to which I referred at [29], above. That means that there would be an incentive for an illegal immigrant to enter into a sham marriage for all those reasons. In addition the policy of the Secretary of State would mean that prospective immigrants might be deterred from entering the United Kingdom illegally as they would know that they could not by-pass the system of immigration control by marrying an EEA national.

[36] The reasoning of the Secretary of State as stated by Miss Bennett is also consistent with the views expressed by the Court of Appeal in R (on the application of Mahmood) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 2 FCR 63, [2001] 1 WLR 840), which were that: (i) 'A State has a right under international law to control the entry of non-nationals into its territory, subject always to its treaty obligations' (see [2001] 2 FCR 63 at 85–86, [2001] 1 WLR 840 at 861 (para 55) per Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR); (ii) 'Firm immigration control requires consistency of treatment between one aspiring immigrant and another' (see [2001] 2 FCR 63 at 75, [2001] 1 WLR 840 at 850 (para 23) per Laws LJ; and that (iii):

> 'if the established rule is to the effect—as it is—that a person seeking rights of residence here on grounds of marriage (not being someone who already enjoys leave, albeit limited, to remain in the UK) must obtain an entry clearance in his country of origin, then a waiver of that requirement in the case of someone who has found his way here without an entry clearance and then seeks to remain on marriage grounds, having no other legitimate claim to enter, would in the absence of exceptional circumstances to justify the waiver, disrupt and undermine firm immigration control because it would be manifestly unfair to other would-be entrants who are content to take their place in the entry clearance queue in their country of origin' (see [2001] 2 FCR 63 at 74–75, [2001] 1 WLR 840 at 850 (para 23) per Laws LJ).

[37] These statements establish first that the Secretary of State should attach importance to the fact that an applicant for a COA is a person who is illegally in this country, second that he should not regard an illegal immigrant as having similar rights to someone who has permission to be here and third that he should not allow illegal immigrants to take advantage of their illegal presence to obtain the same rights as are available to people who have permission to be in the United Kingdom. To do otherwise, would in the words of Laws LJ: 'disrupt and undermine firm immigration control because it would be manifestly unfair to other would-be entrants who are content to take their place in the entry clearance queue in their country of origin.'

[38] All these consequences follow from the need to have a proper and fair system of immigration control, which precludes any form of queue-jumping by illegal immigrants over those having to apply from abroad for permission to come to the United Kingdom. It follows that a policy of precluding illegal immigrants from obtaining COAs and in consequence from obtaining further rights is rationally connected to the policy of immigration control as otherwise, in the words of Laws LJ which I have just quoted, it would be 'manifestly unfair to other would-be entrants'.

[39] This conclusion is supported by the submission of Miss Carss-Frisk, which I accept and which is that it is helpful to bear in mind by way of analogy, that the present requirement for persons unlawfully present in the United Kingdom to go home and get appropriate entry clearance, is generally considered to be a proportionate interference with the right to respect for family life under art 8, where a person has a developed family life in the United Kingdom; this is so even though in many cases this may entail a period of separation from a person's partner or other family as was explained in Mahmood's case especially [2001] 2 FCR 63 at 74–75, 87–88, [2001] 1 WLR 840 at 850–851, 862–863 (paras 23–26, 65–67).

[40] In other words, I agree that there is no good reason why the first claimant should be in a better position under art 12 than the claimant in Mahmood's case was under art 8. In the same way as Mr Mahmood was not allowed to take advantage of his illegal presence to obtain rights which were only available to somebody who had permission to be here, the first claimant should not in my view be able to circumvent the need to obtain entry clearance by being permitted to marry the second claimant and thereby obtain the advantages of having been given permission to enter the United Kingdom, which he had neither sought nor obtained.

[41] In reaching that conclusion, I have considered, but rejected, the submission of JCWI that 'nothing in the case law shows an ability to refuse to allow an individual to enter into a genuine marriage on the basis of his or her immigration status rather than a decision that the marriage is not genuine'. It is clear that the art 12 right does not mean that person is entitled to marry in the country of his or her choice and there is no case which supports such a proposition.

[42] Indeed there are decisions to the contrary in the sense that they show that art 12 does not confer on an individual the right under art 12 to get married wherever he wishes to do so especially where there are countervailing immigration control considerations. So in App No 9773/82 v UK (1982) 5 EHRR 296, the European Commission found to be manifestly ill-founded, complaints of breaches of arts 8, 12 and 14 of the convention where entry clearance was refused for the Philippine fiancée of a disabled man of limited means on the basis that she did not have the means to maintain and support herself without access to public funds. The Commission observed that there was no evidence on the file that there would be any legal obstacles preventing the applicant from marrying his fiancée in the Philippines. The Commission explained that the art 12 right 'does not in principle, include the right to choose the geographical location of the marriage' (see 296) and that 'the Commission considers that the limitation of immigration possibilities to only those people who will definitely not create an economic burden on the host state is not of itself an unreasonable or arbitrary requirement' (see 297).

[43] Similarly, in App No 10914/84 v Netherlands (1986) 8 EHRR 308, both applicants were present in the Netherlands and they complained that they would be prevented from marrying there because of a decision to expel the intended husband to Morocco. The Commission responded to the contention that the parties had a right to marry in the Netherlands by stating (at 309) that: 'Article 12 of the Convention does not guarantee the right to marry in a particular country, or under a particular legal system.'

[44] These cases and the decision in Klip v Netherlands App No 33257/96 (1997) 91 A-DR 66 (which I explained in the first judgment ([2006] 3 All ER 608 at [53], [54])) establish the right of a state to refuse to consent to a marriage on the basis of immigration control. In the light of this conclusion and the factors set out at [33]–[40], above, I conclude that the approach of the Secretary of State to refusing a COA to an illegal immigrant was 'rationally connected' to the objective of effective immigration control. In reaching that conclusion, I have also considered the application to an illegal immigrant of the five reasons which I outlined in the first judgment (at [76]–[87]) as preventing the s 19 regime being compatible with the art 14 right of those who were lawfully in this country. Those reasons are not applicable to those (like the first claimant) who are not lawfully in the United Kingdom as their application for COAs can be refused lawfully on the discrete and cogent ground of being pursuant to the policy of immigration control against those who have no right to be in the United Kingdom and which I have explained at [33]–[40], above. It is this crucial factor, which 'trumps' or overrides the five reasons set out in the first judgment. The second reason set out in the first judgment (at [77]–[84]) (which is probably the most important reason for my decision) relates to the treatment of religious non-Anglican marriages but that reasoning does not apply where the applicant for a COA, like the first applicant, intends to marry in a registry office; as I explained in the first judgment (at [71]), there was a great deal of evidence which shows that such marriages are regularly used for sham marriages.

[45] The reasons in the first judgment for finding that the s 19 regime was not rationally connected to the legislative objects, which I considered decisive when considering the position of those subject to immigration control do not apply to those who are illegally in this country because, as I have already pointed out, Miss Bennett has explained that the Secretary of State considers correctly in my view that the Secretary of State is entitled to draw a distinction between '(i) those who have leave to enter or remain . . . and so have a right to be present in this country; and (ii) those who have no such right, being either illegal immigrants or over-stayers'. My first judgment was dealing with those in category (i) and all my comments in that judgment have to be considered in that context while I am now dealing with the totally different position of those in category (ii) and different considerations apply to them essentially for the reasons put forward both by Miss Bennett and in Mahmood's case.

[46] I am aware that the report of the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights was critical of the s 19 regime and the JCWI relies on these criticisms. It is, however, noteworthy, as Miss Carss-Frisk points out that although the passage from the report of the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights on the s 19 regime relied upon by the JCWI, is very critical of the s 19 regime, this criticism states (with my emphasis added) that 'It [the s 19 regime] is not confined to those who are unlawfully in the United Kingdom (overstayers and illegal immigrants)'. This comment suggests that the Joint Committee's criticisms of the s 19 regime might well not apply to illegal immigrants, such as the first claimant or at least that those who are unlawfully in the United Kingdom are in a different position from those who are lawfully here for the purposes of the compatibility of the s 19 regime with art 12.

[47] As I explained in the first judgment, I concluded that the s 19 regime for those lawfully in this country was not rationally connected to meet its legislative objectives. In my view, the position is different for those illegal entrants in the United Kingdom as the need for proper immigration control would mean that a policy of refusing to give COAs to those who are illegally in this country (in the absence of compassionate circumstances) would be rationally connected to the objectives of having proper immigration control and of avoiding queue-jumping, as I have described in the last two paragraphs.

[48] Until now, I have been assuming that the Secretary of State had the ordinary degree of deference but as I explained in the first judgment ([2006] 3 All ER 608 at [63]), 'the Secretary of State and Parliament are entitled to substantial deference in determining what restrictions, if any, are appropriate to impose on art 12 rights'. That would constitute an additional reason for concluding that the measures in the s 19 regime are 'rationally connected' to the legislative objectives of maintaining immigration control against those unlawfully in the United Kingdom or those with only a limited right to remain in the United Kingdom.

[49] It is appropriate finally to refer again to the statement in the first judgment (at [88]) in which I stated that 'It is noteworthy, as Mr Drabble submits, that none of the Strasbourg case law reveals a legal system which refuses to allow a marriage within its territory where the marriage is genuine and not a sham'. In the first judgment, I had also referred to the cases of App No 9773/82 v UK and of App No 10914/84 v Netherlands to which I have just referred. They establish, as I explained in the first judgment (at [57]) that 'the jurisprudence of the European Commission of Human Rights expressly permits the introduction of legislation to prevent marriages entered into for the purpose of avoiding immigration control notwithstanding that this legislation might interfere with the right to marry'. So regrettably, my statement at [88] is incorrect but I did not use that statement to justify my conclusion which I had already stated in the immediately preceding paragraph and which was that:

> '. . . As I have concluded for the reasons which I have set out, the measures in the regime designed to meet the legislative objectives are not rationally connected to it, and so it follows that the regime is not proportionate and that it constitutes an infringement of art 12 rights.'

(iii) Are 'the means used to impair the right or freedom ... [in the s 19 regime] no more than is necessary to accomplish the objective' for an illegal immigrant?

[50] Before dealing with the claimants' contentions that the means used by the Secretary of State go far further than is necessary to achieve the objectives of preventing sham marriages, it is necessary to bear in mind that I am being asked to appraise matters of which the legislature and the executive have much greater knowledge than the courts would have. Thus, I approach the claimants' submissions on the basis that I should be reluctant to interfere with a decision made by Parliament. The role of the courts on this issue was explained by Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead in Wilson v First County Trust Ltd (No 2) [2003] UKHL 40 at [70], [2003] 4 All ER 97 at [70], [2004] 1 AC 816 in this way:

